

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. The State Report Citation of the Cases in the PACIFIC REPORTER, VOL. 26.

ation: The case of Donlon v. Jewett is in Pac. Rep., vol. 25, p. 370. It can be cited as from the State Report by giving the citation 370 (Reporter page column) in this table, i. e., "88 Cal. 530."

able is the reverse of the "THIRD LABEL TABLE," which enables the subscriber to find a case in the Reporter when cited as State Report. This enables him to cite any case in the Reporter as from the State Report.

able is correct. Variations between the titles of cases in the Reporter and State Reports are due to changes sometimes made in Reporter. The RECORD TITLE is always used in the Reporters.

SUPREME COURT RULES.

OKLAHOMA.

WRITS OF ERRORS—SUPERSEDEAS.

1. No supersedeas will be granted unless a transcript of the record on which the application is made is complete, and so certified by the clerk of the court below, and the requisite bond be entered into and filed in the office of the clerk of this court according to law, with an assignment of errors written on or appended to the record; and in every application for a supersedeas an abstract of the record, with a brief containing the points and authorities relied on, and pointing specifically to those portions of the record upon which the alleged errors arise, with the record, shall be presented to the court or judge to whom the application is made. Every such application, whether made in open court or to a justice in vacation, must be accompanied by an affidavit of the proposed securities, or some other credible person, justifying the sufficiency of bail, sworn to and properly certified.

2. Whenever a bond is executed by an attorney in fact, the clerk shall require the original power of attorney to be filed in his office, unless it shall appear that the power of attorney contains other powers than the mere power to execute the bond in question, in which case the original power of attorney shall be presented to the clerk, and a true copy thereof filed, certified by the clerk to be a true copy of the original.

3. When a writ of error shall be made a supersedeas, the clerk shall indorse upon said writ the following words: "This writ of error is made a supersedeas, and is to be obeyed accordingly;" and he shall thereupon file the writ of error, with the transcript of the record, in his office. Said transcript shall be taken and considered as a due return to said writ, and thereupon it shall be the duty of the clerk to issue a certificate, in substance as follows, to-wit:

"Territory of Oklahoma—ss.:

"Office of the Clerk of the Supreme Court.

"I do hereby certify that a writ of error has issued from this court for the reversal of a judgment obtained by — vs. —, in the — court of —, at the — term, A. D. 18—, in a certain civil action, which writ of error is made a supersedeas, and is to operate as a suspension of the execution of the judgment, and, as such, is to be obeyed by all concerned.

"Given under my hand and the seal of the supreme court, at —, this — day of —, A. D. 18—.

"—, Clerk."

4. Writs of error shall be directed to the clerk or keeper of the record of the court in which the judgment or decree complained of is entered, commanding him to certify a correct transcript of the record to this court; but where the plaintiff in error shall file in the office of the clerk of this court a transcript of the record, duly certified to be full and complete, before a writ of error issues, it shall not be necessary to send such writ to the clerk of the inferior court, but such transcript shall be taken and considered as a due return to said writ.

5. A scire facias to hear errors shall be made returnable on the first day of the term; and, if any such writ shall not be served 10 days before the return-day thereof, the defendant so served shall not be required to appear in obedience thereto until the first day of the term of court next succeeding such return-day. A defendant upon whom process has not been served may enter his appearance, and, upon five days' notice to the plaintiff, may proceed in the same manner as if duly served with process.

6. If a scire facias to hear errors shall not be served, an alias or pluries may be issued without an order of the court therefor.

RECORDS—HOW PREPARED—TIME FOR FILING.

Hereafter the clerks of the inferior courts in this territory, in cases of appeal and of error or certiorari, in making up an "authenticated copy of the record of the judgment below," or in sending up a transcript of the record to this court as a return to a writ of error or certiorari, shall certify to this court: First, a copy of the process; second, the pleadings of the parties, respectively; third, the verdict in jury trials; fourth, the judgment of the court below, whether tried by court or jury; fifth, all orders made in the same cause by the court; sixth, the bill of exceptions; seventh, the appeal-bond in cases of appeal. And in no case shall the said clerk insert in such transcript any affidavit, account, or other document or writing, or other matter, which, according to the decisions of this court, has been held to constitute no part of the record of a cause. This rule shall not extend to appeals or error in chancery or criminal causes.

8. The clerk of the court below shall arrange the several parts of the record aforesaid according to their chronological order. The clerk of this court shall not tax as costs in this court any matter inserted in such transcript contrary to the rule.

9. The party or his attorney may by præcipe indicate to the clerk and direct what of the files of the cause shall be copied into the record; and in such cases, if the record shall be insufficient, it shall be supplied at his costs, and, if unnecessarily voluminous, he shall pay the costs accrued on account of the copying of such unnecessary matters.

10. No case brought to this court by appeal shall be placed on the court docket for hearing unless the record is filed within the time now prescribed by law, or within the further time allowed by the court for filing the record, except in extraordinary cases the court, upon special application, may order a cause to be placed on the hearing docket.

11. No case which may be brought to this court on writ of error shall be placed on the court docket for hearing unless the record shall be filed on or before the first day of the term, or within such further time as may be allowed by the court for filing the same, except in extraordinary cases the court, upon special application, may order a cause to be placed on the hearing docket.

12. The appellant or plaintiff in error shall in all cases assign error at the time of filing his record in this court, and, on failing to do so, the case may be dismissed; but other errors may be assigned after the filing of the record, by leave of the court. The appellee or defendant in error shall have the right to assign cross-errors within two days after the record is filed in this court, and not afterwards without special leave of the court. The assignment of errors and cross-errors must be written upon or attached to the record.

MANDATE.

13. Before an application for a writ of mandate will be heard by this court, the applicant must show that the parties interested in the subject-matter to be reached or affected by the issuance of the writ have been notified in writing of the time and place of the intended application at least 10 days previous thereto, unless the court for special reasons shall otherwise direct.

AGREED CASES.

14. No judgment will be pronounced in any agreed case placed upon the records of this court unless an affidavit shall be filed, setting forth that the matters presented by the record were litigated in good faith about a matter in actual controversy between the parties, and that the opinion of this court is not sought with any other design than to adjudicate and settle the law relative to the matter in actual controversy between the parties to the record.

MOTIONS.

15. Motions may be made immediately after the decisions of the court are announced, but at no other time, unless in case of necessity, or in relation to a cause when called in course.

16. Motions are to be made by the attorneys in the following order: First, by the attorney general; next, by the oldest practitioner at the bar; and so on to the youngest.

17. All special motions shall be in writing, and filed with the clerk, together with the reasons in support thereof, at least one day before they shall be submitted to the court. Objections to motions must also be in writing. Oral arguments will not be heard.

18. When a motion is intended to be based on matters which do not appear by the record, the facts must be disclosed and supported by affidavit.

SECURITY FOR COSTS.

19. Upon filing an affidavit that any plaintiff in error is not a resident of this territory, and that no bond for costs has been filed, a rule shall be entered against him, of which he shall take notice, to show cause why the writ shall not be dismissed.

20. No cause shall be docketed, nor process issued thereon, except causes wherein the United States or territory is appellant or plaintiff in error, until the plaintiff in error or appellant shall deposit with the clerk $10.00 as security for clerk's fees.

ABSTRACTS.

21. Appellants and plaintiffs in error, in all causes in the supreme court, shall prepare a printed abstract of the record in each case, in which they shall set forth the title of the cause, with the date of the filing of all the papers in the court below, and a brief statement of the contents of each pleading, and shall set forth fully the points of the pleadings or evidence, and the points relied upon for the reversal of the judgment or decree. The clerk of the court below shall also number each page of the transcript of the record, and appellants and plaintiffs in error shall refer to the same in the margin of the abstract in such manner that orders, pleadings, and evidence referred to in the abstract may be easily found in the record. They shall file with the clerk of this court, for the use of the appellee or defendants in error and judges of this court, five copies of such abstracts on or before the first day of the term, unless for good cause the time for filing abstracts shall be extended.

22. The defendant's counsel shall be permitted, if he is not satisfied with the abstract or abridgment by the plaintiff's counsel, to furnish each of the justices of this court with such further abstracts as he shall deem necessary to a full understanding of the merits of the case.

23. In case the appellant or plaintiff in error shall neglect to file abstracts in compliance with the rules of this court, the opposite party may file the abstracts and prepare the cause for a hearing ex parte, and have the costs taxed therefor, provided the appellant or plaintiff in error would have been entitled to have the cause heard at the same term, or the court may dismiss the appeal or writ of error.

24. If the abstracts filed shall not present the parts of the record to which reference is made in the assignment of errors, the appeal or writ of error may be dismissed.

25. The brief of the counsel for appellant or plaintiff in error shall contain a statement of the errors relied upon and the authorities to be used in the argument, and five copies thereof shall be filed with the clerk of this court on or before the first day of the term, unless for good cause shown the time shall be extended. One of the copies may be withdrawn by the counsel for appellee or defendant in error, and the others shall be for the use of the justices of the court.

26. Counsel for appellee or defendant in error shall also file with the clerk five copies of his brief for the use of the justices and the opposing party on or before the day next preceding the day on which the cause is to be heard, unless for good cause shown the time shall be extended.

27. In citing cases from published reports, the names of the parties as they appear in the title of the case, as well as the book and page, shall be given.

28. Counsel who have not complied with the rules in relation to briefs will not be heard.

DOCKETING AND HEARING.

29. Causes in which the United States or the territory is a party, and in which they have a direct interest in the decision, shall be placed at the head of the docket. All other cases shall be docketed and called for argument in the order in which the records shall have been filed with the clerk.

30. The civil docket shall be called numerically, and the causes shall be argued, continued, or otherwise disposed of, as they are called, unless for good cause shown they be placed at the foot of the docket. All unexpired rules will terminate upon the call of the cause for hearing; provided that, if the court shall give time to either party without the consent of the other, the cause shall not lose its precedence on the docket.

31. The call of the docket will commence on the third day of the term, and five cases per day will be subject to call. The abstract and brief of plaintiff in error or appellant must be filed as provided in these rules; and, in the event that either the abstract or brief is not filed within the prescribed time, the judgment or decree of the court below will, on the call of the docket, be affirmed. The defendant in error or appellee, in case he does not argue orally, can file a brief within five days after the time fixed for filing the brief of plaintiff in error or appellant, and the latter can have five days for a reply, at the expiration of which time the cause will stand for decision, and no further arguments will be received.

LICENSING ATTORNEYS.

32. Any practicing attorney of the district court will, on motion, be admitted to practice in this court; and any practicing attorney of any state or territory, having professional business in this court, may, on motion, be admitted upon taking the oath prescribed by law and upon the presentation of his certificate of admission in another court. All motions for the admission of attorneys must be presented to the court at the morning hour of its session, immediately before the call of the docket for the day. Each attorney, on being admitted, shall pay one dollar and a half to the clerk, who shall furnish such attorney a certificate of admission and a printed copy of the rules.

REMOVING RECORDS.

33. The papers filed in each cause shall be kept in a package, on which shall be indorsed the title and number,—the number on the package always corresponding with the number on the appearance docket, and with the number on the margin of the journal where the orders in such causes are entered. The clerk of the court is answerable for all records and papers belonging to his office and filed therein, and they shall not be taken from his custody unless by special order of the court; but the parties may have copies when desired, by paying the clerk therefor.

ORAL ARGUMENTS.

34. Oral argument will be heard on the calling of a cause upon the regular call of the docket on behalf of the appellant or plaintiff in error if he shall have complied with the rule in regard to filing abstracts and briefs, and on behalf of the appellee or defendant in error if he shall have filed his printed brief on or before the day preceding the calling of the cause. Where a cause shall be argued orally in behalf of either party, printed or written argument in addition to his brief will not be received from such party, unless the same shall have been filed within the time prescribed in this rule for filing of his printed brief.

35. Oral argument will not be heard on any motion, nor upon the rehearing of a cause, unless specially directed by the court.

36. The time allowed for each oral argument shall be restricted to one hour, unless otherwise specially permitted.

REHEARINGS—TIME AND MANNER OF APPLICATION.

37. The manner of applying for a rehearing shall be as follows: Within 30 days after an opinion is filed a party desiring a rehearing shall give actual notice in writing to the opposite party or to his attorney of his intention to make such application, and within 60 days after the filing of an opinion shall place on file in the clerk's office five printed copies of the petition.

38. Application for a rehearing of any cause shall be made by petition to the court, signed by counsel, briefly stating the grounds for a rehearing, and the authorities relied on in support thereof. When a rehearing is granted, notice shall be given to the opposite party of the time when such rehearing will be had.

REHEARING—SUPERSEDEAS—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS.

39. Any of the justices of this court may, in vacation, issue an order which shall operate as a supersedeas in any case which has been submitted to this court for hearing and judgment, whenever a reargument of the same shall, in their opinion, be advisable.

40. Where an opinion in any case is filed in vacation, and a petition for a rehearing shall be presented to either of the justices of this court, if he shall certify that there is probable ground for granting a rehearing all further proceedings authorized by the judgment of this court shall be stayed until the next term of the court.

41. Upon the affirmance of judgments executions may issue, at the option of the party, from this court, or, if such party so elect, a writ of procedendo shall be issued to the court below upon the payment by the successful party of the costs made by him in this court.

Adopted April 4, 1891.

OREGON.

Rule 1. The second day of October term shall be set apart as the time when persons desiring admission to practice as attorneys in the courts of this state may appear and present their applications; who, having been examined in open court touching their qualifications for admission, and found duly qualified, may be admitted to practice as attorneys and counselors in the several courts of this state. Application for such admission can only be made in this court.

Rule 2. Applicants for admission as attorneys shall be examined by the justices of the supreme court, or under their direction, and only such shall be admitted as shall appear duly learned in the common law, the law-merchant, the principles of equity jurisprudence, the history and the constitutional law of England prior to the Declaration of Independence, the history and constitutional law of the United States, the statute and constitutional law of this state, and the practical administration of the law.

Rule 3. Each applicant for admission to practice must produce the certificate of some attorney in good standing in this court that such applicant, if a graduate of some literary institution, has read law at least two years; or, if not such graduate, at least three years, and has the requisite learning and ability. There shall also be presented the certificate of two attorneys of like standing, to the effect that the applicant is a man of good moral character. In case, however, the applicant produce a diploma from any regular law school, showing that he has graduated at such school, then the certificate of his having read the time above specified shall be dispensed with. Such applicant shall also file his own affidavit that he is a citizen of the United States and of this state, and has read the books, a list of which shall be included in his affidavit.

Rule 4. Attorneys and counselors at law and solicitors in chancery that have been admitted to the bar of the supreme court or court of last resort of any other state, territory, or district governed by the common law, or of England, her colonies or dependencies, where the common law prevails, and that are otherwise qualified, may be admitted to the bar of this court on motion, founded upon proper certificates of admission to such courts, accompanied by a certificate, signed by the judge of some court of general jurisdiction in the county or political division in which the applicant last resided prior to his application, that he is of good moral character and standing at the bar, and has practiced law at least one year.

Rule 5. Every transcript on appeal to this court shall be on legal cap paper, not exceeding 12½ by 8½ inches in size, and written on one side only; shall be chronologically arranged, and prefaced with an index specifying the page of each separate paper, order, or proceeding. Manuscripts and testimony must be paged by numbering the leaves consecutively to the end, on the bottom of the leaf, near the left-hand corner. Transcripts must have the name of each paper written on the margin thereof, and each page of the testimony must have written on the left-hand margin, near the bottom, the name of the witness. The testimony must be preceded by an index, in which shall be noted the first page of the testimony of each witness. No case shall be docketed which fails to conform to the foregoing requirements. In case a motion to expunge a paper or papers from any transcript filed with the clerk of this court be granted, upon the grounds that such paper or papers are not properly a part of such transcript, the clerk of this court shall thereupon, or at any time when this court shall especially order it, separate such paper or papers from the transcript. He shall also be entitled to a fee of two dollars for so separating such papers, which sum shall be allowed as costs against the party filing the same. When the paper so ordered expunged is so connected that it cannot be expunged without mutilating the remaining part of the transcript, the court may require the party in fault, at his own expense, to file a new transcript, omitting the objectionable papers. The clerk, in taxing and allowing claims for disbursements for making transcripts, shall in all cases compute the number of folios in the judgment roll, and disallow all charges or claims for copies of papers that do not constitute a part of such roll, as defined by section 269 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Rule 6. The transcript shall be filed with the clerk of this court on or before the second day of the term next after perfecting the appeal.

Rule 7. When the appeal is perfected, and the transcript is not filed as required by rule 6, the same shall be deemed abandoned, and the respondent may, on motion, have the judgment or decree of the court below affirmed, by filing copies of the notice of appeal, and proof of service thereof, the undertaking, and the judgment entry.

Rule 8. The causes triable at Salem from each judicial district shall be docketed together, and the cases shall be placed on the docket in the following order, unless otherwise ordered: (1) Cases from the fourth district; (2) cases from the first district; (3) cases from the second district; (4) cases from the third district; (5) cases from the fifth district. All cases triable at Pendleton shall be placed on the docket and heard in the order directed by the court. Cases transferred from Salem to Pendleton, or vice versa, shall be placed on the docket, and heard at such time as the court may direct. The court may, in its discretion, direct any particular cause or causes to be advanced on the docket or heard at such special time as it may by order fix for that purpose.

Rule 9. Motions to dismiss appeals, to perfect transcripts, or to affirm the judgment in cases where the appeal has been abandoned, shall be filed at least ten days before the case is called for hearing, and notice thereof be given as prescribed in titles II. and III. of chapter VI. of the Civil Code: provided that, in all cases which come on for hearing before the end of the second week of the term, it shall be sufficient to file such notice on the third day of the term, when such motions shall be taken up on the first motion day thereafter. Notice of motions to extend the time for filing transcripts shall be served at least three days before the first day of the term.

Rule 10. Thesecond Monday of the term, and each Monday thereafter, shall be motion day, at which time, unless otherwise specially ordered, all motions which have been duly served shall be disposed of.

Rule 11. All applications for rehearing shall be by petition in writing, setting forth the grounds thereof, presented and filed within ten days after the judgment, order, or decision is announced, and within the term. No argument will be heard thereon.

Rule 12. Unless upon good cause otherwise ordered, the appellant, at least five days before the argument, shall furnish to the respondent a printed copy of his brief, and within three days thereafter the respondent shall furnish to the appellant a like copy of his brief. At least two days before the calling of the cause for argument each party shall furnish to the justices and to the reporter each two copies of his brief, and to the clerk one copy, to be filed with the record of the cause. In suits in equity, the briefs shall contain such portions of the evidence as may be deemed material, giving the names of the witnesses, and the number of the question and answer. A failure to furnish briefs as aforesaid shall be deemed a waiver of the right of the party in fault to argue the cause.

Rule 13. The page of the printed brief must be eight and one-half inches in length, five and one-half inches in width, and the outer blank margin of each page to be one and one-fourth inches wide; and the points or propositions of law, with the authorities cited to sustain them, must be separately stated from the argument. The points and authorities must be first distinctly stated, and the arguments set forth supplementary thereto. This rule shall take effect and be in force on the first day of the March term, A. D. 1889.

Rule 14. The mode of revision of final decisions of the circuit courts, where the course of proceeding is not specifically pointed out by the Civil Code, shall be by appeal, as in cases of appeal from judgments at law; and questions of fact shall not be considered upon such appeal, unless made a record in the form of a bill of exceptions.

Rule 15. No records or papers on file in the office of the clerk shall be taken therefrom except by order of the court or one of the justices: provided that, in cases pending and not yet submitted, the transcript or evidence may be withdrawn temporarily on filing a stipulation to that effect, signed by the attorneys of record in the case, and giving a receipt therefor.

Rule 16. The judgment roll which is to be brought into this court on appeal must be prepared in the manner directed by section 272, pp. 343, 344, Annotated Laws, and the papers constituting such roll must be annexed together in the chronological order of their filing, issuing, and entry, commencing with the complaint, each paper to appear in such judgment roll in the order of time when it was filed or made. Amended pleadings take the place of the originals, and in such case the originals must be omitted from the transcript. No writing or paper whatever must be sent up with the transcript except the evidence in equity cases, when it has been taken in writing, and is on file in the court below; and all certificates by the clerk must be omitted, except such as are required to authenticate the transcript. It is expected that the attorneys for the appellant in all cases will see that these directions are observed in the preparation of the transcript.

In force February 28, 1889.

For rules adopted November 4, 1885, see 9 Pac. Rep. iii.

WASHINGTON.

Rule 1. The clerk of the supreme court shall keep the following books and records: (1) Journal; (2) record of opinions; (3) appearance docket; (4) motion docket; (5) execution docket; (6) fee-book; (7) calendar of cases, one for each judge and one for the bar; (8) general index of cases. In addition to the foregoing, the said clerk shall keep books in which shall be stated proper accounts of all moneys received and disbursed.

Rule 2. PAPERS NOT TO BE TAKEN FROM CLERK'S OFFICE. No paper filed in the supreme court shall be taken from the court room or clerk's office, except by permission of the court or one of the justices, and when so taken a receipt in writing therefor must be left with the clerk. Permission to take papers will not be granted except to a party or his attorney who shall have entered a general appearance in the supreme court in the cause in which such paper is filed.

Rule 3. In all cases remanded, the clerk of the supreme court shall issue and transmit to the clerk of the superior court a remittitur; and, in all cases wherein the judgment, order, or decree of the superior court shall be reversed or modified, the remittitur shall be accompanied by a certified copy of the opinion of the supreme court in the case. Said remittitur shall be issued and transmitted at the expiration of thirty days from the rendering of the opinion, in cases where no petition for rehearing has been filed; and, in cases where such petition has been filed, then within ten days after the denial of said petition.

Rule 4. TRANSCRIPTS. Every transcript shall be plainly written or printed on paper of good quality, the size of legal cap, and be free from interlineations and erasures, and be duly paged, and prefixed with an alphabetical index to its contents, specifying the page of each separate paper, order, or proceeding, and of the testimony of each witness, and have at least one blank fly leaf. Every transcript consisting of more than fifty leaves shall be bound by the clerk of the supreme court, and the cost of binding taxed to the cause.

Rule 5. CLERK'S CERTIFICATE. Transcripts must be certified by the clerk of the superior court in substantially the following form:

STATE OF WASHINGTON, } ss.
 _____ County, }

I, _____, clerk of (title of court,) do hereby certify that the foregoing is a full, true, and correct transcript of so much of the record in the above-entitled cause as I am by statute required on appeal (or writ of error) to transmit to the supreme court.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and the seal of said superior court, this _____ day of _____, 189—.

[SEAL]

_____, Clerk.
 By _____, Deputy.

Rule 6. Transcripts shall be prepared by clerks of the superior courts within thirty days after the service and filing of the notices of appeal or writs of error, or if the appeal be taken under the act relating to the removal of causes, approved November 23, 1883, after the filing of notice of appeal. The transcript shall remain on file in the office of said clerk until the service and filing of all the briefs in the case, and one copy of each brief, with due proof of service, shall be filed with said clerk. The appellant or plaintiff in error shall have twenty days after the expiration of said thirty days in which to serve and file his brief. The appellee or defendant in error shall have twenty days thereafter in which to serve and file his brief, and the appellant or plaintiff in error shall have ten days thereafter in which to serve and file a reply brief. After the time for filing briefs shall have expired, it shall be the duty of the clerk to immediately transmit the record and briefs filed to the clerk of the supreme court. In cases in which a bill of exceptions or statement of facts is settled, the appellant or plaintiff in error shall have thirty days after such settlement in which to serve and file brief, and the remaining briefs shall be served and filed thereafter within the time herein limited.

Rule 7. For the purpose of hearings in the supreme court, the state shall be divided into twelve divisions, to be designated by number, as follows:

Number One. Composed of the counties of Spokane and Stevens.

Number Two. The counties of Lincoln, Douglas, Okanogan, and Adams.

Number Nine. The county of Pierce.

Number Eleven. The counties of Jefferson, Island, Kitsap, San Juan, and Clallam.

Number Twelve. The counties of Whatcom, Skagit, and Snohomish.

Rule 8. Cases from the several divisions shall be heard at the sessions of court commencing on the second Mondays of January, May, and October of each year, in the order of divisions, commencing with division number one. Cases from each division shall be assigned for argument on particular days, and assignments shall be made at least one week in advance of hearings. All cases from divisions for which assignments are being made in which transcripts have been on file more than one week before the time of making the assignments shall be thus assigned during each session. The court will disregard divisions and advance causes for argument when the public interests shall require.

Rule 9. If the appellant or plaintiff in error shall fail to cause a transcript to be prepared and to serve and file a brief as provided in rule six, the appellee or defendant in error may file a certified copy of the order or judgment appealed from, and of the notice served or the entries of record of appeal taken, and on motion have the appeal or writ of error dismissed, or the judgment or order appealed from confirmed: provided, that when the failure to prepare transcript, or file or serve briefs, is owing to the failure or omission of the clerk, or other circumstances over which appellant or plaintiff in error had no control, the court shall not dismiss the cause or affirm the judgment as herein provided, but shall fix such time for hearing the same as shall insure a fair trial: And provided, further, that the appellant or plaintiff in error, or his attorney, shall have ten days' notice of any motion to dismiss or affirm under this rule. In cases appealed to this court since the last term of the supreme court of Washington territory, and in which no transcripts or briefs have been filed, parties shall have the time fixed by rule six in which to cause transcripts to be prepared, and in which to serve and file briefs.

Rule 10. NO ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS IN APPEAL CASES. In cases appealed under the provisions of the act relating to the removal of causes to the supreme court (approved November 23, 1883) no assignment of errors or specifications of grievances shall be required, and the parties shall be heard as to all points, questions, and propositions stated or discussed in their briefs, but they shall not be entitled to be heard upon any point, question, or proposition not disclosed in their briefs: provided, that the objections that the court has no jurisdiction of the cause, and that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, may be made at any stage of the proceedings.

Rule 11. OMISSIONS. If any paper or part of the record has been omitted from the transcript in any case, such omission may be supplied at any time before the cause is assigned for hearing, by any party, without leave, by filing a properly certified transcript of such paper or part of the record.

Rule 12. MOTIONS. All motions in the supreme court must be in writing, and filed with the clerk, and served upon the adverse party or his attorney, unless service thereof be waived. All motions for rule on the clerk to perfect transcripts, for leave to amend notices of appeal or writ of error, the proof of service thereof, or certificate of the clerk or judge, to the transcript, must be filed on or before the day when, according to rule eight, the business for the particular division is reached for disposition, and not afterwards, unless by leave of the court the time be extended.

Rule 13. BRIEFS TO BE FURNISHED. In all cases to be argued, each party must furnish to the court and opposite party printed briefs, printed throughout, except headings, in small pica type. Said briefs shall contain—First, a statement of the case so far as deemed material by the party, with reference to the pages of the record for verification; second, the pleadings in the action on which the trial was had; third, points of law and authorities. The pleadings need not be inserted except in the brief of the appellant or plaintiff in error. The points must be concisely and separately stated, and in citing authorities the names of volumes and titles of cases must be set out; and, if text-books of which more than one edition has been published are cited, the number of the edition must be specified. One copy of each brief must be served upon the adverse party or his attorney. Fifteen copies shall be deposited with the clerk of the supreme court, one of which shall be filed in the case and the remainder safely kept to be disposed of as this court may direct.

Rule 14. DIMENSIONS OF BRIEFS. Briefs required by the preceding rule must be of the following dimensions, to-wit: 8½ inches from top to bottom; 6½ inches from edge to edge, inclusive of the margin, which must be 1½ inches at the top, bottom, and outer edges of each printed page. The title of the cause and indorsements must be on the front cover and the first page in full, but not elsewhere repeated.

Rule 15. TECHNICAL OBJECTIONS TO HEARING ON MERITS. Exceptions or objections to transcript, bonds, notices of appeal, or writs of error, or the service thereof, or to writs of error or the return thereof, and all technical exceptions or objections to the record tending to prevent the hearing of a cause upon its merits, must be taken and plainly stated in the printed briefs of appellees or defendants in error, or the same will not be regarded; and, when so taken and specified, appellants and plaintiffs in error must present and file such additional or amended record, certificate, affidavit, or other matter, if such there be, as shall be required to remove or answer the exception or objection so taken, within the time allowed, for filing a reply brief, unless further time be granted by the court, for cause shown.

Rule 16. ARGUMENTS. No more than two counsel on a side will be heard upon the argument of any question, unless the court shall direct otherwise: provided, that each party who has appeared separately and by different counsel in the superior court shall, if he so desire, be heard through his own counsel. The counsel for the appellant or plaintiff in error shall be entitled to open and close the argument upon the merits in all cases. In argument of motions and all preliminary or collateral matters, the counsel for the party having the affirmative of the issue shall open and close. Arguments upon the merits shall be limited to two hours upon a side, and all arguments to one-half hour upon a side, unless an extension of time be obtained from the court before the argument is commenced.

Rule 17. OPINIONS TO BE RECORDED. All opinions of the court shall be recorded by the clerk in a well-bound volume, and the original filed with the papers in the case, and shall not be furnished by the clerk for publication until a copy, in print or type-writing, has been furnished the judge rendering the same and been by him revised.

Rule 18. Every petition for rehearing must be filed within thirty days after the opinion shall have been rendered; and no more than one petition for a rehearing of the same question shall be filed: provided, that the court may, in its discretion, allow any petition to be amended. The filing of a petition for rehearing shall suspend the decision of the court until a ruling thereon.

Rule 19. SPECIAL APPEARANCES. Any party to a cause pending in the supreme court who shall, in person or by attorney, file a brief, or any paper, in the cause, without at the same time, affirmatively, by written notice to the opposite party or the court, make a limited or special appearance in the cause, shall be held to have entered a general appearance in the supreme court, and to have waived all objections to the jurisdictional process.

Rule 20. EXPENSE OF BRIEFS TO BE TAXED AS COSTS. The necessary expense of printing briefs of the prevailing party shall be taxed as other costs.

Rule 21. The foregoing rules shall apply to criminal as well as civil cases, except that in criminal cases transcripts shall be filed within the time prescribed by the statutes in force at the time the cause shall be appealed or the writ of error taken. The appellant or plaintiff in error shall serve his brief and file it in this court within the same time. The answering brief shall be served and filed within twenty days after the expiration of said time, and reply briefs, if any, shall be served and filed within fifteen days after service of the answering brief, and such cases shall not be assigned for hearing without consent until the reply briefs are filed, or until expiration of time allowed therefor.

Adopted February 3, 1890. To go into effect March 17, 1890.

WYOMING.

Rule 1. SESSIONS OF COURT. Regular public sessions of the court during each term shall be held at the capitol, commencing at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes P. M., and closing at 5 o'clock P. M., unless otherwise specially ordered in stated cases.

Rule 2. CLERK. The clerk of the court shall reside and keep his office at the capitol, and shall not practice as an attorney or counselor in this or any other court while he continues to be such clerk.

Rule 3. DUTIES OF CLERK. The clerk shall keep a record of all proceedings of the court, and shall perform all other duties pertaining to his office. He shall promptly announce by letter any decision rendered to one of the attorneys of each side when such attorneys are not in attendance at the time the decision is made.

Rule 4. WITHDRAWING RECORDS. No original record or paper pertaining to any cause shall be taken from the clerk's office without an order from the court or one of the justices thereof. Neither party shall be permitted to so take any record or paper during the time within which the other party is permitted to prepare his brief; and in no case shall any record or paper be kept from the clerk's office for more than 30 days by either of the parties.

Rule 5. TRIAL DOCKET. Ten days before each term the clerk shall prepare a trial docket for the court, wherein shall be entered all causes which have matured prior thereto, under these rules. All such causes shall be entered in the trial docket, and be heard in the following order:

First. Causes involving priorities of right to the use of water.

Second. Criminal causes.

Third. Causes originally begun in the supreme court.

Fourth. All other causes.

Rule 6. TIME OF HEARING CAUSES. Civil proceedings on error maturing after the making of the trial docket shall not stand for hearing at that term, except by the consent of the parties thereto. All other causes maturing after the making of the trial docket may, in the discretion of the court, be ordered upon the trial docket at any time after the same have matured. A cause shall be considered "matured" when the briefs of both parties have been filed and served, or when the time limited therefor has expired.

Rule 7. SUBMISSION UPON BRIEFS. Counsel for either or all of the parties, when wishing to submit a cause upon briefs, may avoid the inconvenience of personal attendance at court by filing a written direction with the clerk to so submit upon their behalf.

Rule 8. ORAL ARGUMENT. In oral argument counsel for the party holding the affirmative shall be entitled to the opening and closing, and in the opening he shall present all points and authorities upon which he relies. Counsel opposed shall then be heard, and shall present all points and authorities upon which he relies, and counsel for the party holding the affirmative shall then conclude. Counsel upon each side may occupy not exceeding 90 minutes in the argument, except where otherwise limited or extended before the argument is commenced.

Rule 9. MOTIONS. All motions submitted to the court shall be in writing, and notice thereof, except in case of petitions for rehearing, shall be served on the adverse party or his attorney of record at least one day before the hearing of such motion.

Rule 10. DOCKET-FEE. The plaintiff in error shall, at the time of filing the record in this court, deposit with the clerk the sum of $10, to apply on costs.

Rule 11. PETITION IN ERROR AND TRANSCRIPT. The petition in error shall distinctly set forth each of the errors complained of; and with such petition shall be filed a transcript of so much of the record, proceedings, evidence, rulings, and exceptions in the court below as shall be necessary to exhibit the errors relied upon. The clerk of the court below shall arrange the several parts of the record in chronological order.

Rule 12. REQUISITES OF TRANSCRIPT. The transcript shall be printed or legibly written, and before the same is filed the pages thereof shall be consecutively numbered, and the lines upon each page shall also be separately and consecutively numbered. For non-compliance with this rule a cause may be dismissed.

Rule 13. MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL. Nothing which could have been properly assigned as a ground for a new trial in the court below will be considered in this court, unless it shall appear that the same was properly presented to the court below by a motion for a new trial, and that such motion was overruled and exception was at the time reserved to such ruling, all of which shall be embraced in the bill of exceptions. The ruling of the court below upon each matter presented by a motion for a new trial shall be sufficiently questioned in this court by an assignment that the court below erred in overruling such motion for a new trial.

Rule 14. BRIEFS REQUIRED. Except as otherwise provided in rule 19, briefs shall be filed and served in all causes, and all briefs shall be printed or type-written. Each brief shall contain a statement of the points and authorities relied upon, and shall refer specifically to the page and portion of the record where the question under discussion arises.

Rule 15. TIME FOR FILING BRIEFS. Within 60 days after filing his petition in error the plaintiff in error shall file with the clerk six copies of his brief, and shall at the same time serve upon or mail to the opposite party, or his attorney of record, one other copy of such brief; and within 45 days thereafter the defendant in error shall file with the clerk of the court six copies of his brief, and shall, at the same time, serve upon or mail to the opposite party, or his attorney of record, one other copy of such brief.

Rule 16. SERVICE UPON ATTORNEY GENERAL. In all causes, both criminal and civil, in which the state is a party, or in which any of its property is involved, counsel shall also serve a copy of their brief upon the attorney general.

Rule 17. CRIMINAL CAUSES. In all criminal causes briefs shall be filed and served by the plaintiff in error within 30 days after the filing of the transcript, and by the defendant in error within 30 days thereafter.

Rule 18. RESERVED CASES. In cases reserved in the district court, and certified to the supreme court for decision, briefs shall be filed and served by the party holding the affirmative within 20 days after the papers are filed in the supreme court, and by the other party within 20 days thereafter.

Rule 19. ORIGINAL CAUSES. In all cases originally begun in the supreme court the matter of requiring briefs and the time of filing the same shall be fixed by the court or a justice thereof when the case is commenced.

Rule 20. EXTENSION OF TIME. By consent of parties, or for good cause shown before the expiration of the time allowed, the court, or a justice thereof in vacation, may extend the time for filing briefs.

Rule 21. FAILURE TO FILE BRIEFS. When the plaintiff in error, or party holding the affirmative, has failed to file and serve his brief as required by these rules, the defendant in error, or party holding the negative, may have the cause dismissed, or may submit it with or without oral argument. When the defendant in error, or party holding the negative, has failed to file and serve his brief as is required by these rules, and the brief of the plaintiff in error, or party holding the affirmative, has been duly filed and served within the time required, the plaintiff in error, or party holding the affirmative, may submit the cause with or without oral argument, and the other party shall not be heard. A cause will be placed on the trial docket at any time for the purpose of enforcing this rule.

Rule 22. DECISIONS. No cause shall be considered decided until the written opinion of the court is filed with the clerk.

Rule 23. APPLICATION FOR REHEARING. Application for rehearing of any cause shall be by petition to the court, signed by counsel, briefly stating the points wherein it is alleged that the court has erred. Such petition shall be filed within thirty days after the decision is rendered, and shall be accompanied by a brief of the points and authorities relied upon in support thereof.

Rule 24. APPLICATION SUSPENDS PROCEEDINGS. The filing of the petition for rehearing within the time aforesaid shall suspend proceedings under the decision until the petition is disposed of, unless the court, or one of the justices in vacation, shall otherwise order.

Rule 25. REHEARING. When a rehearing is granted, the cause shall be placed for hearing at the foot of the trial docket. The other party, in all such cases, shall have 15 days from the time of granting the rehearing in which to answer the petition and brief of the petitioner. Oral argument will be permitted as in other cases.

Rule 26. MANDATE. Upon the determination of the petition for rehearing, or if within 30 days after the decision no petition for rehearing is filed, a special mandate shall issue to the court below, as the cause may require, for execution therein.

Rule 27. COST OF PRINTING. If the transcript is printed, or if a printed brief is filed and served in conformity to the rules of this court, it shall be the duty of the clerk, unless otherwise ordered, to tax a printer's fee, at the rate of one dollar for every four hundred words embraced in such transcript or brief, against the unsuccessful party not furnishing the same, to be collected and paid to the successful party as other costs.

Rule 28. PENDING CAUSES. These rules shall apply to all pending causes not heretofore submitted, and in any cause now pending a non-compliance with former rules shall be cured by a compliance with these rules.

Rule 29. HABEAS CORPUS, MANDAMUS, QUO WARRANTO, ETC. In any application made to the court for a writ of habeas corpus, mandamus, quo warranto, or for any prerogative writ to be issued in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, and for which an application might have been lawfully made to some other court in the first instance, the petition shall, in addition to the necessary matter requisite by the rules of law to support the application, also set forth the circumstances which, in the opinion of the applicant, render it necessary or proper that the writ should issue originally from this court, and not from such other court, and the sufficiency or insufficiency of such circumstances so set forth in that behalf will be determined by the court in awarding or refusing the application. In case any court, justice, or other officer, or any board or other tribunal, in the discharge of duties of a public character, be named in the application as respondent, the petition shall also disclose the name or names of the real party or parties, if any, in interest, or whose interest would be directly affected by the proceedings; and in such case it shall be the duty of the applicant obtaining an order for any such writ to serve or cause to be served upon such party or parties in interest a true copy of the petition and of the writ issued thereon, and to file in the office of the clerk of this court evidence of such service.

Rule 30. COMMITTEE ON ADMISSIONS. On the first day of each term a committee of three members of the bar of this court shall be appointed, to whom shall be referred all applications during such term for admission to practice as attorneys and counselors of this court. For the information of the court, such committee shall ascertain by careful examination and investigation, and report upon, the moral character and learning of each applicant; such report to be in writing.

Rule 31. RESTRICTION ON ADMISSION. No person shall be admitted to practice as an attorney or counselor upon evidence that he has been admitted to the bar of another state or territory, if at the time of his admission to the bar of such state or territory he was a citizen of this state.

Rule 32. REQUISITES FOR ADMISSION. No person shall be admitted to practice as an attorney or counselor who shall not first have taken and subscribed an oath that he is a citizen of this state; also that he will commence the practice of law herein within three months from the date hereof, and make the same his permanent and usual occupation. The fee of the clerk for filing such oath and entering the name of such person upon the record and issuing a license shall be three dollars, and the same shall be paid to the clerk before the application will be referred to the committee on admissions.

Rule 33. IN FORCE. The foregoing rules are the only rules now in force, and all rules adopted prior to February 20, 1891, are hereby rescinded.

Adopted February 20, 1891.

FLORENCE, E. & W. V. R. Co. v. PEMBER.
(Supreme Court of Kansas. March 7, 1891.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—ELEMENTS OF DAMAGE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. "In assessing damages done to land by reason of the appropriation of a right of way through it for a railroad, the liability of teams being frightened, or that additional care by the landowner may be necessary in the future as to such teams, by reason of the proximity of the railroad, does not of itself constitute any basis for special compensation. Such damages are speculative, and not the proper subject of inquiry and damage." Railroad Co. v. Lyon, 24 Kan. 745.

2. In an action for damages in a railroad right-of-way case, it is not error to permit the following question: "State what this land was worth just after the line was taken by the railroad as a whole tract, taking into consideration the damages the railroad done the land."

3. The instructions of the trial court are the law of the case, for the jury to obey and follow. A finding against the instructions of the court cannot constitute any portion of a judgment. Railroad Co. v. Hutchinson, 40 Kan. 51, 19 Pac. Rep. 312.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Cowley county; M. G. TROUP, Judge.

Geo. R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robert Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. McDermott & Johnson, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. This was an appeal from right-of-way condemnation proceedings. It was tried in the district court of Cowley county before a jury, January 4, 1888, resulting in a verdict for the defendant for the sum of $1,470. Motion for new trial was overruled, and the plaintiff brings the case here for review.

The first error complained of arose out of the action of the court in refusing to withdraw certain evidence from the jury. The plaintiff was asked the following question: "What other inconvenience arises from the cultivation of the land on the west side of the railroad? Answer. It is very inconvenient in regard to my teams; it frightens my teams to cultivate up close to the railroad." Again, a witness for the plaintiff was asked as follows: "Question. You may state what inconvenience the location of this railroad causes him in the use of his farm. Answer. Another thing, in crossing the road, if you drive your team up there, you have got these gates to open, and leave your team standing while you are doing it. His horses are generally like mine; he cannot leave them standing safely, and get off and open the gates." The defendant moved the court to withdraw the above answers from the jury, because the matter to which they relate was not a proper subject of damage, and could not be considered in the estimate of damages in the case. This was refused by the court. The question raised on this assignment has already been settled by this court in favor of the plaintiff. Railroad Co. v. Lyon, 24 Kan. 745. But as the findings of the court determine the exact amount of damage awarded the defendant, on account of the matter raised by this evidence, it becomes the duty of the court to modify the judgment to that extent, and let the balance of the judgment, so far as this assignment is concerned, stand.

The second assignment of error relates to the admission of evidence. A witness for the plaintiff was asked the following questions: "Question. State what this land was worth just after the line was taken by the railroad as a whole tract. Answer. Taking into consideration the damages the railroad done the land? Q. Yes, sir. A. I couldn't only put my own estimate upon it. Q. What is that? (Defendant objects to this as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and calling for a conclusion of the witness, which objection was overruled, and defendant excepted.) A. $4,500." This court is of the opinion that the question here complained of was a proper one. We think, from an examination of the evidence before and after this question, that the use of the word "worth" in the question was treated by all parties on the trial as equivalent to "value," "market value." There was no objection to its use at any time, and it seems to have been employed constantly throughout the trial.

In the third complaint, the plaintiff alleges that the jury did not obey the instructions of the court. The court instructed the jury that the plaintiff had introduced testimony tending to show that the right of way left a wedge-shaped strip of land on the east side of the railroad, and that by reason thereof the real estate was worth less, and had introduced testimony tending to show that, by reason of the taking of the right of way by the defendant through plaintiff's land, he had been damaged by having his land cut into two pieces, and having gates to open and close that he did not have before; and then added: "But he has not introduced testimony to prove the amount of such damages. The burden of proof of damages by reason thereof is upon the plaintiff, and, in the absence of testimony as to the amount of such damages which the plaintiff has sustained by reason thereof, you will be justified in finding only nominal damages therefor." The jury should have obeyed the instructions of the court respecting this item of damage. Railroad Co. v. Hutchinson, 40 Kan. 51, 19 Pac. Rep. 312. This item of damage, $60, as found by the jury, will be stricken out. We also think this item should be deducted from the amount of the judgment, because it is apparent that it was included in the amount found in the seventeenth finding by the jury. In this finding the jury return $743 damage by reason of the railroad passing between the house of the plaintiff below and the public highway. It was this fact that rendered the gates necessary, and resulted in whatever damage was or may be suffered by reason of opening and shutting the same. It is recommended that the judgment in this case be modified by reducing the same to $1,350, and that the costs be divided between the plaintiff and defendant, each paying one-half thereof.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

HEIL V. REDDEN.

RECORD OF DEED—INSUFFICIENT ACKNOWLEDGMENT—EVIDENCE.

Where, on the trial of an action in ejectment, the record of a deed was offered in evidence, purporting to have been made and signed by George H. Case, but the certificate of acknowledgment was to the effect that the execution of the instrument was the act of George H. Crane; and there was evidence that the original deed was not in possession or under the control of the party offering the same; and there is further evidence from the grantee named in the deed that the acknowledging officer, grantor, and attesting witness were dead; and that he was present at the time the deed was executed by George H. Case, and was cognizant of such fact,—held, that the record of such deed was admissible in evidence, notwithstanding the apparent error in the certificate of acknowledgment.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

H. C. Root, for plaintiff in error. A. L. Redden and H. H. Harris, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This was an action of ejectment brought by Joseph W. Redden, in the district court of Shawnee county, against Joseph P. Heil, to recover the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 11, township 13, of range 16 E. The court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the quarter section, and awarded the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ to the defendant; and the case was brought to this court and decided, and the opinion is found in 38 Kan. 255, 16 Pac. Rep. 743. This court decided that the tax-deed which Heil held, and under which title was claimed to the N. E. 40 acres of the quarter section, was voidable, for the reason that the whole quarter was assessed and taxed as an entirety, and taxes were paid upon one-half of the land, and then upon one-half of the residue, and the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ was sold by the county treasurer for the balance of the taxes unpaid. When the case was again tried in the district court, it was stipulated that the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ and the S. E. 40 of the quarter section belonged to Heil, which left still in controversy the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 11, township 13, of range 16. In the last trial in the court below judgment was rendered awarding this land to Redden, upon the payment of certain taxes, and the plaintiff in error again brings this case here for review. The record discloses the same state of facts as to the tax sale and deed for the land in question as at the former trial in the district court. The plaintiff in error's claim of title is based upon a tax-deed which has been held to be defective, and two years' possession under such deed. The defendant in error claims to be the owner of the patent title, which consists of a patent from the United States to George H. Case, and a deed from Case to Benjamin Hoyt, and a quitclaim deed from Hoyt to him. It seems to be conceded that the legal title to this land is in the defendant in error, if the deed from Case to Hoyt was properly received in evidence upon the last trial of this case. This deed was not in the possession of the plaintiff below, and the record was introduced, which showed that it was made and executed by George H. Case, but, from the record of the certificate of the notary public, it appeared that George H. Crane acknowledged the execution of the instrument. The deed was executed and acknowledged on the 24th day of December, 1857, and filed for record on the 9th day of January, 1858. It was in evidence that George H. Case, John Shannon, the notary public, and A. B. Batterson, the attesting witness, were dead. Benjamin Hoyt, the grantee in this deed, testified that he formerly owned this land; that he purchased it from George H. Case, who executed and acknowledged the deed in question; that he never bought but one tract of land from Case, and did not know George H. Crane, and never had any dealings with him; and that he was present when the deed was executed. The only question in this case is whether there was any evidence offered upon the part of the plaintiff below to prove that George H. Case executed a deed to Benjamin Hoyt. The deed not being in the possession of the plaintiff below, it was competent for the court to receive the record in evidence. This record showed that the deed was made and executed by George H. Case, but it appeared from the record of the certificate of acknowledgment that George H. Crane acknowledged its execution before the notary public. This apparent error in the record is explained by the testimony of the grantee, who was present at the time the deed was executed and acknowledged. It was doubtless a clerical error in transcribing the original deed. Now, the evidence indicated quite conclusively that the deed was not in the possession of the plaintiff below, or under the control of the grantee, Hoyt, and it was perfectly competent to prove its execution by the best obtainable evidence, which was the testimony of the grantee named in the conveyance, and from his evidence it appears that this instrument was actually executed by George H. Case. This, in our opinion, settles the question of the execution of the deed, and makes the acknowledgment immaterial. Railway Co. v. Houseman, 41 Kan. 300, 21 Pac. Rep. 284. The position of counsel that there was no evidence that the deed was ever delivered is not well taken; it was recorded, and that fact carries with it the presumption that there was a delivery to the grantee. 1 Devl. Deeds, § 292. The contention of counsel for plaintiff in error that parol evidence cannot be admitted to contradict what a record imports, has no application in this case. We think it fair to assume, under the existing state of facts as shown in this case, that there was simply an error upon the part of either the notary or the person recording the deed,—nothing more; and, the execution of the deed having been proven, it was immaterial what the record of the certificate of acknowledgment was. In any event, the grantee, or any person holding under him, would not be bound by the errors of a register of deeds in transcribing an instrument, and such errors might be explained. 1 Devl. Deeds, §§ 686, 687; Poplin v. Mundell, 27 Kan. 138; Lee v. Birmingham, 30 Kan. 312, 1 Pac. Rep. 78. Acknowledging officers and registers of deeds are ministerial officers; neither act in a judicial capacity; any and all mistakes made by them may be explained and corrected by proper proof, as readily as mistakes of any other ministerial officers. Rank v. Copeland, 18 Md. 305; 1 Devl. Deeds, § 498. We recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CONVERSION—WAIVER OF TORT—RES ADJUDICATA.

1. When the plaintiff in an action has converted certain property of the defendant's to his own use, the defendant may waive the tort, and claim the value of the property converted as a counter-claim, if growing out of the same transaction, or plead it as a set-off, and recover on the implied promise.

2. A judgment in an action of forcible entry and detainer is not a bar to an after-action between the same parties, wherein the issue is not the right to the immediate possession of property, but the value of property alleged to have been converted.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

F. G. Hentig and E. A. Austin, for plaintiff in error. Hasen & Isenhardt, for defendants in error.

SIMPSON, C. Delaher sued Gehre, the principal, and Klauer, the surety, before a justice of the peace, on a written undertaking that reads as follows: "State of Kansas, county of Shawnee—ss.: Know all men by these presents, that we, Adam Gehre, of the county of Shawnee, state of Kansas, as principal, and Herman A. Klauer, of the same county and state, as surety, are held and firmly bound unto J. R. Delaher, of the same county and state, his heirs and assigns. Dated this 17th day of January, A. D. 1887. The conditions of the above obligation are such that, whereas, H. S. Clark, a justice of the peace for the city of Topeka, Kansas, Shawnee county, did render a judgment in the case of J. R. Delaher v. Adam Gehre, decreeing that the possession of the following premises, to-wit, 8 by 80 feet of ground in the south-east corner of lot No. 170, on Eighth street east, in the city of Topeka, Shawnee county, Kansas, should be delivered unto the said J. R. Delaher; and, whereas, the said Gehre has applied for and obtained a writ of error to the district court of Shawnee county, Kansas, in said case, and a stay of execution therein: Now, therefore, if the above-bounden Adam Gehre and his surety shall not commit or suffer to be committed any waste thereof, and shall pay double the value of the use and occupation of the property from date of this undertaking until its delivery, and all damages and costs that may be awarded against him in case the judgment be affirmed, then this obligation to be in full force and effect; otherwise to be and remain null and void. Dated and signed this 17th day of January, 1887. A. GEHRE. HERMAN A. KLAUER." The case was tried and verdict had before the justice, and an appeal taken to the district court. A jury was waived, and the case tried by the court, who made the following written findings of fact and conclusions of law:

Findings of fact: "(1) That the undertaking on which this action is founded was duly made and filed in this court January 17, 1887. (2) That the petition in error described in plaintiff's petition was affirmed by this court January 27, 1887. (3) That the defendant retained possession of the premises in question up to and including February 25, 1887. (4) That the rental value of the premises, including land and building thereon, from January 17, 1887, to February 25, 1887, both days inclusive, was $10 per month or for 36 days, was $12.00. (5) That the rental value of the land without the building was $4 per month. (6) That the rental value of the building exclusive of the land was $6 per month for the same time. (7) That the value of the services of plaintiff's attorneys rendered in the district court in connection with the petition in error described in plaintiff's petition was $15.00. (8) That the plaintiff, J. R. Delaher, had leased the ground described in his petition, together with other ground, from C. K. Holliday, for a term of years, and that Holliday was and is the owner of said ground. (9) That after plaintiff, J. R. Delaher, had leased the ground from Holliday, Delsher entered into a contract with J. Heller, by which Delsher agreed to rent the ground described in plaintiff's petition to Heller for four years, and Heller was to pay him for the use of the ground $4 per month, and have the privilege of putting up a shop on said ground; and Delsher agreed to pay Heller for his shop the cost price, if he, Heller, at any time wanted to quit the business there; that after Delsher and Heller had made this contract the rent was reduced by Delsher to $3.50 per month, and when Heller sold to Gehre it was agreed between the parties that Gehre was to pay Delsher the original contract price; that they agreed to make a written lease in accordance with the above facts, but it was neglected, and never drawn up. (10) That Heller built a shop upon said ground of the value of $125, and, after running a butcher shop there for some months, became sick, and unable to continue in the business; that Heller then sold out all his interest in said building, together with his butcher shop, to the defendant Adam Gehre, and Gehre paid the full value of said building; that Delsher was notified by Heller that he, Heller, had sold out to Gehre, and Delsher was satisfied with the sale, but said that Gehre must pay him $4 per month for the use of the ground; that Gehre took possession of said building, and built an addition thereto of 10 feet, with the knowledge and consent of Delsher, who was doing business at the next door to Gehre. (11) That after Gehre had been doing business for about — months, and had paid $4 per month for rent, Delsher notified him that he must pay $15 per month, instead of $4; that on the same day that Delsher notified Gehre that he must pay $15 per month he served upon him a 30-days notice to quit the premises; that Delsher did not raise the rent for the purpose of having Gehre pay it, but for the purpose of driving him out; that when the month's rent became due, Gehre tendered Delsher $4; that at the end of the second month he tendered him $8 rent, but Delsher refused to receive it, and Gehre never did pay any further rent for the reason last stated. (12) That Delsher commenced an action January 8, 1887, before H. S. CLARK, a justice of the peace, to recover possession of said premises against Gehre, for forcible entry and detainer; that judgment was rendered for Delsher and against Gehre for possession of said premises January 14, 1887; that Gehre attempted to take the case to the district court on error, but on account of irregularity in the proceedings the judgment was affirmed January 24, 1887. (13) That during the time the case was pending, and after the affirmance of the judgment in the district court, Gehre desired and offered to remove the building from said premises, but Delsher refused to let him remove it, and he was prevented from so doing by Delsher; that, after the decision of the case in the district court, Delsher took forcible possession of said building, and immediately opened a butcher shop in it himself. (14) That Gehre has been deprived of the use of said building by Delsher; that Delsher continued to occupy said building for a short time, when he sold said building, and has appropriated the money to his own use. (15) That the reasonable value of said building during all of the time since its completion is $125, and it was worth that at the time Delsher took possession thereof; that the material in the building for the purpose of taking it off the premises was of the value of $25. (16) That Delsher has never paid Gehre anything for said building, and that all of the foregoing facts occurred long prior to the expiration of four years from the time Heller made the contract with Delsher. (17) That Gehre acted in good faith at the time he bought from Heller, and Heller acted in good faith at the time he sold to Gehre, and at the time Gehre bought and went into possession of said building he believed he could stay there for the unexpired time of the four years under which Heller was occupying it; that at the time Gehre went into said building Delsher received and treated him the same as he had Heller; and the evidence in this case shows no excuse for Delsher wanting Gehre out, except to start a butcher shop in the same building himself. (18) That Delsher had no talk with Gehre, or in the presence of Gehre, prior to the sale of Heller to Gehre, and that the conditions of the lease between Delsher and Heller were not mentioned by Delsher to Gehre, nor by Heller to Gehre in Delsher's presence. (19) That an execution for the possession of the property and costs mentioned in the bond sued upon in this case was issued on said judgment by the justice of the peace February 25, 1887, and placed in the hands of the constable, and that the defendant Gehre paid said costs to the constable, but failed and neglected to give up the key to said premises. (20) That the plaintiff, Delsher, purchased a new lock for the door of said building, at an expense of $1.25, to replace lock broken by plaintiff in making entry of the building. (21) That November 10, 1886, the plaintiff served upon the defendant the following notice, to-wit: 'A. Gehre: You are hereby notified to quit the following premises, to-wit: The east 8 by 30 feet of lot 170 on Eighth avenue east in the city of Topeka, Kansas, now held by you as my tenant thereof, thirty (30) days herefrom. Nov. 10th, 1886. J. R. DEISHER.' (22) That December 29, 1886, the plaintiff served upon the defendant the following notice, to-wit: 'To A. Gehre: You are hereby notified and required to forthwith leave the premises hereinafter described, to-wit: The 8 by 30 feet of the south-east corner of lot No. 170, on East Eighth street, in the city of Topeka, Shawnee county, Kansas, for the possession of which premises an action is about to be brought by me. Dec. 29th, 1886. J. R. DEISHER.'

Conclusions of law: "(1) That the plaintiff, J. R. Delsher, is entitled to recover from the defendant Adam Gehre, on account of the bond sued on for rent, double the rental value of said rent as described in conclusion of fact No. 4, to-wit, $24. (2) That, inasmuch as the action for forcible entry and detainer commenced before the justice of the peace by plaintiff against defendant, as described in conclusion of fact No. 12, did not determine or settle any controversy between the parties, except the right of possession, and the building situated on said premises was personal property, the plaintiff is liable to the defendant Adam Gehre for the value of said building standing on the premises, to-wit, $125; and that the amount found due to plaintiff on account of rent from Adam Gehre, to-wit, $24, be deducted from said sum of $125, and that the defendant Adam Gehre should have judgment against plaintiff for the balance, to-wit, $101. (3) That the plaintiff is not entitled to recover against the defendant on account of attorney's fee for legal services described in conclusion of fact No. 7. (4) That, inasmuch as the plaintiff broke the lock in making an entry of the building, he is not entitled to recover from the defendant for the lock described in conclusion of fact No. 20."

A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and the case is properly here for review.

1. The first complaint made by the plaintiff in error is that the evidence and finding of the court that this plaintiff in error had taken possession of a building belonging to the defendant in error and converted the same to his own use is neither a counter-claim nor a set-off under the Code, and ought not to have been proved or allowed; that it did not arise out of the contract sued on, nor was it connected with the subject of the action, and it was not therefore a counter-claim; and it did not arise out of a contract, and it was not therefore a set-off. It is every-day law that when the property of one person is taken possession of and converted to the use of another the tort can be waived, and an action brought on the implied promise; and while we believe, in this particular case, that the value of the property belonging to Gehre is a counter-claim, he, relying on the promise implied by the possession and use, might recover, if he had brought an independent action; hence we do not deem this to be a reversible error.

2. The next objection is based upon the theory that the judgment in the action for forcible entry and detention is a final determination that the plaintiff in error was entitled to the possession of the lot and building, and that therefore all the evidence and findings of the court of the circumstances under which the building was placed upon the lot were immaterial and irrelevant. We do not understand that the action of forcible entry and detainer is a bar to this defense or counter-claim. Section 160 of the Justices' Code does not seem to contemplate such a result, and the case of Waite v. Teeters, 36 Kan. 604, 14 Pac. Rep. 146, does not seem to warrant any such conclusion.

3. The last contention of the plaintiff in error is that, if the court is of the opinion that Gehre could waive the tort and use it as a set-off on the theory of an implied contract, then the measure of his claim was not the value of the building where it was, for Gehre had no right to keep it there, but the value of the building taken away, and under the evidence and finding this was $25. This will not do. The court finds that the building was placed on the lot by Heller, under contract with Deisher for four years; and at the expiration of that time, or at any time when Heller wanted to quit the business, Deisher was to pay Heller the actual cost of the building. Gehre, by purchase from Heller, with the acquiescence and recognition of Deisher, succeeded to the rights of Heller. He was entitled to the possession of the unexpired term of Heller, over three years, and actual cost. Deisher would not let Gehre remove the building. It was not removed. It remained in the possession of Deisher, and was in his daily use; and Gehre was entitled to its value as it stood on the lot at the time of trial.

4. The plaintiff in error was not entitled to recover the value of the services of his attorney in the trial of the forcible entry and detainer, either in the justice's or the district court. It is not so nominated in the bond, and we are not cited to any authority allowing it. Believing that substantial justice has been done on the facts presented in the record, we recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

PIERCE v. HOME INS. CO. OF NEW YORK.

INSURANCE PREMIUMS—MISTAKE IN POLICY—LIABILITIES.

An applicant for insurance and an insurance company entered into an agreement for the insurance against fire and lightning of several articles of property. The application for the insurance was drawn up by an agent of the company, and signed by the applicant; but, through a mutual mistake of the parties, some of the articles to be insured were omitted. The applicant gave two promissory notes to pay for the insurance; but through a like mistake the amounts of the notes were made sufficient only to pay for the insurance of the articles actually included in the application, and not sufficient to pay for the insurance of all the articles. Afterwards an insurance policy was issued in exact accordance with the terms of the application, and several weeks thereafter it was tendered to the applicant, who refused to receive the same, upon the ground that the aforesaid omitted articles were omitted from the policy. The agent offered to issue a new and separate policy for those omitted articles, or to insert them in the policy already issued; but the applicant refused, and the agent retained the policy. The applicant, however, never demanded or asked for a return of his notes, or for a rescission of the contract. Afterwards the notes became due, and the insurance company sued the applicant thereon. Held, that the action may be maintained.

Error from district court, Clay county; E. HUTCHINSON, Judge.

C. M. Anthony, for plaintiff in error. F. B. Dawes, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Clay county by the Home Insurance Company of New York against D. C. Pierce, on two promissory notes, each for $49. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and the court found in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, and rendered judgment accordingly; and the defendant, as plaintiff in error, brings the case to this court for review. The facts of the case appear to be substantially as follows: On July 1, 1886, the defendant, Pierce, agreed with an agent of the insurance company that various articles of personal property and real estate should be insured against loss by reason of cyclones, winds, and tornadoes, and that the same property, and also a windmill, pump, grinder, and fixtures thereto, should be insured against loss by reason of fire and lightning. They also agreed upon a rate as to the cost of the insurance, and that such costs should be included in two promissory notes. They attempted to draw up the papers in accordance with this agreement, but in some particulars they failed, as hereafter stated. Two applications for the insurance were drawn up by the agent of the company for the defendant to sign. One was for the said insurance against loss by reason of cyclones, winds, and tornadoes, and the other was for the insurance against loss by reason of fire and lightning. The first one was drawn strictly in accordance with the agreement; but the other, through a mutual mistake of the parties, did not include the aforesaid windmill, pump, grinder, and fixtures. It was perfectly right in all other respects. The windmill, pump, grinder, and fixtures were valued at $200. The notes sued on were given for the insurance of the aforesaid property. They were intended to be given for the insurance of all the property, but in fact they were given for an amount which the value of the property actually included in the foregoing applications would require, and not for what the whole of the property would require. They were therefore given for too small an amount. They were in fact given as though this omitted property had not been intended to be insured at all. This mistake arose from the former mistake of the parties in not including the windmill, pump, grinder, and fixtures in the application for the insurance against fire and lightning. Both the applications were properly signed by the defendant, and became, in form, his applications for insurance; and they were then sent to the insurance company, which issued to him insurance policies thereon, precisely in accordance with the terms of the applications. These policies were then sent by the insurance company to their agent at Clay Center. Afterwards such agent tendered these policies to the defendant, but he refused to accept them upon the ground of the aforesaid omission of the windmill, pump, grinder, and fixtures from the fire and lightning insurance policy. The agent told him that another and a separate policy for this omitted property could be issued, or that the property could be inserted in the policy already issued; but the defendant still refused to accept either of the policies, or to adjust the difficulty in any other manner; and the agent retained the policies. This refusal on the part of the defendant to accept the policies or to adjust the difficulties was several weeks after the applications and notes were signed and executed by the defendant. Afterwards the notes became due, and the insurance company commenced this present action thereon, with the result aforesaid. It is also admitted as facts in the case that the defendant never demanded or asked for a return of his notes, or for a rescission of the contract. Of course the parties might, when they discovered the irregularities in the aforesaid application for insurance, and in the insurance policy, and in the promissory notes, have waived such irregularities, and by such waiver have made all the instruments as executed valid and binding. Or they might have rectified the mistakes made in the instruments either by making new ones or correcting the old ones. The insurance company was willing to waive all irregularities or to correct the former mistakes by issuing a new policy, or by correcting the old one; but the defendant objected, and nothing was done. Probably, also, either party had a right to have the notes, application, and policy reformed in equity so as to make them correspond precisely with the original agreement. Certainly the defendant had such a right. In 11 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 346, the following language is used: "A policy which does not conform to the agreement of the parties, whether by fraud or mistake, may be reformed in equity, and damages for a loss decreed in the same case. But such non-conformance must be conclusively proved, and the mistake must be either mutual, or made by one by reason of the fraud of the other." In Wood on Fire Insurance (section 479) the following language is used: "Where the terms of the contract are plain and distinct, and the actual intention of the insurer and insured is not doubtful, a policy issued either by fraud or mistake, that does not comply with the terms of the order therefor, or embody the real intention of the parties thereto, may be reformed in equity, or in those states where the court is permitted to exercise the functions of a court of law and equity, instantly, upon trial." In the present case the defendant had the benefit of the insurance of all his property which he desired to have insured, including the omitted property, for several weeks before the mistake was discovered; and therefore could have recovered for any loss from fire or lightning which might have occurred during those several weeks. And as he never asked to have the contract rescinded, and as it never was in fact rescinded, he really continued to have the benefit of such insurance, and could have recovered for any such loss which might have occurred at any time either before or after the discovery of the mistake. Before any loss occurred he could, by a suit in equity, have had the policy reformed so as to make it include the omitted property; and after loss, if any had occurred, he could, according to the authorities above cited, have had the policy reformed, if it needed any reformation, and have recovered for his loss in the same action. If these views are correct, and we think they are, then it follows that the notes were not given without consideration, that no failure of consideration existed in the case, and that the plaintiff had the right to recover on the notes, as the court below found. The judgment of the court below will therefore be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

RECORD ON APPEAL.

Where the record brought to the supreme court does not show that it contains all the evidence upon which the findings and judgment are based, it cannot be said that they are without sufficient support.

Error from district court, Neosho county; L. STILLWELL, Judge.

R. A. Barber, for plaintiff in error. G. A. Amos, for defendants in error.

JOHNSTON, J. The plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendants in the district court of Neosho county for $241.07, but, not being satisfied with the amount of the recovery, he brings the case here, and asks a reversal. The case was tried without a jury, and the court made special findings of fact, and the only complaint now made is that the findings and judgment are not sustained by the evidence. It is perhaps unfortunate for the plaintiff that there is no statement in the case made that it contains all the evidence offered on the trial. There is a statement to that effect in the certificate attached to the case made, but this statement is without any force. Eddy v. Weaver, 37 Kan. 540, 15 Pac. Rep. 492; Hill v. Bank, 42 Kan. 361, 22 Pac. Rep. 324. As the record brought here does not show that it embraces all the evidence upon which the findings and judgment were based, we cannot say that they are without sufficient support. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

ENSIGN v. ENSIGN.

DIVORCE—AFFIDAVIT—RESIDENCE OF DEFENDANT.

The affidavit required to be made and filed by plaintiff in a divorce proceeding, under section 640 of the Civil Code, stating that the residence of the defendant is unknown and cannot be ascertained by any means within the control of plaintiff, forms no part of the constructive service, but is only intended as evidence tending to show that due service has been made; and such affidavit need not be made and filed within three days after the first publication notice is made. Larimer v. Knoyle, 43 Kan. 333, 23 Pac. Rep. 437.

Error from district court, Johnson county; J. P. HINDMAN, Judge.

A. Smith Devenney, for plaintiff in error. John T. Little, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. On August 16, 1886, Daniel Ensign instituted an action in the district court of Johnson county against Caroline C. Ensign, his wife, to obtain a divorce, the custody of their child, and to have certain property decreed to him. For the purpose of making service by publication, and on the same day that the petition was filed, Daniel Ensign filed his affidavit, setting forth that service of summons could not be had upon the defendant within the county of Johnson or the state of Kansas. He then proceeded to make service by publication in a newspaper, and by the terms of the notice, which was duly published, the defendant was required to answer the petition on October 5, 1886. No copy of the petition nor of the publication notice was sent to the defendant at her place of residence within three days after the first publication of the notice was made. No attempt was made to take a decree at the January term, 1887, of the district court; but on January 24th the plaintiff below filed another affidavit, in which he stated that at the commencement of the action he had no knowledge of the post-office address of his wife, or of her whereabouts, and had no knowledge of her post-office address or residence within three days after the first publication of notice, and that he could not ascertain her post-office address by any means within his control, and that for three months after the first publication was made he did not know and could not ascertain the post-office address of the defendant by any means within his control; and for these reasons he could not send a copy of the petition and notice to her. On February 17, 1887, he sent a copy of the petition and publication notice, addressed to her at Seattle, Wash. T.; but the letter containing them was not called for at the Seattle office, and was returned to the sender on March 5, 1887. At the May term, 1887, the cause was tried, and a decree of divorce granted; no appearance being made by or on behalf of the defendant. On May 14, 1888, Caroline C. Ensign appeared and moved the court to vacate the judgment and decree, on the ground that it had been rendered without jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. It was contended that, as the plaintiff had not inclosed in an envelope addressed to the defendant a copy of the petition and of the publication notice within three days after the first publication was made, no jurisdiction could be acquired, unless an affidavit had been made and filed within three days after the first publication was made that her residence was unknown to him, and could not be ascertained by any means within his control. The court denied the motion, and this ruling is assigned for error. No error was committed. It is true, as contended, that the sending of a copy of the petition and of the publication notice, addressed to the defendant at her place of residence, within three days after the first publication was made, is a part of the service, where the residence is known, (Lewis v. Lewis, 15 Kan. 181;) but such copies cannot be mailed to the defendant where her place of residence is unknown; and the making and filing of an affidavit that such residence is unknown, and cannot be ascertained by any means within the control of the plaintiff, is no part of the service, and it is not essential that it shall be made and filed within three days after the first publication is made. This affidavit simply furnishes proof to the court that the requirements of the statute have been complied with so far as possible, and it must be made and filed before a judgment of divorce can be granted. This question was directly determined in the recent case of Larimer v. Knoyle, 43 Kan. 338, 23 Pac. Rep. 487, and the conclusion there reached sustains the decision of the district court in this case. Following the ruling in that case, we will affirm the judgment in this.

GALE SULKY HARROW MANUF'G CO. v. STARK.

ACTION ON NOTE—DEFENSES—BREACH OF WARRANTY—RESCISSION OF CONTRACT.

The plaintiff sued on a promissory note, which at the end thereof, and immediately before the signature, contained the following words, to-wit: "No promise or contract outside of this note will be recognized." The defendant answered, setting up, in substance, that the note was given for a certain farming implement sold by the plaintiff to the defendant which was warranted by the vendor to be sufficient for a particular purpose, but which was not sufficient for such purpose, and was wholly insufficient, and that the defendant offered to return the implement, and rescinded the contract. Held, that such a defense may be made; that the alleged warranty may be shown notwithstanding the aforesaid words in the promissory note; that as the implement sold was essentially different from what it was warranted to be, and would not answer the purpose for which it was warranted, it may be returned, and the contract rescinded; and that the evidence introduced on the trial was sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury in favor of the defendant.

Error from district court, Greenwood county; A. L. L. HAMILTON, Judge.

This was an action brought before a justice of the peace of Greenwood county on March 18, 1887, by the Gale Sulky Harrow Manufacturing Company against Isaac Stark, for the recovery of $65 and interest, on the following promissory note, to-wit: "$65.00. Greenwood Co., State of Kansas, August 7th, 1885. On or before the first day of October, 1886, I promise to pay Gale Sulky Harrow Manufacturing Company or order sixty-five dollars at Eureka Bank, of Eureka, Kansas, value received. If paid at maturity, interest at ten per cent. from August 1st, 1886; but if not paid when due, interest at 10 per cent. per annum from date until paid. No promise or contract outside of this note will be recognized. ISAAC STARK." The defendant answered, setting forth, in substance, that the note was given for a Gale sulky harrow and seeder, sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, and warranted to do good work, which warranty the defendant relied on; that the implement was not as warranted, and that there was a breach of the warranty; that the defendant rescinded the contract, and offered to return the implement; and that he was damaged in the sum of $100. The plaintiff replied by filing a general denial. By consent of the parties, the case was certified to the district court, where on January 24, 1888, it was tried before the court and a jury, and the jury rendered the following verdict, and made the following findings, to-wit: Verdict: "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, do, upon our oaths, find for the defendant." Findings: "(1) Was the note sued on this action given in payment for a Gale sulky harrow and seeder sold by plaintiff, through its agent, to defendant? Yes. (2) Was said implement sold with a warranty? Yes. (3) If said implement was sold with a warranty, was the warranty oral or in writing? Oral. (4) Was the warranty given by an agent of plaintiff? Yes; by agent or salesman. (5) Was the agent of plaintiff authorized to give a warranty? We don't know. (6) Was plaintiff informed that its agent had sold the implement with a warranty? Yes; on or about October 4, 1886. (7) What language did plaintiff's agent use in giving the warranty? If the jury cannot give the exact language used, give the substance. 'Warranted to sow from one to four bushels of seed per acre. Could not be choked out.' (8) Did defendant see the implement before he purchased it, and, if so, what examination did he make of it? Yes; as exhibited by agent or salesman on road. (9) Did the implement comply with the warranty? If not, in what respect did it fail? No; failed to sow the required amount of seed, and would choke out. (10) Was there any defect in the implement at the time it was delivered to defendant? Yes. (11) If there was any defect in implement or in its construction at the time it was delivered to defendant, what was that defect? It failed to work as warranted. (12) If the implement sold to defendant did not do good work, was it the fault of the implement, or was it the fault of the person using it? It was the fault of the implement. (13) If the implement did not comply with the warranty, when did defendant first discover that fact? In spring of 1886. (14) Did the defendant return, or offer to return, the implement? Yes. (15) If defendant offered to return the implement, state when, and to what person, he made the offer? To H. A. Dales, about October 4, 1886. (16) What language did defendant use in offering to return the implement? If the jury cannot give exact language, give substance of language used. 'I will give you thirty-five dollars and the machine as a compromise, rather than to go into a lawsuit.' (17) What authority had the Eureka Bank or its employees from plaintiff? As collecting agents. (18) Where did defendant keep the implement, and what care did he take of it during the time it was in his possession? Outdoors, by his granary or stable. The same care he gave his other farming implements. (19) If the defendant at any time offered to return the implement to plaintiff, in what condition was the implement at that time? About the same as when received, except the wear. (20) Was the implement ever at any time returned to and received by plaintiff? No. (21) If the defendant at any time offered, through the Eureka Bank, to return implement to plaintiff, the jury may state whether such offer was made by way of compromise. State the terms of the offer. Yes; to avoid lawsuit." Upon this verdict and these findings the court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, and against the plaintiff, for costs; and the plaintiff, as plaintiff in error, brings the case to this court for review.

Jones & Schultz and C. W. Shinn, for plaintiff in error. W. S. Marlin, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J., (after stating the facts as above.) In this action we think the defendant had the right to prove a parol warranty of the sufficiency of the implement purchased for the purpose for which it was purchased, notwithstanding the words contained in the instrument sued on, to-wit: "No promise or contract outside of this note will be recognized. ISAAC STARK." Upon the face of the note it would seem that Stark, the promisor, the one who signed the note, would be the person who would not recognize any other promise or contract outside of the note. See, also, Thompson v. Manufacturing Co., 29 Kan. 476. We think there was also sufficient evidence from which the jury might find a warranty. The implement was sold, however, by an agent of the plaintiff; but as such agent had the entire control of the property, and assumed to have the right to make the warranty, and as the defendant had no notice to the contrary, and as a warranty, at least to the extent of the price of the property, would seem to be within the scope of the agent's authority, and as the company afterwards accepted the fruits of the agent's sale, we would think that the facts would authorize a holding that the agent did have sufficient authority to make the warranty. We also think that the defendant had a right to prove a rescission of the contract of purchase and sale, and his offer to return the property to the plaintiff. Upon this question there is a conflict of authority. Some courts hold that where the title to the property has passed to the vendee, and no fraud can be shown on the part of the vendor, but only a breach of the warranty, the vendee cannot rescind the contract; but other courts hold otherwise, and this court seemingly holds otherwise. Weybrick v. Harris, 31 Kan. 92, 1 Pac. Rep. 271. In the case just cited it is held that the vendee has one of two remedies: First, he may return the property and rescind the contract; or, second, he may affirm the contract, and sue for damages for the breach of the warranty. In 3 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 929-932, the following language is used: "A contract may be rescinded when the entering into the same has been induced by a false representation, fraudulent or otherwise, made by a party thereto, provided such representation be one of fact, (this rule does not apply to cases of actual fraud,) as distinguished from either matter of law or mere opinion or intention; that it be such as to induce the contract; and that it be made as part of the same transaction. Such a contract, however, is voidable, and not void, and cannot be rescinded if the parties cannot be put in statu quo, nor after third persons have for value acquired rights thereunder; and the rescission must take place within a reasonable time, notice of the election to rescind having been communicated to the other party, though this may be done by bringing suit to have the contract set aside. Otherwise the right of rescission will be considered waived by acquiescence." We think this is a correct statement of the law, although there are some authorities to the contrary. See 1 Benj. Sales, (4 Corbin's Amer. Ed.) §§ 623-635, and especially sections 628-634. It is not necessary in this case that we should hold that in all cases of a breach of warranty in the sale of personal property the vendee may return, or offer to return, the property, and rescind the contract; but we think that such is the rule for cases like the present, where the property purchased and received is substantially different from what it was warranted to be, and will not answer the purpose for which it was warranted. It must also be remembered that in the present case nothing had been paid for the property when the contract was rescinded, but only a promissory note had been given for the purchase price thereof. Of course, an offer to return the property, where the offer is refused, answers the same purpose as an actual return, provided that the property is retained for the benefit of the vendor whenever the vendor may choose to receive it. In this case the vendee offered to return the property, and then kept it for the plaintiff, and at all times he kept it just as safely and as well as he kept his own property. The offer to return the property was on two different occasions and to two different agents of the plaintiff. On the first occasion the agent had the note sued on in his possession, and was attempting to collect the same. On the other occasion the agent was at the defendant's house attempting to collect the note; and, while the implement was present and in sight of both the agent and the defendant, the defendant offered to return the same. The plaintiff itself was a non-resident of the state of Kansas, and a resident of Detroit, Mich.; and it does not appear that the plaintiff had any resident agent in Kansas to whom the property could be returned, until about the time when the defendant offered to return the same, and the defendant offered to return the same just as soon as he could find any agent of the plaintiff to whom he could make the offer. Many objections are made by the plaintiff to the instructions given by the court to the jury, and to its refusal to give other instructions asked for by the plaintiff; but still we think the case was fairly submitted to the jury, upon proper and sufficient instructions. The principal questions involved in this case, as it was tried in the court below, were whether the implement sold by the plaintiff's agent to the defendant was warranted to be sufficient for a particular purpose or not, and whether it was in fact sufficient for such purpose, or was essentially insufficient. These questions were questions of fact, and we think they were fairly and properly submitted to the jury, and the jury found against the plaintiff, and in favor of the defendant, and the court below approved the verdict, and we do not now think that we can disturb such verdict. The agent who sold the property to the defendant seems to have been an itinerant salesman, who could not afterwards be found by the defendant; nor could any agent of the plaintiff be found by the defendant until the note sued on was presented to him for collection, and the defendant did not even know where the place of business of the plaintiff was. We cannot say that any material error was committed by the trial court, and therefore its judgment will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

Error from district court, Coffey county; CHARLES B. GRAVES, Judge.

On the 11th day of October, 1884, Mehitable S. Webster commenced her action against Charles McLean, the minor child of William McLean, deceased, to recover the sum of \$1,050, and interest, and also to subject the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 34, township 21, in range 15, to the payment of said claim. Upon the same day she obtained an order of attachment, which was levied upon the real estate above described. Service was made by publication. S. C. Jenkins, Esq., was appointed by the court guardian ad litem for Charles McLean, the minor. He filed an answer, which was not verified. Subsequently amended pleadings were filed. Trial had on the 15th day of July, 1887, before the court, a jury being waived. After hearing the evidence and argument of counsel, the court took the case under advisement. On the 26th day of November, 1887, the court filed its conclusions of fact and of law, as follows: "(1) That on the 9th day of September, 1859, William McLean was the owner of the north eighty acres of the south east quarter of section twenty-five in township 21, of range fourteen, in the county of Coffey and state of Kansas, and on that day mortgaged the same to Thomas Champion, to secure the payment of one hundred and one dollars and interest; and such mortgage was recorded in the office of the register of deeds of said Coffey county, September 9, 1859. (2) That on the 24th day of September, 1861, said William McLean executed and delivered to the plaintiff the deed set out in the petition for the sum and consideration of four hundred dollars paid by the plaintiff in money to the said William McLean at the time of the delivery of the said deed to her, and that no part of the said purchase money has ever been paid back to the plaintiff, and that the said deed was duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds of said Coffey county on the 18th day of June, 1865. (3) That on the 15th day of March, 1866, said Thomas Champion commenced his suit in the district court of Coffey county to foreclose the said mortgage to him before mentioned, and on May 30, 1866, obtained a decree, in pursuance of which the said mortgaged premises were duly sold and conveyed to said Champion on the 7th day of December, A. D. 1866. (4) The plaintiff had no actual knowledge or notice whatever of the existence of said mortgage, nor of the suit to foreclose the same, and was not a party to such suit and foreclosure, and her first knowledge of the said mortgage and suit and sale was in the year 1869, to which date she paid the taxes on said land. (5) That said land was open and unoccupied until after the commencement of this suit, several persons having claimed to own said premises since said foreclosure by virtue of conveyances from the said Thomas Champion. (6) In the spring of 1862 said William McLean left the state of Kansas, and never subsequently resided therein, or has been within said state. The plaintiff at the time of her said purchase of the said land aforesaid was, and continually ever since has been, and now is, a resident of the city of Leavenworth, state of Kansas. (7) The said William McLean died in the territory of Montana in the year 1882, leaving a will, by the terms of which he devised to his son, Charles McLean, the defendant in this suit, the land attached in this suit, to-wit, the south-west quarter of section 34, in township 21, of range 15, in the county of Coffey, state of Kansas, which said lands were and are the only property of any kind within the state of Kansas owned by the said William McLean at the time of his death. The said will was duly probated in the said territory of Montana before the commencement of this suit. (8) At the time this suit was commenced the defendant was and still is a minor, and was not then, and never has been, a resident of the state of Kansas. (9) No letters of administration on the estate of said William McLean, deceased, have been issued in the state of Kansas, nor executor of his will appointed or recognized in the said state, nor has any one offered or attempted to administer upon the estate of the said William McLean, deceased, in the state of Kansas. (10) That the lands attached in this suit are worth the sum of twenty-eight hundred dollars. (11) That there is due to the plaintiff the sum of four hundred dollars, paid to the said William McLean as the consideration for the lands described in the deed from him to the plaintiff, described in the petition herein, with the interest thereon since September, 1861, which said sum and interest now amount to the sum of eleven hundred and thirty-two dollars and thirty-four cents, (\$1,132.34,) no part of which has been paid." Conclusions of law: "That the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum of \$1,132.34, so found due her, and interest, and costs of this suit, and that the lands attached in this suit, to-wit, the southwest quarter of section 34, in township 21, range 15, in the county of Coffey, state of Kansas, be sold according to law, and from the proceeds of such sale the costs hereof be paid, and the plaintiff be paid the sum of \$1,132.34, with interest from the date of entry of said judgment." Thereupon the defendant, by his guardian ad litem, filed his motion for judgment upon the findings of fact. This motion was overruled, and then the defendant, by his guardian ad litem, filed his motion for a new trial. This was also overruled. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for \$1,136.50 and costs, taxed at \$70.35. The attached property was ordered to be sold, and the proceeds thereof applied to the payment of the judgment and costs. The defendant, by his guardian ad litem, excepted, and brings the case here.

Redmond & Junkins, for plaintiff in error. G. E. Manchester and T. A. Hurd, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The contention of the minor, Charles McLean, through his guardian ad litem, is that the amended petition did not state facts sufficient to give the district court jurisdiction of the subject-matter of this action, because the statutes of the state provide full and complete remedies in the probate court for the collection of all claims against the estates of deceased persons, and therefore that the probate court of Coffey county is vested with the exclusive jurisdiction of the subject-matter. William McLean, the father of Charles McLean, died in Montana in 1882, leaving a will, by the terms of which he devised to his son, Charles McLean, the land attached and ordered to be sold. No letters of administration on the estate of William McLean, deceased, have been issued in this state, and no executor of his will has been appointed or recognized in this state. By the common law, the heir at law or devisee is personally liable for the debts of his ancestor to the value of the property received from him. Rawle, Cov. pp. 514, 519, 522, §§ 309-311; 2 Greenl. Ev. §§ 356, 357; 4 Bac. Abr. 410; Gen. St. 1889, par. 2592. The original petition is essentially a bill in equity to enforce the claim and lien upon this land, and such purpose is fully shown. In Shoemaker v. Brown, 10 Kan. 383, it is said that "the courts in chancery always had paramount jurisdiction over the estates of deceased persons, and generally had jurisdiction over all trust-estates. Therefore, if the district courts of this state had full chancery powers in this respect, then they must have jurisdiction in cases of this kind. * * * The mere giving of jurisdiction to one court does not show that it must be exercised exclusively by that court. The constitution gives to the supreme court original jurisdiction in quo warranto, mandamus, and habeas corpus, (article 3, § 3;) and also gives to the probate courts original jurisdiction in habeas corpus, (Id. § 8;) but still it has never been supposed that either of these courts had exclusive original jurisdiction in any of these matters, for the legislature has given such jurisdiction also to the district courts. * * *

We think it could not have been intended by the legislature to limit in any respect the jurisdiction of the district courts by passing the acts conferring certain jurisdiction upon the probate courts. It was simply intended to confer such jurisdiction upon the probate courts, and to leave the other courts to exercise just such jurisdiction and powers as the other statutes had given or should give to them. The act concerning executors and administrators shows this. Sections 83 and 86 of said act show that it was not the intention of the legislature to confer upon probate courts exclusive original jurisdiction in suits against estates." This case is not like Fox v. Van Norman, 11 Kan. 214. In that case it was attempted to personally charge the widow of her deceased husband as an executor de son tort with the liabilities which attached at common law. This, it was held, could not be done under the statute. It is not shown or claimed that there were any other debts against the estate of William McLean, deceased, and the property attached is the only property of the decedent within this state. After the attachment the action was in the nature of a proceeding to subject the land of the decedent within this state to the payment of the claim stated in the petition. Therefore, in the absence of any administration, we cannot perceive any good reason for holding that the district court had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter before it. "Generally, while the estate is in the course of settlement in the probate court, the district court will not exercise its jurisdiction, and this for the reason that the jurisdiction of the district court in such cases is equitable only, and the parties have a plain and adequate remedy in the probate court." Gafford v. Dickinson, 37 Kan. 290, 15 Pac. Rep. 175; Kotham v. Markson, 34 Kan. 550, 9 Pac. Rep. 218; Stratton v. McCandless, 27 Kan. 306; Collamore v. Wilder, 19 Kan. 67; Johnson v. Cain, 15 Kan. 532. The estate of William McLean, deceased, was not in the course of settlement in the probate court when this action was brought.

The next contention is that the deed from William McLean to Mehitable S. Webster is not a deed of general warranty, and, further, that plaintiff below was never evicted from the land described in the conveyance to her. The warranty in the deed is in these words: "And the said party of the first part and his heirs, the said premises, in the quiet and peaceable possession of the said party of the second part, her heirs and assigns, against the said party of the first part, his heirs and assigns, and against all and every person and persons whomsoever lawfully claiming or to claim the same, shall and will warrant and by these presents forever defend." This is a warranty of peaceable possession, and was broken by an eviction under a paramount title. The land was sold and conveyed on the 7th day of December, 1866, under proceedings to foreclose a mortgage dated the 9th of September, 1859, which was prior to the deed from William McLean to Mehitable S. Webster of the 24th of September, 1861; therefore, the plaintiff below could not redeem, except by paying the prior mortgage lien thereon. Under this lien she was deprived of all title, and a breach of the warranty in the deed occurred.

The other contention is that the trial court erroneously received in evidence several records from the office of the register of deeds of Coffey county to prove conveyances of the land deeded by McLean. It is urged that these records ought not to have been received in evidence until it was shown that the original conveyances were not in the possession or under the control of the plaintiff below. Civil Code, §§ 872, 873; Gen. St. 1889, pars. 1136, 1137. The deed from William McLean to Mehitable S. Webster, of the 24th of September, 1861, was a part of the amended petition, and, as the answer was a general denial only, and not verified, its execution was admitted. The other records received in evidence were written instruments authorized by the statute to be recorded in the office of the register of deeds, the originals of which did not belong to plaintiff below. They had been executed to adverse or opposing parties. The presumption is that they were not in her possession or under her control. As nothing appears in the record to the contrary, the court committed no error in permitting the copies in the office of the register of deeds to be received in evidence. Other matters are discussed in the brief, but they are unimportant, and not even prejudicial. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

RICHARDSON V. SAMUELSON.

ACTION ON CONSTABLE'S BOND—DEFECTIVE PLEADING—AIDED BY JUDGMENT.

A petition on a constable's official bond, challenged for the first time after judgment, considered, and found sufficient to support and sustain such judgment.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Wyandotte county; O. L. MILLER, Judge.

N. Cree and D. B. Van Syckle, for plaintiff in error. Scroggs & Gibson, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This was an action on a constable's bond. The defendant answered, but, through mistake of counsel, no defense was made. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, but no motion was made for a new trial. The case is brought by the plaintiff in error to this court, and a reversal is asked for errors going to the foundation of the action and judgment, apparent from the record. The first objection urged against the petition is that it does not set out a cause of action, or allege title to the property taken by the constable. The petition alleges that Samuelson, the defendant in error, was in possession of certain property, by virtue of a chattel mortgage, and complaint is made that no ownership was thus alleged. This may be true, in the first part of the petition, but it is stated in another paragraph that Richardson seized and held property belonging to the plaintiff, and that, by reason of his seizure and holding of goods and property of plaintiff, a right of action accrued to him on the bond and against the sureties. This we think a sufficient allegation to uphold a petition, after judgment.

It is next contended that there was no statement of facts in the petition showing that plaintiff had a right to the possession of the mortgaged property; that the plaintiff below sued as mortgagee, and should have alleged by proper averments that he was entitled to the possession of the property levied upon. A reference to the petition discloses that it contains an allegation that Richardson, as constable, seized certain property while in the possession of the plaintiff, and by force removed it from his possession, and refused to deliver the same to him. This we think a sufficient averment of possession, and that such possession was interfered with by the constable.

The plaintiff in error further insists that the petition and judgment in this case are based upon the assumption that an extra official act of an officer constitutes a breach of the bond; that, in the face of the express recital of the judgment, the officer had no process authorizing his acts, and that what he did was without right or authority; that no judgment on the bond was legal, because the act recited was a mere trespass upon the part of the officer. The answer was a justification that the property seized was taken by virtue of a writ of attachment issued by a justice of the peace, and that it was in pursuance of such writ that the goods were levied upon. The language of the judgment is that Henry W. Richardson, constable, had no process authorizing him, as constable, to seize and take the property in controversy from the possession of the plaintiff, and not that he had no process; so that the position of counsel for plaintiff in error is not tenable upon this point.

A further objection is made that no breach of the condition of the bond was averred in the petition, and that no cause of action arises on an official bond until a breach, and the fact of a supposed breach, is distinctly stated by proper allegations. A reference to the petition is an answer to this objection. The allegation of the petition is that Henry W. Richardson, as constable, seized the property in question while in the possession of the plaintiff, and by force removed it from his possession, and still refuses to deliver the same to the plaintiff. This, we think, is all that the law requires.

It is again urged that the petition lays no foundation for any measure of damage, and that the judgment gives damages not warranted by the allegations of the petition; that the petition contains no averment of value. The petition states that the goods seized and still held belonged to the plaintiff, and were of the value of $190. This allegation, we think, is sufficiently clear and definite to support the judgment. The same answer will apply to the last objection, that there is no allegation of damages in the petition. The value being stated, and the further allegation that the plaintiff was deprived of said goods, is sufficient to support the judgment. We recommend an affirmance of the judgment of the court below.

MECHANIC'S LIEN—FENCING MATERIAL.

To entitle a person to a lien upon land for material furnished for fencing, it must appear, not only that such material was purchased to be used for that purpose, but it must also appear that the same was in fact so used as to become a part of the realty.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Washington county; E. HUTCHINSON, Judge.

J. G. Lowe, for plaintiffs in error. Charles Brown and E. Hutchinson, for defendants in error.

GREEN, C. This action was commenced in the district court of Washington county, by J. C. Bowers & Sons, to foreclose a lien upon certain real estate, for iron fencing, gates, and posts furnished by them to E. C. Knowles, one of the defendants in the court below, who held the land upon which the lien was claimed under a bond for a deed from J. B. Besack. E. C. Knowles assigned his interest in the property to Edwin Knowles, and the same was afterwards assigned by him to the plaintiffs in error, who received a deed from J. B. Besack and wife, having complied with the terms of the original contract to convey. Service was made upon E. C. Knowles by publication. The other defendants answered that the material had never been used in the erection, alteration, or repairs of the fences upon the premises purchased by them; that the material for which plaintiffs claimed a lien had never been placed on said premises, or used thereon, in any manner. Judgment was rendered by the court below against the defendant E. C. Knowles for the amount due for the material, and the same was declared a lien upon the premises of the plaintiffs in error, who bring the case here. It was proven upon the trial that the material furnished was never used to build a fence on the land upon which a lien was claimed. It was piled upon the public highway in front of the premises, where it remained some time, and was afterwards taken by the sheriff of Washington county, on an execution issued against E. C.

Knowles, and sold. In the sale of the property by Knowles to the plaintiffs in error the fencing was expressly exempted, upon the ground that it had never been accepted by the purchaser. We think the court below erred in sustaining this lien. The material was never attached to and made a part of the land. The language of the statute is the same with reference to buildings as fences: "Any * * * person who shall, under contract, * * * furnish material for erecting * * * any building." "Any * * * person who shall, under contract, * * * furnish material for erecting * * * any fence." Section 1, c. 141, Sess. Laws 1872. This court has held that, to sustain a lien for material, it must appear, not only that the materials were purchased to be used in the building, but also that they were in fact so used. Rice v. Hodge, 26 Kan. 164. "At common law, the mechanic had a lien on personal property benefited by his labor, but this lien, being a mere possessory right, could not apply to real estate which is incapable of manual possession. The statutory remedy simply extends the same right to real estate by giving the mechanic a charge thereon in the nature of a mortgage lien. As the law pertains only to the realty, it follows that, to come within the intent of the statute, the structure should be so affixed to the soil as to become a part of the realty." Kneel. Mech. Liens, 87; Bottomly v. Grace Church, 2 Cal. 90; Houghton v. Blake, 5 Cal. 240; Rogers v. Currier, 13 Gray, 129; Chapin v. Paper Co., 30 Conn. 461. In the latter case the court expressly held that no lien was created upon the building for which materials are expressly furnished, if they do not in fact go into the building. The fencing never having been placed upon the land, we are of the opinion that no lien attached. We recommend a reversal of the judgment.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF KANSAS CITY v. SCHOOL-DIST. No. 7 OF WYANDOTTE COUNTY et al.

ANNEXATION OF SCHOOL-DISTRICT—CONTROL OF SCHOOL PROPERTY.

A school-district was divided by an extension of city limits, and, the school-house being in that part of the district taken into the city by the extension, the board of education attempted to take possession of and exercise control over it. The officers of the school-district refused to allow this to be done, and a temporary injunction was allowed, restraining them from any interference with the action of the board of education; but, on motion of the school-district officers, the order of injunction was vacated. Held, that the trial court did not commit error in vacating such order, as it was not equitable.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Wyandotte county; O. L. MILLER, Judge.

Hutchings & Keplinger, for plaintiff in error. Alden & McGrew, for defendants in error.

SIMPSON, C. By an extension of the boundaries of the city of Kansas City, a part of the territory of school-district No. 7 of Wyandotte county was brought within the limits of said city, and on the portion of said school-district thus added to the city was situate a school-house belonging to district No. 7. This school-house, known as "Stewart's School-House," was built by district No. 7 on an acre of ground conveyed in fee to said district by Sarah Driver on the 26th day of September, 1867. Just how the district was divided by the extension of the city limits, and what portion was left out, and what part taken into the city, is not disclosed by the record. Enough is said, however, to show that a large number of school children were left within the original district. After the extension of the city limits, the board of education of the city of Kansas City attempted to take possession and exercise control over said school-house. The director of school-district No. 7 resisted these attempts at control of the school-house by the board of education of the city, and this action was commenced by the board of education to restrain the officers of the school-district from any interference with the control of the board over the school-house. An order of injunction was issued and served with the summons, but a motion to vacate the order was sustained; and from this ruling the case is brought here for review.

The decision of this case must be controlled by equitable considerations, for while the statutes of the state have made provisions for the disposition of the property of a school-district when the same is abolished or discontinued, and when a school-district is divided by the county superintendent, or when by his action a part of the territory of a school-district is detached and put into another or new district, no express provision is made where a school-district is divided by reason of an extension of city limits absorbing a part of it. The case of Curtis v. Board of Education, 43 Kan. 138, 23 Pac. Rep. 98, is not controlling, because it appears from the record in that case that school-district No. 45 conveyed the school-house property by a warranty deed to the board of education of the city of Topeka, in consideration of $400. This, under the statute, the school-district was authorized and empowered to do by section 28, subd. 7, School Law. The general rule respecting such matters is that, where a part of the territory of a county, township, or a school-district is detached for any purpose, the original municipal corporation still retains its property rights, powers, and privileges, and remains subject to its duty and obligations, unless some express provision to the contrary be made by the act authorizing the separation. As we have said, there is no provision of the statute that provides for an adjustment of the rights of the board of education and the officers of the school-district in a case of this kind. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that the board of education or the city became the owner of the school-house by reason of its being taken into the city by an extension of its limits. There ought to have been some adjustment of property rights between the parties, but, as the case stands, we could not reverse the judgment of the court below, except upon the theory that school-district No. 7 had been divested of its ownership of the school-house by reason of its absorption by the city by the extension, and this we cannot do. No attempt has been made to adjust the conflicting claims upon an equitable basis. On the record, and the facts presented by it, we recommend that the order vacating the temporary injunction be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered.

HORTON, C. J., and JOHNSTON, J., concurring.

VALENTINE, J. I concur in the result reached, and in affirming the order vacating the temporary injunction.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Butler county; H. W. SCHUMACHER, Judge.

A. L. Redden, for plaintiff in error. J. K. Cubbison, E. C. Ellis, and E. D. Stratford, for defendants in error.

GREEN, C. This was an action in replevin, brought by the plaintiff in error against the defendants in error, in the district court of Butler county, for a stock of goods kept in a store in the town of Leon, in said county. The case was tried to the court, and a demurrer to the evidence was sustained, and the plaintiff in error brings the case here, assigning error. The material facts developed on the trial were: That on the 16th day of July, 1886, F. W. Beckmeyer executed a chattel mortgage to J. Benninghoff, the plaintiff in error, upon a stock of merchandise in Leon, Butler county, to secure the payment of $4,260.30. The mortgage was filed for record on the following day; and a renewal affidavit was made and filed on the 7th day of July, 1887. Some time in the fall of 1886 the mortgagor made a partial transfer of the stock of goods to C. L. King. On the 11th day of December, 1886, King executed a mortgage upon this same stock of merchandise to the W. B. Grimes Dry Goods Company, to secure the payment of $800, due December 6, 1887, subject to the mortgage given by Beckmeyer to Benninghoff. This mortgage was filed for record on the same day, and a renewal affidavit was filed on the 23d day of December, 1887. F. W. Beckmeyer and C. L. King executed a chattel mortgage upon the same property the 1st day of June, 1887, to T. K. Hanna, surviving partner of Tootle, Hanna & Co., for $875, payable on the 23d day of May, 1888. This last mortgage was subject to the mortgages given to Benninghoff and the W. B. Grimes Dry Goods Company, and was filed for record on the same day. The stock of goods was redelivered by King to Beckmeyer, who continued in possession until the 6th day of January, 1888, when there was a conditional sale of the goods to Henry J. Dillon. The following is a copy of the contract for the sale of the stock of goods: "Leon, Kansas, Jan. 6, 1888. Agreement between F. W. Beckmeyer and Henry J. Dillon. The parties hereto agree as follows: The said Beckmeyer agrees to sell and has sold to said Dillon the stock of general merchandise now in building known as the 'Butler Co. Store,' subject to incumbrance of $1,800.00. And the said Dillon hereby agrees to give said Beckmeyer, in exchange or payment for said stock of goods, the following described lands, and execute good and sufficient warranty deeds for the same to J. Benninghoff, the said lands to be free and clear of all incumbrance excepting mortgage of four hundred and fifty dollars and one hundred and fifty dollars, due the government, which Dillon agrees to pay when due, and one hundred and sixty acres of land. Description of land: Lots 3 & 4 of S. half of N. W. quarter section four, township 32, range 22, 160 acres; also the N. half of the S. W. quarter, N. half of the N. W. quarter of sec. 29, town 31, range 23, 160 acres; also the S. E. quarter of S. E. quarter sec. 15; S. half of S. W. quarter of S. W. quarter sec. 14, town 32, R. 21, 160 acres,—all in Clark county, Kansas; the last-named piece or tract being subject to mortgage of $450, and no more; and also execute to said Beckmeyer a second chattel mortgage on stock of goods for the sum of $800.00, with 12 per cent. interest from date of mortgage, said note and chattel mortgage to run one year from its date; the said Dillon to furnish at his own cost abstract, showing said land clear of all incumbrance, as above mentioned, and execute deed as above mentioned; these goods to be delivered into his possession. The said Dillon further agrees not to remove goods from Leon, Kansas, and to pay on said first mortgage to Benninghoff at least fifty dollars per week, until the whole is paid, the said mortgage to be given to said Beckmeyer for the $800 to cover all goods which may be added to stock of goods, and also book-account. The said Dillon hereby represents said land as being nearly all good, smooth land, and tillable, with Kansas houses on each quarter; also good wells, and 40 acres in cultivation. This trade being made upon the said Dillon's representations of said land, the said Dillon to comply with the said conditions within six days from this date, or sale is null and void. The said F. W. Beckmeyer to pay all other incumbrance on stock of goods. The said Dillon further agrees to give another note for $130.00, with the above $800.00 mortgage, which is to be paid Feb'y 5, 1888. [Signed] F. W. BECKMEYER. HENRY J. DILLON." Accompanying this contract, a bill of sale was executed by Beckmeyer, which recited the fact that the property was free from all incumbrance, except a mortgage of $1,800. This sale seemed to have been made with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff in error. Under this agreement and bill of sale, Dillon took charge of the store on the 8th day of January, and continued in possession until the 18th, when Benninghoff went to Dillon, and demanded possession of the stock of merchandise, who refused to deliver the key to him personally, or to turn over the stock, but consented that Beckmeyer might take charge of the store for him, and dispose of the goods for Benninghoff's benefit, and apply the proceeds of sales in paying off Benninghoff's debt. The key was handed by Dillon to Beckmeyer, in the presence of Benninghoff, who continued in charge of the store until 9 or 10 o'clock the next day, when the representatives of the defendants in error came in and demanded possession of the store, and, under threats that he would be arrested, Beckmeyer surrendered the key. Dillon was not present at the time, and Beckmeyer stated that he was holding the stock for Benninghoff. On the following day the plaintiff commenced this action. The deeds for the land mentioned in the contract were received by Benninghoff, but, on account of some defect, they were returned by mail to the parties who had executed them.

The plaintiff in error insists that the mortgage from Beckmeyer to Benninghoff was valid, and comes fairly within the rule heretofore laid down by this court, with reference to mortgages upon stocks of merchandise; that upon the trial there was some evidence to support the claim of the plaintiff in error to the title to the property in controversy; and therefore the demurrer to the evidence was improperly sustained. The contention of the defendants in error is that the evidence offered by the plaintiff below conclusively showed that, at the commencement of this action, the mortgage of the plaintiff in error was without force, and hence the demurrer to the evidence was properly sustained. We think the demurrer to the evidence should have been overruled. The mortgage under which the plaintiff in error claimed title seemed to have been given in good faith, for a sufficient consideration; and there was some evidence to indicate that there was an unpaid balance of about $1,800 still due the plaintiff in error. All of the mortgages under which title was claimed, by both plaintiff and defendants, were given upon the same stock of goods, and such mortgages have been upheld by this court. Frankhouser v. Ellett, 22 Kan. 127; Howard v. Rohlfing, 36 Kan. 357, 13 Pac. Rep. 566. There was an express recitation in the contract between Beckmeyer and Dillon that the sale was made subject to an incumbrance of $1,800, and in that agreement Dillon promised to pay at least $50 a week on the first mortgage to Benninghoff, until the whole was paid. As we view the testimony, there was evidence to show that, when Dillon delivered the key of the store to Beckmeyer, it was for the benefit of Benninghoff. We are not satisfied that the attempted sale by Beckmeyer to Dillon operated as a release of the Benninghoff mortgage. The deeds for the land were executed, but afterwards returned. If it did not, the question as to who was in possession of the store when the defendants below obtained possession through Beckmeyer is not very material. If the first mortgage was not discharged, by the making of the contract between Dillon and Beckmeyer the plaintiff in error had the undoubted right to maintain his action. We do not care to consider the evidence. That of the plaintiff alone is here, and all that we can now say is that the facts adduced before the trial court seemed to show a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff in error. Under the well-settled rule of this court, unless there has been a total failure upon the part of the plaintiff to prove a cause of action, or some material fact in issue, the demurrer should have been overruled. Wilson v. Beck, 44 Kan. —, 24 Pac. Rep. 957; Railroad Co. v. Cravens, 43 Kan. 650, 23 Pac. Rep. 1044; Gardner v. King, 37 Kan. 671, 15 Pac. Rep. 920; Merket v. Smith, 33 Kan. 66, 5 Pac. Rep. 394; Wolf v. Washer, 32 Kan. 533, 4 Pac. Rep. 1036; Brown v. Railroad Co., 31 Kan. 1, 1 Pac. Rep. 605. We recommend reversal of the judgment.

PLEADING—DEMURRER—EMINENT DOMAIN—JOINER OF ACTIONS—DAMAGES—GENERAL AND SPECIAL VERDICTS.

1. Each count in a petition containing more than one cause of action must contain, in and of itself, a full and complete statement of all the facts constituting the cause of action sought to be stated, except that a count subsequent to the first may be made sufficient by a proper reference to the first or some other preceding count, without a repetition of all the facts necessary to constitute the cause of action.

2. When the first cause of action in a petition contains no claim for damages, it is error to overrule a special demurrer to said cause of action, which states as a reason therefor that said count does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

3. In the trial of an action on an appeal from the award of commissioners, in a railroad right-of-way case, a cause of action for injuries to lands owned by M. W. by reason of the appropriation of the right of way cannot be joined with an action for injuries to lands owned by M. W. and S. W. jointly. In such a case it is error to overrule a demurrer to the petition which avers the misjoinder as the reason thereof.

4. In an action for damages for injuries to lands by reason of the appropriation of a right of way for a railroad company across the same, damages must be confined to the tract of land over which the right of way is condemned, unless the owner has other lands contiguous thereto, and so situated with respect to the same that the value is appreciably augmented by their use in connection therewith as a single farm, and the appropriation of said right of way has destroyed or seriously interfered with such use.

5. When there is a discrepancy between the general and special verdicts of a jury the latter must control.

6. Where judgment is entered on the general verdict for a sum larger than is warranted by the special verdict it is error to overrule a motion to reduce said judgment to make it correspond with the special verdict.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Atchison county; W. D. GILBERT, Judge.

Geo. R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Mills & Wells, for plaintiff in error. Tomlinson & Eaton, for defendants in error.

STRANG, C. This was an appeal from the report of commissioners appointed to condemn the right of way for the plaintiff's railway. The plaintiffs below filed their amended petition in the district court of Atchison county February 4, 1888. To this petition the defendant below presented a motion to require the plaintiffs to separately state and number their alleged causes of action, which motion was overruled. A demurrer was then interposed to said petition, on the grounds: (1) That the first count or cause of action in said petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; (2) the defendant demurred to the second count or cause of action in said petition because it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and (3) defendant demurs to the petition because several causes of action are improperly joined. The demurrer was overruled. May 3d the defendant filed its amended answer, and the case went to trial before the court and a jury. May 7, 1888, the jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiffs, and also a special verdict, consisting of answers to a large number of questions submitted to them by the defendant below. The general verdict was for $2,462.09. May 10th, the defendant filed a motion to reduce the judgment, first, by $400, upon the ground that the special verdict showed the general verdict was that much too large; also by the sum of $170.59, for reason that the plaintiffs were not entitled to interest. This motion was overruled. Defendant then filed a motion for a new trial, which was also overruled, and the defendant comes here asking a review of the case by this court.

Counsel for plaintiff in error in their brief first call our attention to their demurrer to the amended petition filed in the court below, and contend that the first count or cause of action therein set forth does not contain facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. An examination of the petition satisfies us that the objection to this count of the petition is good. This cause of action fails to set up any claim for damages. Each cause of action in a petition containing more than one cause of action must "contain, in and of itself, a full and complete statement of all the facts constituting the cause of action therein intended to be stated. In other words, each count should be separate and distinct from every other count, and be complete within itself," except that a count subsequent to the first may be made sufficient by a proper reference to the first or some other preceding count. Stewart v. Balderston, 10 Kan. 145; Krutz v. Fisher, 8 Kan. 96. The first count was designed to set out a cause of action for damages to lands owned jointly by Michael and Sarah Wilkins, arising from the condemnation of the right of way of the plaintiff; but it is not complete "in and of itself." It contains no claim of damages. If it contained the necessary allegations that are wanting, so that it could stand alone as a cause of action, there would be no difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs below recovering damages to at least a portion of the land therein described. They would then have a right to recover for any damage to the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 10, because it is admitted that they are joint owners of that portion of section 10, and that it is the ground over which the right of way of the plaintiff was condemned, and its road-bed constructed. The demurrer to this cause of action must be sustained.

The second count, with its reference to the first, may state a cause of action in favor of Michael Wilkins; but, as there is a demurrer to the petition as a whole, upon the ground that distinct causes of action are joined therein, which cannot be united, and as the same question is raised by objections to evidence, we will examine this count in the light of these objections. This count alleges that the plaintiffs, Michael and Sarah Wilkins, are entitled to damages to the lands therein described by reason of injuries sustained thereto, growing out of the condemnation of the right of way of defendant railroad. The petition here avers that the lands therein described belong to Michael Wilkins as sole owner thereof. It follows, then, that Sarah Wilkins, who is made a co-plaintiff with Michael Wilkins in this count, has no interest whatever in any damages which might be awarded for injury to the land therein described. The question, then, is, can the second count, which, if it state a cause of action at all, states one in favor of Michael Wilkins alone, be united in the same petition with the first count, which attempts to set out a cause of action in favor of Michael Wilkins and Sarah Wilkins jointly? We think not. Paragraph 4166, Gen. St. 1889, is the provision in our Code relating to joinder of actions, the last clause of which reads as follows: "But the causes of action so united must all belong to one of these classes, and must affect all parties to the action, except to enforce mortgages or other liens." In this case the first of the two causes of action affects Michael and Sarah Wilkins jointly, while the second cause of action affects only Michael Wilkins. It cannot be said, then, that the second count affects all the parties to the action, and hence the Code forbids their joinder in the same petition. In Palmer v. Waddell, 22 Kan. 352, the court held that "where two or more persons have separate causes of action against the same defendant, arising from the obstruction of a natural water-course, and the injury of their lands and crops thereby, they cannot unite in the same petition to recover damages of such injuries which are plainly distinct and unconnected." Hudson v. Atchison, 12 Kan. 140; Svenson v. Plow Co., 14 Kan. 387; Schultz v. Winter, 7 Nev. 803; State v. Commission- ers, 38 Kan. 318, 16 Pac. Rep. 337; Durein v. Pontious, 34 Kan. 353, 8 Pac. Rep. 423; Jeffers v. Forbes, 28 Kan. 178. Counsel for defendants refer to the case of Commissioners v. Labore, 37 Kan. 480, 15 Pac. Rep. 577. In that case a father and two sons each owned a quarter section of land, lying together in a body. They entered into a copartnership to breed and raise cattle, and by the terms of the copartnership agreement they were to use the three-quarters of land together in the business as one tract. A highway was constructed so as to affect these lands. Damages were separately awarded to two of these parties, and none to the third. Each one for himself appealed. On the trial in the district court, by the consent of parties, the three cases were consolidated and tried together. But several judgments were rendered in favor of two of the parties for damage to their several lands, and against the third party. The court also rendered judgment for damages in favor of all the parties for injury to the use of their land under their copartnership contract. This court sustained the judgment. But it must be remembered that the several actions in the name of each of the individual owners of the three-quarters of land, and the claim for damages to their joint use and occupancy of the same, were joined in the district court, and tried together by consent of the parties, and that the improper joinder of causes of action in the case was by consent, and there was at no time any objection thereto. For the same reasons the objections to the evidence concerning damages to lands in sections 15 and 9 should have been sustained. But, aside from this, we do not think the plaintiffs below, or either of them, can recover damages to lands in sections 15 and 9 by reason of the appropriation of the right of way for the railroad of the defendant below, across, and over the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 10. We do not think these lands are in any appreciable way damaged thereby. The general rule in relation to the assessment of damages to land for injuries thereto by reason of the appropriation of a right of way by a railroad company is that the damages shall be limited to the lot of land over and across which the right of way is condemned. Under our statutes this court has extended this rule by giving a liberal construction to the phrase "lot of land," so as to include any contiguous compact body of land used as a single farm. The warrant for this seems to be found in the language of the constitution, (section 4, art. 12,) which provides that the compensation for such right of way appropriated to the use of the company includes not only the value of the property taken, but also the loss the land-owner sustains in the value of his property by being deprived of a portion of it; and also warranted by the language of the statute, (paragraph 1395, Gen. St. 1889,) a portion of which reads as follows: "And for all other damages sustained by such person or persons by reason of such right of way so appropriated." This language not only includes damages for the right of way taken, but for all other actual damages sustained; that is, the result of injury by reason of the appropriation of the right of way. But we do not think this court has ever gone so far as to say that lands situated, with respect to the right of way appropriated, like the lands described in sections 9 and 15 are, should be considered in the assessment of damages because of the appropriation of the right of way. It is true that the evidence shows that the plaintiffs pastured these lands, and to that extent used them in connection with lands in section 10. But so they might pasture the land if it was in section 36 or section 6; but we do not think that would authorize the assessment of damage there-to by reason of a right of way condemned across the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 10. These lands are not in a compact body. The land in section 9 is a mile away from the home farm, with a whole section of land belonging to a stranger intervening. But the defendant says this land corners with the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 15, and that the N. W. of 15 corners with the S. E. of 10, the lot over which the right of way was condemned, and therefore all of these lands are contiguous; and, as they are used as one farm by reason of these lands in sections 15 and 9 being pastured in connection with the home farm, it is proper under the decisions of this court to take them into consideration in assessing damages to the lands of plaintiffs below on account of the right of way over the land in section 10. If this were true, then, if the plaintiffs below owned the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of 16, and it was used as a pasture by the plaintiffs in connection with the home lands, that would have to be considered in the assessment of damages, because it cornered with lands that by a succession of corners reached the home tract, affected by the right of way. It is only when other lands are so situated with respect to the tract affected by the right of way that their value consists largely in their use as a single farm in connection with the tract affected, and the appropriation of the right of way has destroyed or seriously injured that use, that they are considered in the assessment of damages. In this case it is physically impossible for the plaintiffs below to go from their lands in section 10 to their lands either in sections 15 or 9 without going upon the lands of other owners. We think they can still reach these lands by crossing the lands of others by making a new lane at small expense; and if they cannot they fail to show that they have any right of way over other lands to these lands that may not be shut off at any time. As this case goes back for a new trial, we are of the opinion that the lands in sections 9 and 15 should be dropped out of the case.

The motion to reduce the verdict in this case should have been sustained. The special verdict, which, by its terms, covers and specifies all damages that we think could possibly arise in this case, fixes the damages in the aggregate, at a sum $400 less than the amount of the general verdict; and when there is a discrepancy between the general and special verdicts the latter controls. On the other hand, it is not error to allow interest on the sum found as damages, and the motion to strike out the item of interest was properly refused.

There are other questions raised in this case by reason of the court's refusal to give certain instructions and to submit certain questions to the jury; but, as the case will be reversed without considering these complaints, we will not notice them. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and case remanded for new trial.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

NEISWANGER V. MCCLELLAN.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—ASSUMPTION OF DEBT OF THIRD PERSON.

A purchaser who accepts a conveyance of real property, reciting that there is a mortgage lien thereon, which the purchaser assumes to pay, cannot avoid the payment of such lien by a claim that it was a verbal promise to pay, and void by the statutes of fraud.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Osborne county; CLARK A. SMITH, Judge.

Walrond, Mitchell & Heren and H. P. Welsh, for plaintiff in error. Hays & Pitts, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. The defendant in error sued the plaintiff in error in the district court of Osborne county to recover the sum of $381, with interest at 7 per cent. from March 1, 1887. He alleged in his petition that on the 1st day of February, 1887, he sold and conveyed to the plaintiff in error lot 6, in block 6, in the town of Bloomington, in said county, and a small stock of goods and merchandise. As a part consideration for the lot and goods so sold the plaintiff in error agreed to pay a certain note given by W. H. Snyder to S. S. Warren, secured by mortgage on lot 6, the payment of which the defendant in error had assumed and was bound to pay. That said note was past due at the time of the sale from defendant in error to plaintiff in error, and judgment had been obtained on it, and said lot ordered sold. That the plaintiff in error had paid all the purchase price of said lot and goods except the note secured by mortgage on said lot. That Warren caused said lot to be sold, but he only realized on the sale the sum of $89, and the defendant in error was compelled to and did pay the balance of said judgment, amounting to the sum sued for. The plaintiff in error filed an answer generally denying all the allegations in the petition. Trial was had at the October term, 1887, and the material facts are recited in the following findings of the district court:

Findings of fact: "(1) On the 1st day of May, 1886, the plaintiff became the owner of lots 6 and 7, in block 6, of the town-site of Bloomington, county of Osborne, state of Kansas, by purchase of the same by deed of conveyance of same by W. H. Snyder and S. C. Snyder, his wife, A. D. Booze and L. Booze, his wife. In said deed of conveyance it was stipulated that the plaintiff, Dorsey McClellan, should assume the payment of the mortgage of $375, with interest from that date. That on the 26th day of February, 1887, in an action then pending in the district court of said Osborne county, a judgment of foreclosure was rendered in an action in which S. S. Warren was plaintiff and Dorsey McClellan and Ann McClellan, W. H. Snyder and wife, and A. D. Booze and wife, were defendants. Judgment of foreclosure was rendered,—judgment of $395 and costs, and interest at 8 per cent. on the judgment,—and foreclosure sale ordered of the property mortgaged to secure said amount. Personal judgment was not rendered against Dorsey and McClellan and wife, but only a judgment of foreclosure. That the mortgage foreclosed in said action and upon which said judgment was rendered included with other property lots 6 and 7, in block 6, in the town-site of Bloomington, Osborne county, Kansas. That a short time prior to the 23d day of March, 1887, the plaintiff contracted to sell and did sell to the defendant a stock of goods and merchandise situated in building on lot 6, block 6, in said town of Bloomington, and in which he, McClellan, had a half interest; and also in the same transaction contracted to sell lots 6 and 7, block 6, in the town of Bloomington, as aforesaid, to the defendant, Hal. W. Neiswanger. That as a part of the consideration of the purchase price of said lots and stock of merchandise the defendant, Hal. W. Neiswanger, contracted to assume the payment of the judgment and costs above described. That during the entire transaction no mention had been made to the plaintiff, Dorsey McClellan, that the purchase was being made in the interest of any other person or for any other person than the defendant himself. The defendant took possession of the goods, and drew a part of them, at least, to Osborne, prior to the 23d day of March, 1887. That prior to the 23d day of March, 1887, defendant prepared a deed for the plaintiff, Dorsey McClellan, and Ann McClellan, to execute for lots 6 and 7, block 6, in the town-site of Bloomington, Osborne county, Kansas. That said deed was prepared, conveying said lots to David Neiswanger, instead of Hal. W. Neiswanger. That said deed contained the usual covenants of warranty, with the following exception: 'Except judgment of $395, with interest at 8 per cent., and costs of $6.80, which party of the second part assume.' That the plaintiff, Dorsey McClellan, was unable to read the deed for himself, and that the defendant, Hal. W. Neiswanger, read the deed to McClellan and wife, as running to himself, Hal. W. Neiswanger, and with the exception as above found. That the deed was signed by Dorsey McClellan and Ann McClellan on the 23d day of March, 1887, and acknowledged before Hal. W. Neiswanger, notary public, on that day. That as the deed now appears the exception in the general warranty reads: 'Except judgment of $395, with interest at 8 per cent., and costs of $6.80, which party of the first part assume.' That the court finds from the evidence this change has been made since the execution of this deed. This action was begun by the plaintiff on the 12th day of July, A. D. 1887, and the said deed from McClellan and wife to David Neiswanger was filed for record in the office of the register of deeds of Osborne county, Kansas, on the 12th of August, 1887, at 9 o'clock A. M. That on the 8th of April, 1887, an order of sale was issued by the clerk of the district court of Osborne county for the sale of the property described in the mortgage and foreclosure in the above-mentioned action. That the same was returned, no sale being made, and that on the 6th of June, 1887, another order of sale was issued, upon which the sheriff of said county proceeded and did sell lots 6 and 7, in block 6, in the town-site of Bloomington, in said county, and that the said lot 6 was sold to W. H. Snyder for $28, and that lot 7 was sold to Hal. W. Neiswanger for $15. That at the date of said sale said judgment and interest amounted to $406.67, and the costs of suit to that time, $26.90. That by the sale of said lots was realized $103. The judgment and costs at that time amounted to $433.57; the amount realized from the sale of the lots, $103; which leaves a balance of $330.57. The interest on that amount to date is $9.77; the total to date, $340.34. That the sale made under said order has since been confirmed by the said district court, and deeds to said lots made by the sheriff in pursuance of said sale. That the remainder of said judgment was paid by W. H. Snyder, and that the plaintiff, Dorsey McClellan, has paid W. H. Snyder the full amount of said judgment before the beginning of this action. That the deed above mentioned, executed on the 23d day of March, 1887, from Dorsey McClellan and Ann McClellan, his wife, to David Neiswanger, was immediately delivered to Hal. W. Neiswanger, and has not since been in the possession of the plaintiff. That the change in the covenant of warranty was made without the knowledge of plaintiff; also that neither party to the suit knew of the mistake in the description of the lots until very recently, and long after the commencement of this suit." Conclusions of law: "The court finds as a matter of law that the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant the sum of $340.34, with interest from this date at 8 per cent., and costs." A motion for a new trial was filed and overruled, and the court made these additional findings: "The court finds that the deed made by Dorsey McClellan and wife to David Neiswanger was not filed for record until some time after the bringing of this action; that the plaintiff was ignorant of the fact that there was any mistake in the description of the lands intended to be conveyed, and of the fact that said deed run to David Neiswanger; that the defendant was also ignorant of the mistake in the description of the lots until a few days before the commencement of this trial; that the plaintiff had no actual knowledge of the mistake in the description, or that it run to David Neiswanger, until the commencement of this trial; that during the trial, when the fact was made known to the court that there was a mistake in the description of the lots intended to be conveyed, the court offered to require the plaintiff to amend his petition to conform to the facts proven in this particular, and to tender a deed conveying the lots intended to be conveyed; that the defendant's attorney at that time did not demand such deed; that on the argument of the motion for a new trial the attorney of the defendant, among other things, complained that no deed had been executed or delivered conveying to the defendant or other person from the plaintiff the lands described in the plaintiff's petition. Whereupon the court required the plaintiff to bring into court a deed properly acknowledged and executed, conveying to the defendant the lots intended to be conveyed in the original deed, conveying all the right that the plaintiff had on the 23d day of March, 1887, with general covenants of warranty against all incumbrances except the judgment in question in this action; whereupon the attorney of the defendant stated at the time that the defendant did not waive any rights which he may have or which he may have had by reason of the fact that the deed was not executed and delivered before the commencement of this action; whereupon the plaintiff and wife tendered to the said defendant a deed to lots 6 and 7, in block 6, in the town of Bloomington, said deed containing a stipulation that the grantee assumes to pay said judgment; whereupon the said defendant refused to accept said deed, and stated as a reason therefor that the same did not conform to the agreement of the parties, nor the order of the court; whereupon the court directed the plaintiff to execute and deliver to the defendant a deed conveying said lots without including in said deed the aforesaid stipulation, 'that the grantee assumes to pay said judgment,' which the plaintiff accordingly did on the 28th day of October, A. D. 1887, said deed being executed and acknowledged by both plaintiff and wife to the said defendant, which deed was delivered to the defendant; whereupon the court, on the 28th day of October, 1887, overruled said motion for a new trial."

The case is brought here for review, and numerous errors are assigned, and among them it is claimed that the facts set forth in the petition are not sufficient to authorize any judgment against the plaintiff in error. The precise question with respect to this contention is that there is no allegation in the petition with whom the contract was made assuming the payment of the indebtedness to Warren. There is this allegation in the petition, following the statement, that the plaintiff below had sold to Nelswanger lots 6 and 7, in block 6, and a stock of merchandise, and that in part payment of the same "the said defendant agreed to pay and discharge a certain note given by one W. H. Snyder to one S. S. Warren, which note was for the sum of $375 and interest, and costs due thereon, and was secured by a mortgage on said lot, and the payment of which note this plaintiff had assumed." It is plain from this statement that the agreement was with the plaintiff, and that the allegation was sufficient to support the judgment. The next contention is that the promise to pay the mortgage was a verbal one, and not binding within the statutes of fraud. There are several very conclusive answers to this question, —one of which is that, having secured and retained the possession, use, and enjoyment of the property by virtue of the contract, he will not be heard to say now that it was not binding upon him. And another very good reason is that this court has said in the case of Morris Center v. McQuesten, 18 Kan. 476, that a promise made to a debtor, for a valuable consideration, to pay his debt to a third person, is not a promise to answer for the debt of another person, within the statutes of fraud, which apply only to promises made to creditors; and such a promise need not be in writing. Another good reason is that it is a part of the purchaser's money, and the vendor has a right to direct to whom it shall be paid. Another very good answer is that he accepted a conveyance from McClellan and wife, in which there was a written assumption of this particular indebtedness; for it abundantly appears, after the conveyance was reformed so as to express the real contract between the parties, that this plaintiff in error had expressly obligated himself in writing to pay this special indebtedness. The petition alleged that the plaintiff had agreed to pay the mortgage, and the defendant in error had the right to prove the agreement to pay in the manner developed at the trial; and in doing so it cannot be successfully contended that irrelevant and incompetent evidence was admitted. Again, it is said that there was not sufficient evidence to support the findings of fact made by the trial court. This objection is made upon the theory, as we gather it from the brief, that parol evidence is not admissible to contradict a writing. Counsel mean that when the deed from McClellan and wife to Nelswanger was introduced in evidence it was discovered, or rather, it was charged, that it had been changed since its execution and delivery in this respect, to-wit, when executed it read that the mortgage indebtedness on the lot was stated, and these words followed: "Which party of the second part assume;" but when introduced in evidence it read, "Which party of the first part assume." The court found upon sufficient evidence that the word "second" had been changed since the execution and delivery of the deed to "first," and this certainly was no violation of the rule. Another complaint is that the court allowed 8 per cent. interest on the amount claimed, when the petition only claimed 7 per cent. We have been through this record carefully several times, and read the evidence attentively. The evidence and the concurrence of the circumstances surrounding the transaction very strongly impresses us with the belief that substantial justice has been done between these parties by the judgment rendered in the court below, and the errors complained of are not sufficient to reverse under these circumstances. The judgment must be modified so as to bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent., and with this modification we recommend that it be affirmed.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—APPROPRIATION OF PUBLIC MONIES—ISSUANCE OF BONDS.

Chapter 236 of the Session Laws of 1887, being an act to authorize Mound City township, in Linn county, to vote bonds to reimburse citizens of the township for sums advanced to aid in the construction of a court-house, is not unconstitutional.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Linn county; C. O. FRENCH, Judge.

W. R. Biddle and Biddle & Smith, for plaintiffs in error. S. H. Allen, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This was an action brought in the district court of Linn county to perpetually enjoin and restrain the board of county commissioners of Linn county from levying a tax to pay the interest upon certain bonds, issued under chapter 236 of the Session Laws of 1887. It is disclosed in the record before us that, prior to the year 1885, Linn county was the owner of a tract of land in Mound City, known as the "Public Square;" that during that year, upon the application of citizens of the township in which Mound City is situated, leave was granted by the board of county commissioners of the county to build a court-house on such public square; that certain citizens procured subscriptions from other citizens of the township for the purpose of erecting a court-house; a committee of citizens then proceeded to and did erect the walls of a suitable building for a court-house, and put on a roof, but no floors were laid, and no doors or windows were put in; that after the erection of the walls of said building, and during the year 1886, the building, in its unfinished condition, was formally donated to the county, and accepted by the board of county commissioners, as a court-house, and taken possession of and completed at the expense of the county, and has since been used as a court-house and for no other purpose; and that the building and grounds belong to Linn county. The building cost, in the condition it was donated to the county by the citizens' committee, $14,500, which had been contributed by various citizens of the township. In the year 1887 the legislature passed chapter 236, "An Act to authorize Mound City township, in Linn county, to vote bonds not to exceed seventeen thousand dollars, to reimburse citizens of said township for sums advanced by said citizens to aid in the construction of a court-house in Mound City." Subsequently an election was held in the township, and it was determined, by a vote of 240 for to 143 against, that the bonds of the township should be issued for $14,500, and the vote was duly canvassed by the board of county commissioners and the bonds issued, showing upon their face that they were issued under the authority of chapter 236, Sess. Laws 1887. This suit was commenced by a tax-payer of the township, and the court below granted a perpetual injunction against the defendants below, restraining them from levying a tax to pay any interest on the bonds issued under said chapter 236, holding that the same was unconstitutional. The plaintiffs in error bring the record here for review.

It is urged that the legislature had the right to authorize the township to issue its bonds for the purpose designated, notwithstanding the fact that there may have been no legal obligation resting upon the township to refund the different sums subscribed and paid by the various citizens, to be used in the construction of this court-house. The proposition involved is whether or not this law, which recognizes the right, and authorizes the municipality, upon a vote of the people, to assume and pay certain obligations of an equitable character, can be upheld. One of the canons of constitutional construction in this state is that no slight difference of opinion will authorize the judiciary to set aside the action of the law-making power, or to nullify an act of the legislature. The judicial department should not interfere with the legislative conscience, unless there be a clear violation of some provision of the constitution. State v. Barrett, 27 Kan. 218. Text-writers and courts of the highest legal learning and respectability have said that the fact that a claim against a municipal or public corporation is not such an one as the law recognizes as a legal obligation forms no constitutional objection to the validity of a law imposing a tax and directing its payment. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 75; U. S. v. Railroad Co., 17 Wall. 322; New Orleans v. Clark, 95 U. S. 644; Shaw v. Dennis, 5 Gillman, 405; Dennis v. Maynard, 15 Ill. 477; Layton v. New Orleans, 12 La. Ann. 515; Carter v. Proprietors, 104 Mass. 236; Thomas v. Leland, 24 Wend. 65; Town of Guilford v. Supervisors, 13 N. Y. 143; Brewster v. City of Syracuse, 19 N. Y. 114; Darlington v. Mayor, etc., 31 N. Y. 164; Brown v. Mayor, 63 N. Y. 239; Mayor, etc., v. Bank, 111 N. Y. 446, 18 N. E. Rep. 618; Sinton v. Ashbury, 41 Cal. 525; Creighton v. San Francisco, 42 Cal. 446; Lycoming v. Union, 15 Pa. St. 166; Cooley, Const. Lim. 258.

The reasoning in the adjudicated cases cited is that the legislature may determine what moneys may be raised and expended, and what taxation for municipal purposes may be imposed; and it certainly does not exceed its constitutional authority when it compels a municipality to pay a claim which has some meritorious basis to rest upon. From the numerous authorities upon the question of legislative control over municipalities, Judge Cooley lays down the following proposition: "That the legislature has the undoubted power to compel the municipal bodies to perform their functions as local governments under their charters, and to recognize, meet, and discharge the duties and obligations properly resting upon them as such, whether they be legal or merely equitable or moral; and for this purpose it may require them to exercise the power of taxation whenever and wherever it may be deemed necessary or expedient." Cooley, Const. Lim. 283. The court of appeals of New York recognizes the doctrine of large legislative discretion, upon the question of raising and appropriating public money, and of imposing a tax upon towns and other municipal or political divisions, whenever it will be promotive of the public welfare. The legislature is not confined in its appropriation of the public moneys, or of the sums to be raised by taxation in favor of individuals, to cases in which a legal demand exists against the state. It can thus recognize claims founded in equity and justice, in the largest sense of these terms, or in gratitude and charity. Independent of express constitutional restrictions, it can make appropriations of money whenever the public well-being requires or will be promoted by it, and it is the judge of what is for the public good. It can, moreover, under the power to levy taxes, apportion the public burdens among all the tax-paying citizens of the state, or among those of a particular section or political division. Town of Guilford v. Supervisors, supra. In speaking upon this same subject, in the case of Booth v. Woodbury, 32 Conn. 118, Mr. Justice BUTLER said: "To make a tax law unconstitutional on this ground, it must be apparent at first blush that the community taxed can have no possible interest in the purpose to which their money is to be applied." In the case of Sinton v. Ashbury, supra, CROCKETT, J., stated the rule: "It is established by an overwhelming weight of authority, and I believe is conceded on all sides, that the legislature has the constitutional power to direct and control the affairs and property of a municipal corporation for municipal purposes, provided it does not impair the obligation of a contract, and by appropriate legislation may so control its affairs as ultimately to compel it, out of the funds in its treasury, or by taxation to be imposed for that purpose, to pay a demand, when properly established, which in good conscience it ought to pay, even though there be no legal liability to pay it." The law challenged in this case is not subject to the objections urged in the numerous cases cited. The act in question provided that the bonds of the municipality should not be issued for these assumed obligations until the question had been submitted to the people of the township, at an election called for that purpose. The notice of such election had to contain a statement of the purpose for which and the conditions under which bonds were to be issued. The legislature having said that these obligations might be paid, and a majority of the legal voters of the township having decided that it was just and equitable that such subscriptions to the court-house fund should be assumed by the municipality, we cannot see that the law is subject to any constitutional objection. Following the maxim which we regard as the true and correct rule, that there should be great caution in arriving at a conclusion adverse to the validity of a legislative act, and believing that the law in question is within the constitutional power of the legislature to pass, we recommend a reversal of the judgment of the trial court.

KANSAS, N. & D. RY. CO. v. MAHLER.

EMINENT DOMAIN—LOCATION OF RAILROAD IN STREET—ABUTTING OWNERS.

To entitle an abutting lot-owner to recover damages for locating a line of railroad, under the authority of the city council, in one of the streets of a city, there must be a practical obstruction of the street in front of his premises, so as to virtually deprive him of ingress to and egress from his property. Railway Co. v. Cuykendall, 42 Kan. 234, 21 Pac. Rep. 1051, and Railway Co. v. Smith, 44 Kan. —, 25 Pac. Rep. 623, followed. (Syllabus by Green, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Bourbon county; C. O. FRENCH, Judge.

Ware, Riddle & Cory and Ira D. Brouson, for plaintiff in error. Hill & Chenault and Crider & Pritchard, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. Casper Mahler brought his action against the Kansas, Nebraska & Dakota Railway Company to recover $2,000, damages for building its line of railroad in front of two lots on Barbee street, in the city of Ft. Scott, in such a manner as to obstruct his ingress to and egress from his premises and dwelling. A verdict and judgment were obtained for $800 against the plaintiff in error, and it now seeks a reversal of the same, and claims manifest error. The plaintiff in error had the right, under a city ordinance, to build its road in Barbee street, which was 60 feet wide, and the special findings of the jury indicated that, at the nearest point, the railroad track was 25 feet from the plaintiff's property. The measurement of the city engineer showed the space to be from 27½ to 32 feet from the line of the lot upon which the dwelling was located to the track of the plaintiff in error. The facts, as they appear in the record, bring this case within the rule laid down in Railway Co. v. Cuykendall, 42 Kan. 234, 21 Pac. Rep. 1051, and Railway Co. v. Smith, 44 Kan. —, 25 Pac. Rep. 623. The above cases settle the questions involved in this case, and, upon the authority of those cases, we recommend a reversal of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

CHICAGO, K. & N. RY. CO. v. NEIMAN.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. March 7, 1891.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—OPINION EVIDENCE.

The opinion of a witness, giving in the lump the amount of damages, present and prospective, which a land-owner will sustain by the appropriation of a right of way for a railroad through his land, is not admissible as evidence. Railroad Co. v. Kuhn, 38 Kan. 675, 17 Pac. Rep. 322, followed.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Harvey county; L. Houk, Judge.

Ady & Henry and W. F. Evans, for plaintiff in error. Bowman & Bucher, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. The Chicago, Kansas & Nebraska Railway Company instituted proceedings to condemn a right of way for its railroad through Harvey county. A strip of land through the farm of I. H. Neiman, amounting to 7 24-100 acres, was desired, and the commissioners who had been appointed appraised the value of the land appropriated at $289.60, and estimated the damages for depreciation and injury to adjoining lands, not appropriated, at $410, making a total of $699.60. Neiman appealed to the district court, where a trial was had with a jury, and where damages were awarded in the sum of $1,611.70. The principal complaint, and the only one that we need notice, is the admission by the court of incompetent testimony. The following question was asked and the answer given over the objections of the railroad company: "Question. How much less, in your opinion, was the farm worth after the railroad had established their track through it, irrespective of any benefit to be derived from said track, taking into consideration the damage, present and prospective, the incidental loss, inconvenience, present and prospective, which may reasonably be expected to exist from maintaining the said railroad track to be continued permanently? Answer. $2,800 less, or $9,200 afterwards." A substantially similar question was asked another witness, and an objection was made at the time, but the objection was overruled, and the witness answered, "About $1,300." It is contended by the plaintiff in error that under these rules the province of the jury was invaded by allowing the witnesses to determine by their opinions the exact question that the jury was called to decide. The precise question presented was determined by this court in Railroad Co. v. Kuhn, 38 Kan. 675, 17 Pac. Rep. 322. The question asked and answered in that case was almost identical with the one propounded in this, and the court held that the admission of the testimony was erroneous, and that it was virtually asking the witness to decide the case for the jury, and to advise them what their verdict should be. It cannot be said that the error was an immaterial one, as the witnesses differed widely in their opinions of the values of the property and of the damages suffered. The estimates ranged all the way from $800 up to $2,800, and those witnesses who had assumed the functions of the jury, and lumped the damages suffered, were among those who placed the damages at the highest sum. The reasoning and cases cited in Railroad Co. v. Kuhn, supra, are equally applicable here, and must rule in the present case. We do not deem it necessary to notice the other points that have been discussed in the case. The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. All the justices concurring.

LEAVENWORTH, N. & S. RY. CO. v. HERLEY et al.

EMINENT DOMAIN—COMPENSATION—OPINION EVIDENCE—ELEMENTS OF DAMAGE.

1. Cases with respect to witnesses testifying as to damages referred to and followed.
2. The owner of land taken and appropriated by a railroad company for railroad purposes in condemnation proceedings can recover in such proceedings only full and complete compensation for all his losses suffered by him, with respect to his entire tract of land, as a result of such appropriation and the construction and operation of the railroad in a legal and proper manner; and cannot recover in such proceedings for independent trespasses committed by the railroad company or its agents outside of the land appropriated by the railroad company. For the recovery of damages for any such independent trespasses the landowner must resort to some other action or proceeding.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Leavenworth county; ROBERT CROZIER, Judge.

Geo. R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robert Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. L. B. & S. E. Wheat, for defendants in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was a condemnation proceeding instituted by the Leavenworth, Northern & Southern Railway Company to procure a right of way through certain lands in Leavenworth county, some of which lands belonged to the present defendants in error, Mary Herley, David F. Herley, Emma Kennedy, William Herley, and Katie Herley. The commissioners awarded to the defendants in error $317.20 as the value of the land taken, and $475 as damages to the land not taken, making a total compensation to the defendants in error of $792.20. The defendants in error appealed to the district court, and in that court became the plaintiffs, while the aforesaid railway company became the defendant. Two trials were had in the district court. At the second trial, which was before the court and a jury, a general verdict and judgment were rendered in favor of the plaintiffs below and against the railway company, awarding to such plaintiffs the sum of $5,000 as damages. The value of the land taken and the damages to that not taken were not found separately by the court or jury. The railway company brings the case to this court, and ask for a reversal of the aforesaid judgment, for several reasons, among which are the following:

1. The railway company claims that the court below erroneously permitted certain witnesses for the plaintiff to testify directly as to the amount of the damages which the witnesses believed the plaintiffs sustained by reason of the defendant's procuring its right of way and constructing its railway across the plaintiffs' land, or, in other words, that the court below erred in permitting such witnesses to testify as to the amount which they believed the plaintiffs were entitled to recover as damages; and the railway company cites in support of this claim the following cases: Railroad Co. v. Kuhn, 38 Kan. 675-677, 17 Pac. Rep. 322, and cases there cited; Railroad Co. v. Ross, 40 Kan. 605, 606, 20 Pac. Rep. 197; Railroad Co. v. Muller, 44 Kan. —, 25 Pac. Rep. 210, 211, and cases there cited. See, also, Roberts v. Commissioners, 21 Kan. 248, 253, and cases there cited; Water Co. v. Knapp, 33 Kan. 753, 756, 7 Pac. Rep. 568; Railroad Co. v. Dill, 41 Kan. 737, 21 Pac. Rep. 778; Railroad Co. v. Nelman, ante 22, (just decided.) We suppose that the railway company in the present case will admit that a witness sufficiently competent may testify as to the value of the land before the taking of the right of way and the value of the land afterwards, and indeed as to values generally, so far as the same may have application to the case; and that he may also testify in detail with regard to the situation of the land, and with regard to all things connected therewith which might tend to render the land more valuable or less valuable, or which might constitute elements of value or want of value, or that might tend to prove value or a want of value; and that the witness might also testify as to every fact which might constitute an element of damage or tend to prove damage. See the cases of Railroad Co. v. Ehret, 41 Kan. 22 et seq., 20 Pac. Rep. 538, and cases there cited; Commissioners v. Labore, 37 Kan. 480, 484, 485, 15 Pac. Rep. 577. But the railway company claims that a witness cannot testify in comprehensive terms to the amount of damages which he may think the land-owner has suffered or may suffer by reason of the appropriation of the right of way. It has been suggested in favor of a witness' giving direct testimony as to the amount of damages to be recovered, that as the amount of the damages to be recovered is the final result to be reached upon the testimony of all the witnesses, each witness should be permitted to state in direct and explicit terms just how much he thinks the damages are. The railway company answers that this cannot be done, for the simple reason that the amount of damages to be recovered is the final result to be reached in the action,—the final fact to be ascertained by the jury; and that the jury alone, and not the witness, is the proper tribunal to determine this fact, which is generally an exceedingly comprehensive and complex fact, depending upon and including innumerable details. Suppose that the plaintiff in an action for personal injuries—an action for assault and battery, for instance—should be a witness, would it be proper to ask him such questions as these: How much were you damaged? What is the amount of your damage? What amount are you entitled to recover? We do not think it is necessary to determine whether the court below committed any material error in permitting witnesses to testify directly as to damages or not, and we shall therefore pass to the next question.

2. The railway company also claims that in cases like the present the owner of the land taken can recover only full and complete compensation for all his losses suffered by him with respect to his entire tract of land by reason of the appropriation by the railway company of its right of way and of other lands, if other lands are taken, and by reason of the construction and operation of its railway in a legal and proper manner, and cannot recover in such cases for independent trespasses committed by the railway company or its agents outside of the land appropriated by the railway company; and that for the recovery of damages for any such independent trespasses the land-owner must resort to some other action or proceeding. And the railway company cites the case of Railroad Co. v. Usher, 42 Kan. 637 et seq., 22 Pac. Rep. 734, and cases there cited. See, also, State v. Armell, 8 Kan. 288; Railway Co. v. Muhlman, 17 Kan. 224; Reinsner v. Railroad Co., 27 Kan. 382, 389; Railroad Co. v. Grovier, 41 Kan. 686, 21 Pac. Rep. 779; Railroad Co. v. Willets, 45 Kan. —, 25 Pac. Rep. 576, and cases there cited. The railway company claims that the court below erred in permitting the plaintiffs below to recover for trespasses outside of the right of way, and we think so too. Evidence was first introduced, over the objections of the defendant, by the plaintiffs concerning trespasses of this character, and the court afterwards refused to instruct the jury as requested by the defendant, among other things, as follows: "That the jury should not allow any damages to the plaintiffs on account of earth or trees having been thrown outside of the right of way appropriated and onto the land of the plaintiffs in the construction of the road." On the contrary, the court gave to the jury the following, among other, instructions: "That in determining the amount of the plaintiffs' damages in this case the jury should include . . . the amount of all damage to plaintiffs, if any, caused by the removal of earth from defendant's right of way in constructing its road on plaintiffs' land outside of such right of way, and placing such earth so near plaintiffs' land that from natural causes the same may have spread out over plaintiffs' land, and all damage to plaintiffs, if any, caused by the removal of stumps and trees and brush from that right of way onto plaintiffs' land outside of that right of way in constructing defendant's railroad." The railway company claims the foregoing refusal to instruct the jury, and also the giving of the foregoing instruction, constituted material error. In this kind of proceeding the judgment for compensation can be only an award of damages which cannot be enforced by execution, (Railroad Co. v. Wilder, 17 Kan. 239, 247, and cases there cited; Railway Co. v. Moore, 24 Kan. 323, 328; Water Co. v. Knapp, 33 Kan. 752, 756, 757;) while every one knows that in a regular action for a trespass the judgment is otherwise, and can be enforced by execution. It is probably not necessary to mention any of the other claims of error on the part of the railway company. The defendants in error, who were plaintiffs below, answer the railway company's claims of error by saying that the questions are not properly brought or presented to this court; but, after a careful consideration of the points made by the defendants in error, we are of the opinion that they are wholly untenable. The proceeding in this court is founded upon a case made in the district court for the supreme court, and in such a case thus made and brought to this court it is not necessary that the entire record of the case in the district court, or indeed any portion of the record thereof, copied literally, should be brought to the supreme court. All that is necessary is that the case made for the supreme court should include therein a statement of so much of what occurred in the case in the district court as will be necessary to present to the supreme court the errors complained of. Civil Code, § 547. The defendants in error also present another matter as a defense to the claims of error made by the railway company. It seems that when the court below rendered judgment in favor of the defendants in error and against the railway company it included in its judgment an order that the railway company, in order to be entitled to continue in the use of its right of way through the land of the plaintiffs below, should pay to such plaintiffs the aforesaid sum of $5,000, with interest, within 30 days. This judgment was rendered November 10, 1888, and of course the 30 days given by the court within which the railway company was required to pay said $5,000 has long ago expired. How these matters affect this proceeding in error it is difficult to understand. We suppose that the railway company has the right to institute proceedings in error in the supreme court to have the decision of the district court reviewed by the supreme court. Civil Code, § 542; Const. art. 3, §§ 1-3. We suppose also that it has the right to have a stay of proceedings in the district court while the case is pending in the supreme court. Civil Code, § 551 et seq. We suppose also that the railway company has deposited the amount awarded by the condemnation commissioners with the county treasurer, and given bond as provided by law. Act relating to corporations, § 239, (Gen. St. 1889, par. 1395.) And we also suppose that the railway company has given a sufficient bond for a stay of proceedings in the district court while the case is pending in this court. But how can this matter affect this case as it is now presented? This same kind of proceeding was referred to in the case of Railway Co. v. Whitaker, 42 Kan. 634, 22 Pac. Rep. 733, and a remedy was there suggested. See, also, Railroad Co. v. Callender, 13 Kan. 496. But counsel for the defendants in error say that these cases ought to be overruled, so far as this matter is concerned. Counsel, also, for the defendants in error, in further reply to the claims of error made by the railway company, say that all the authorities or decisions relied on by the railway company should be overruled. We think otherwise, however. For the error of the district court in permitting the plaintiffs to recover for independent trespasses its judgment will be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings. All the justices concurring.

RUGGLES et al. v. CLARE.

DEED—ESTATE CONVEYED—EFFECT.

1. A deed will not be construed to create an estate upon condition, unless the language to that effect is so clear that no room is left for any other construction.

2. A warranty deed that does "hereby sell and convey unto R., to have and to hold to the said R., and to his heirs, forever," an undivided half of a tract of land, "in consideration of clearing the whole of all taxes now due, and tax claims of all kinds for which the land has been sold, or is now subject to sale," is an absolute conveyance, and on its delivery vests title in the grantee, and is not a deed upon condition precedent or subsequent. Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Lyon county; CHARLES B. GRAVES, Judge.

W. A. Randolph and Ed. S. Waterbury, for plaintiffs in error. Kellogg & Sedgwick, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. This was an action of ejectment, and for the rents, issues, and profits of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 27, township 15, range 12, in Lyon county, commenced August 7, 1885, by John Clare, as plaintiff, against these plaintiffs in error and one John Bolin, as defendants. Bolin was an occupant claiming under a void tax-deed. His answer was a general denial; and the judgment which was finally rendered in the case, at the October term, 1887, was—First, against Bolin and in favor of Clare for the recovery of the land, but that Clare be not let into possession until he should refund the taxes which Bolin had paid, with interest as provided by the statute in such cases, and should pay the value of Bolin's improvements, less the value of the use and occupation; second, against Bolin, and in favor of the plaintiffs in error, for an undivided half of the land, but that they be not let into possession until they had refunded to Bolin one-half the taxes he had paid, with interest, etc., and one-half of the value of his improvement, less one-half of the value of his use and occupation; the value of the improvements and the use and occupation in both cases to be afterwards determined. The answer to the petition by the defendants Ruggles, filed August 19, 1885, consisted of two divisions or counts, the first being a special denial. The second count of their answer commenced, "And for a second and further defense and cross-petition against the plaintiff, and against their said co-defendant, Fredrick Bolin," and sets up their claims to an undivided half of the land as heirs of R. M. Ruggles, deceased, under a deed therefor made by the plaintiff Clare to said R. M. Ruggles, on the 28th day of March, 1873, and in the life-time of said R. M. Ruggles, and alleges that Clare and Bolin deny their said right, and unlawfully keep them out of possession, and asks judgment for possession accordingly. To this defendant Bolin filed answer, September 5, 1885, consisting of general denial. On the 16th day of September, 1875, Clare filed a "reply to that portion of the answer of the defendants Ruggles described as a second and further defense, and numbered second;" which reply is in two divisions or counts, the first count being a denial, and the second count commencing, "And plaintiff, further replying, says," and sets out a copy of the deed from Clare to R. M. Ruggles, under which these plaintiffs in error claim, and alleges a breach on the part of Ruggles in the conditions on which the conveyance was made, and a failure of the consideration therefor, and a forfeiture of title accordingly. To the second count of this reply of Clare the defendants Ruggles filed a reply, consisting of a general denial, but this was afterwards withdrawn by consent, and the Ruggles heirs filed a demurrer instead to the second count or division of the plaintiff's reply, upon the ground that the same did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to their claim, as stated in the second count of their answer. On the hearing of this demurrer, July 19, 1886, the court sustained the demurrer; and afterwards plaintiff dismissed the cause as to the defendants Ruggles, and took time in which to file an amended "reply." Clare's amended reply to the second count of the answer of the defendants Ruggles was accordingly filed on the 13th day of September, 1886, and it was word for word the same as the original reply, except that the amended reply contained these words, which were not in the original reply, to-wit: "Plaintiff further avers that the estate of R. M. Ruggles is wholly insolvent, and nothing whatever can be collected of it." This amended reply was in turn demurred to by the defendants Ruggles, upon the same ground as was the original reply, but this time the demurrer was overruled, to which due exception was taken. On the 28th day of January, 1887, the defendants Ruggles filed a reply to the amended reply of Clare, treating their answer as a cross-petition, and the amended reply of Clare as an answer to it; and thus the pleadings stood at the final trial, which took place on the 26th of October, 1887. The trial was to the court without a jury, October 26, 1887. At the conclusion of the evidence touching the question of title, the following proceeding was had: "The court having announced the intention of taking the case under advisement, it was in open court agreed by all parties that, if the judgment should be against the defendant Bolin, upon the issues of the title, the amount to be refunded and paid to him for improvements, less the value of his use and occupation of the premises, as provided by statute in such cases, if the court should adjudge him entitled thereto, should be determined and ascertained in the manner provided by statute after the final judicial determination of the question of title in the district court; or if said cause should by either party be carried for review to the supreme court within a reasonable time, then after such determination under the proceedings in the supreme court; and thereupon the [district] court took said cause under advisement."

On the 9th day of February, 1888, the court announced and made his findings of fact in writing, as follows: "(1) A patent in due form was duly issued by the government of the United States on the 1st day of August, 1860, to this plaintiff, John Clare, whereby he became the owner of the land in question, being the land located by John Clare, as assignee of Catherine Fike, of military land warrant No. 82,162, issued under the military bounty act of congress of March 3, 1855. (2) On the 15th day of February, 1865, the county clerk of Lyon county, Kan., issued to L. D. Bailey a tax-deed purporting to convey said land to L. D. Bailey, based upon the sale of the land to him for the delinquent taxes of 1860, and payment of the subsequent taxes of 1861 and 1862, and which deed was recorded in the office of the register of deeds of said county on the 10th day of July, 1865. (3) On the 1st day of April, 1871, the county clerk of said county issued a tax-deed in due form for said land to S. H. Dodge, based on the sale of 1866, for the delinquent taxes of 1865, to L. D. Bailey, and the assignment of the sale certificate by him to Dodge, which deed was duly acknowledged, and on the 20th day of April, 1871, duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds of said Lyon county. (4) On the 26th day of March, 1873, this plaintiff, John Clare, with his wife, Susan A. Clare, duly executed and delivered a deed of the conveyance of the undivided one-half of said land to R. M. Ruggles, which deed having been on the 15th day of April, 1873, duly acknowledged, the same was, with due certificate of the acknowledgment thereof, duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds of said Lyon county, Kan., on the 19th day of April, 1873, which deed is in words and figures following, to-wit: 'Know all men, that John Clare, of the city of Covington, county of Kenton, and state of Kentucky, for and in consideration of the payment of all back taxes now due on the land herein described, and the redemption of the same from all tax claims of all kinds, and the clearance of that half of the same not hereby conveyed from all taxes now due and tax claims for which the said land may have been sold, and now due, and for which it is now subject to sale, does hereby sell and convey unto R. M. Ruggles, of Emporia, Kansas, the following real estate, to-wit: The undivided one-half of the south-west quarter of section number twenty-seven, (27,) in township fifteen, (15,) range twelve, (12,) containing one hundred and sixty (160) acres; being the land located by John Clare, January 11, 1859, upon military land warrant No. 82,162, in the name of Catherine Fike, as shown by the record in the register's office at Lecompton, Kan. Said land warrant was issued under the military bounty act of March 3, 1855. The undivided one-half is hereby conveyed to said R. M. Ruggles in consideration of clearing the whole of all taxes now due, and tax claims of all kinds for which said land has been sold, and is now subject to sale, together with the appurtenances thereto belonging, to have and to hold the same to the said R. M. Ruggles, his heirs and assigns, forever; the grantor hereby covenanting that the title so conveyed is unincumbered, and that he will warrant and defend the same against all claims whatsoever. In witness whereof the said John Clare, together with Susan A. Clare, his wife, who hereby relinquishes all right of expectancy of dower in and to the land hereby conveyed, have hereunto set their hands and seals this 26th day of March, A. D. 1873. JOHN CLARE. SUSAN A. CLARE.' (5) That on the 15th day of April, 1873, R. M. Ruggles commenced an action in the name of John Clare, as plaintiff, against Solomon H. Dodge, as defendant, in the district court of Lyon county, state of Kansas, for the possession of the land in question. The defendant therein, S. H. Dodge, duly appeared and answered, denying the plaintiff's title, and defended therein, and upon the final trial offered in evidence the tax-deed described in paragraph numbered 2 of these findings, in connection with a subsequent deed, duly executed and acknowledged and recorded, of the conveyance of said land by L. D. Bailey to him, said Dodge, and said Dodge likewise gave in evidence and put in issue the validity of two other tax-deeds, to-wit, the deed described in paragraph numbered 3 of these findings, and a tax-deed in due form, issued and acknowledged by the county clerk of said county on the 30th day of October, 1874, and on the 31st day of October, 1874, duly recorded in the register of deeds' office of said county, of the said land to S. H. Dodge, based on the sale of said land in 1871 to him for the delinquent taxes of 1870, and payment of the subsequent tax of 1871; and it was duly admitted on said trial that said land was vacant and unoccupied, and final judgment was duly rendered therein on the — day of May, 1876, upon the general verdict of the jury in favor of said John Clare, and against said Solomon H. Dodge, for the recovery of said land, together with his costs therein, taxed at $37.35, and that he should not be let into possession of said land until he paid to said Dodge $348.26 as and for the taxes which said Dodge, as the holder of the aforesaid tax-deeds, had paid on said land, and the interest, costs, and charges thereon; said sum of $348.26 dollars constituted the back taxes on said land at the time of and mentioned in said deed from Clare to Ruggles, with the accumulated costs and interest thereon, and said judgment for back taxes remains wholly unsatisfied on the records of said court. (6) That said R. M. Ruggles was an attorney at law, and had the exclusive charge, care, and labor of the conduct of the litigation described in paragraph numbered 5 of these findings, in behalf of said Clare, from the commencement to the end; that said R. M. Ruggles died intestate on or about the 24th day of April, 1879, leaving the defendant Sue L. Ruggles, his widow, and the defendants Robert and Willie Ruggles, his children, who are his only heirs; and the claims against said R. M. Ruggles, deceased, exceeded the assets of his estate. (7) That on the 24th day of August, 1880, the county clerk of said Lyon county duly executed, acknowledged, and delivered a tax-deed of the land in question to J. M. Steele, which deed was on the same day duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds of said county, which deed is based on the sale of said land on the 7th day of September, 1875, and the first Tuesday of September, for the delinquent taxes of 1874, to the county for the want of bidders, and subsequent assignment of the sale certificate by the county clerk to L. A. Wood, and by him to said J. M. Steele. A copy of said tax-deed is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part hereof. The notice, and only notice, given by the county treasurer of the sale of land in the year 1875, for delinquent taxes, stated that such sale would be on the 3d day of September, and the first Tuesday of that month, in 1875, and no notice whatever was given of the meeting of the county board of equalization for the year 1874, and no meeting of said board was held in that year except upon the 11th day of July, 1874. Subsequent deeds, purporting to convey said land, and duly conveying all the interest of the respective grantors therein, have been duly executed, acknowledged, and delivered, as follows: By said J. M. Steele and his wife to S. B. Riggs, and said S. B. Riggs and his wife to Frank Edwards, and by said Frank Edwards and his wife to this defendant Fredrick Bolin, which last deed is dated on the 31st day of July, 1883, and recorded on the 13th day of December, 1883, up to which time said land had never been entered upon or actually occupied by any body, and none of these defendants except Bolin ever took actual possession of said land, the same being vacant and unoccupied up to that date, and thereupon said Fredrick Bolin took possession, and has since paid taxes and made lasting and valuable improvements thereon. The said Frederick Bolin, with his wife, did on the 4th day of October, 1886, duly execute, acknowledge, and deliver a mortgage of said land to the Kansas Lumber Company, to secure a therein recited and still subsisting indebtedness of said Fredrick Bolin of $224.95, with 12 per cent. interest from October 4, 1886, for lumber and material used in building and improvements on the land in question, and said mortgage still subsists and is undischarged. (8) On the 13th day of July, 1885, Solomon H. Dodge, for a consideration of $25, duly executed, acknowledged, and delivered his quitclaim deed to the land mentioned in the petition to this plaintiff, John Clare, which deed so acknowledged was, on the 1st day of August, 1885, duly filed and recorded in the office of the register of deeds of Lyon county, Kan. (9) On or about the 1st day of August, 1885, T. N. Sedgwick, acting as the attorney and agent of John Clare, requested the defendant Sue L. Ruggles to procure and deliver a quitclaim deed of herself and Robert and Willie Ruggles, defendants, of the undivided half of the land in question to said John Clare, for which he offered to pay the sum of fifty dollars. (10) On the 27th day of January, 1887, the defendants Sue L., Robert, and Willie Ruggles tendered the plaintiff, John Clare, $29 to cover the consideration of the above-mentioned quitclaim deed from Dodge to Clare, with 7 per cent. interest from the date thereof to the date of tender, and the cost of procuring the same and recording, which sum they have brought into court to keep said tender good, and are still ready and willing to pay. "Conclusions of law." (1) That said tax-deed to J. M. Steele is void, and the claim of title of the defendant Fredrick Bolin thereunder is invalid, but said Bolin is entitled to have his taxes paid thereunder, with charges and interest as allowed by law refunded; also the value of his lasting improvements, less damages by waste, if any, and of the rents and profits as provided by the occupying claimant's law, all to be hereafter ascertained, the same to be first applied to the discharging of said mortgage given by said Bolin on said land, and the excess to be paid to him. (2) The plaintiff ought to recover his costs as against the defendants."

At the time said deed was given to said Ruggles, Clare's title was incumbered by tax-deeds and taxes then due, and for which said land had been sold or was subject to sale, as follows: A tax-deed dated February 15, 1865, and recorded July 10, 1865, for the delinquent taxes of 1860, 1861, and 1862; a tax-deed "in due form," dated April 1, 1871, and recorded April 20, 1871, for the delinquent taxes of 1865; also a tax-sale certificate for the delinquent taxes of 1870 and 1871, upon which a deed in due form was issued on the 13th day of October, 1874, and recorded October 31, 1874,—all of which tax-deeds and claims were held and owned by one Solomon H. Dodge.

On the 15th day of April, 1873, R. M. Ruggles, as attorney for this plaintiff, commenced an action against Dodge in the district court of Lyon county for the recovery of said land. Dodge defended in said action under all the above tax-deeds; and in May, 1876, judgment was rendered in favor of Clare for possession of the land and costs, "but that he should not be let into possession until he paid to said Dodge $348.26 as and for the taxes which said Dodge, as the holder of the aforesaid tax-deeds, had paid on said land." The court in this case found that said $348.26 constituted the "back taxes" on the land at the time of the deed from Clare to Ruggles, the only proof of which is the inference from what has been here stated. This court also found that "said judgment for back taxes remains wholly unsatisfied on the records of said court." The clerk testified on this trial that he had examined the records and papers of that case, and found no memoranda or entry of payment or satisfaction. His testimony was the only evidence whether said sum has been paid or not, and the record contains all the evidence. Said R. M. Ruggles died intestate and insolvent, April 24, 1879, leaving these plaintiffs in error his only heirs. The land in question was always vacant and unoccupied until the 31st day of July, 1883, when Bolin took possession under a tax-deed based on the tax-sale of 1875 to his grantors, through which he claimed in this action. On the 13th day of July, 1885, Solomon H. Dodge quit-claimed this land to Clare for $25, and the deed was duly recorded August 1, 1885. It was agreed in open court, by all the parties, "that the defendants Sue L. Ruggles, Robert Ruggles, and Willie Ruggles tendered to the plaintiff, John Clare, twenty-nine dollars on the 27th day of January, 1887, to cover the consideration of the above last-named quitclaim deed from Solomon H. Dodge to Clare, with seven per cent. from the date thereof to the date of tender, and the cost of procuring and recording the same, which sum they have brought into court to keep said tender good, and they are still ready and willing to pay the same."

The parties complaining here are Mrs. Sue L. Ruggles and her children, Robert and Willie Ruggles. Bolin does not bring up his branch of the case. The contention on the part of the plaintiffs in error is that the warranty deed executed by Clare and wife to R. M. Ruggles during his life-time is an absolute conveyance, an executed grant, not expressing or subject to any condition, precedent or subsequent; and, if this is so, then that Clare could only pursue such remedies as were applicable to the contract relations growing out of the undertaking of Ruggles to clear the land of taxes and from clouds on the title. In this action no such remedy is pursued, but the claim of Clare for redress is based upon the supposed fact that the conditions upon which the conveyance was made have never been performed by Ruggles, and hence there was a total failure of consideration, and the deed is void. Clare's petition was an ordinary one in ejectment. The plaintiffs in error answered, setting up the conveyance by Clare and wife to R. M. Ruggles, for the undivided half of the land described in the petition of Clare. To this answer Clare replied, admitting the execution of the deed to Ruggles for an undivided half, but alleges that Ruggles failed, neglected, and refused to pay the back taxes, and to remove the tax-lens, etc., as he was required to do by the conditions of the deed, and that said deed was and is void. To this reply a demurrer was filed by the plaintiffs in error, and this demurrer was sustained by the court, and thereupon Clare dismissed the action as to these plaintiffs in error, but Clare filed an amended reply to the answer of the plaintiffs in error by leave of the court. This amended reply was a copy of the original, except that there was added an allegation that, when Clare was first apprised of the failure of Ruggles to pay all back taxes on said land to divest it of all tax-lens, he immediately rescinded the contract, and demanded from the heirs of Ruggles a reconveyance to him of the undivided half of the land. To this amended reply the plaintiffs appeared, and filed a demurrer that was overruled by the court, and to which ruling due exceptions were saved. Then the amended reply of Clare to the answer of the plaintiffs in error was considered as an answer to a cross-petition of the plaintiffs in error, and they filed a reply to this amended answer, denying generally and specifically the allegations therein, and all parties went to trial in this condition of the pleadings. We suppose that the errors really complained of by the plaintiffs in error are the ruling on their demurrer to the reply of Clare, and the judgment for costs against them. The controlling question is whether the deed from Clare and wife to Ruggles is an absolute conveyance. We think it vested in Ruggles an absolute title to one-half of the land. In the absence of fraud, the consideration expressed in the deed cannot be impeached, contradicted, or varied for the purpose of invalidating the deed. In the case of Johnston v. Town Co., 14 Kan. 391, it was sought to show, to invalidate the deed, that the instrument was not to be considered a deed until certain things were done by the grantee and other parties, and that none of the conditions had been fulfilled. The court say that such evidence is inadmissible; and the court further say "that a deed apparently fully executed and acknowledged, and delivered to the grantee to become an absolute deed upon some condition, is not in escrow, but is immediately a deed absolute."

In Curtis v. Board, 43 Kan. 138, 23 Pac. Rep. 98, this court say, referring to the deed in that case: "There are no words in the deed stating that the estate was or should be conveyed upon condition, or that it might be forfeited under any circumstances whatever, or that the estate might under any circumstances revert to the grantors or their heirs, or that they might, under any circumstances, ever have the right to re-enter the premises. Nor was the estate conveyed or to be continued in existence upon any such terms as 'provided' or 'if' something in the future should be done or not done, or happen or not happen. Indeed, there is nothing sufficiently strong in any part of the deed, or in the whole deed, to indicate that the estate was conveyed, or intended to be conveyed, upon any condition, either precedent or subsequent; but, taking the whole deed together, it shows that an absolute estate in fee-simple was intended to be conveyed, and was conveyed, and was to continue in the grantees forever. The authorities are uniform that estates upon condition subsequent, which after having been fully vested may be defeated by a breach of the condition, are never favored in law, and that no deed will be construed to create an estate upon condition, unless the language to that effect is so clear that no room is left for any other construction. See the case of Packard v. Ames, 16 Gray, 327, and other cases cited in the opinion." This ruling establishes the deed from Clare and wife to R. M. Ruggles as an absolute conveyance to him of one-half of the land in controversy. This leaves Clare to his other remedies against the estate of Ruggles. We do not think that the fact of the insolvency of the Ruggles estate, that was established on the trial, varies the rule, or makes the deed dependent on any subsequent performance by Ruggles. It follows from this that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the reply of Clare, and that the judgment against the plaintiffs in error was wrong. It is recommended that the judgment be reversed.

PELHAM et al. v. SERVICE.

CONTRACT—SUFFICIENCY OF CONSIDERATION.

The relinquishment of a right to a homestead entry on public land, and the dismissal and withdrawal of a written protest against the final proof of another, is a good and valid consideration in a written instrument for the payment of money.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Scott county; A. J. ABBOTT, Judge.

Ward & Meade, Collins & Cravens, and L. Nebeker, for plaintiffs in error. Morse & Hubble, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. Service sued the plaintiffs in error on the following contract in writing, to-wit: "State of Kansas, county of Scott—as: This contract witnesseth, that whereas, John C. Service, of said county and state, has made a homestead entry upon the following tract of land lying in Wichita county, Kansas, to-wit: The south half of the north-west quarter, and the north-west quarter of the north-west quarter, of section twenty-four, (24,) and the south-west quarter of the south-west quarter of section thirteen, (13,) west of the 6th P. M.,—and has a protest against the final proof of William H. Montgomery on and to said land, under which a hearing is set for August 25, 1887, at the Wakeeney land-office, Wakeeney, Kansas, to settle a question of conflict of right to same: It is agreed to and in consideration of the said Service furnishing G. C. Hardesty, or delivering at Wichita County Bank of Leoti, on or before August 25, 1887, a relinquishment of his homestead entry, and a written withdrawal and dismissal of said protest and hearing, then the subscribers hereto, as principal and security, agree to pay said Service the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000) on or before September 15, 1887. Dated this 4th day of August, 1887. GUE C. HARDESTY. MILTON BROWN. D. F. HALL. T. W. PELHAM. KATE PELHAM." Service alleged performance on his part, and demanded judgment. The plaintiffs in error demurred to the petition for the reason that it did not constitute a cause of action; the pith of the demurrer being that there was no consideration for the agreement, the contract itself and the petition on its face showing the fact that Service had no possessory right in the land, had nothing to sell, and could transfer nothing to the plaintiffs in error. This demurrer was overruled, and this is the first error assigned. The plaintiffs in error then filed an answer, setting up as an affirmative defense that Service confederated with one Johnson and McConville to secure the contract by falsely inaugurating a contest on the homestead entry of W. H. Montgomery to the land described in the entry, when they had no legal right to make such a contest; that Service never had any valuable interest in the land; that at the time the contract was entered into the title to the land was in the United States, and that the contract was void for that reason. Service filed a reply, and the case went to trial to the court. The plaintiffs in error demurred to the evidence of Service; but the demurrer was overruled, and this is the second assignment of error. This raises the same question as the demurrer to the petition. Before the trial, Mrs. McConville, to whom Service had assigned a one-half interest, less $500, in the contract, and who was joined as plaintiff, dismissed the action so far as her interest was involved; she having received payment or satisfaction of her claim. The plaintiffs in error produced their evidence, and a demurrer by Service was sustained to their evidence. This constitutes the third assignment of error. During the trial, the plaintiffs in error tried to prove that Service was never in the actual possession of the land; had never made, or caused to be made, any improvements on said land. This was overruled, and objected to. Witnesses on the stand were asked to state what settlement Service had made, if any. These questions were objected to, and sustained. A witness was asked what Service had ever done on said land, or any part thereof; and the objection to the question was sustained. The plaintiffs in error stated that they expected to prove by witnesses on the stand that Service never made any settlement on said land, never improved the same, and never had any interest in the same; but the trial court would not permit them to examine the witnesses as to these facts. All these rulings are assigned as error. The trial court found for the plaintiff below, and rendered a judgment in his favor for $2,750 and costs. The case is here for review.

All these rulings recited go to the same subject or general objection. The demurrer to the petition; the demurrer to the evidence; and their various offers to prove that Service was never in the actual possession of the land; had never made, or caused to be made, any improvements thereon, etc.,—all raise but one question, and that is the illegality of the contract. We think that the case of McCabe v. Caner, 68 Mich. 182, 35 N. W. Rep. 901, is on all fours with the case at bar, and is decisive of this question, and fully establishes that the relinquishment and withdrawal of the protest was and is a good consideration for the contract sued on. That case cites, as supporting it, Olson v. Orton, (Minn.) 8 N. W. Rep. 878; Thompson v. Hanson, (Minn.) 11 N. W. Rep. 86; Lamb v. Davenport, 18 Wall. 307; Myers v. Croft, 13 Wall. 291; Kennedy v. Shaw, 43 Mich. 359, 2 N. W. Rep. 396; and other Michigan cases. The case finds strong support in our own reports. The cases of Lapham v. Head, 21 Kan. 332; Moore v. McIntosh, 6 Kan. 39; Bell v. Parks, 18 Kan. 152; Fessler v. Haas, 19 Kan. 216,—all affirm that contracts about the possession, improvements, and relinquishment of rights of public land, when free from fraud, can be enforced, and constitute a good consideration. This disposes of the main question in the case, and the nature of the other questions urged by the plaintiffs in error make a prolonged discussion unnecessary. A continuance rests largely in the discretion of the trial court, and we think proper diligence was not shown. There was not sufficient proof of a conspiracy to defraud. Besides, plaintiffs in error received exactly what they contracted for; they having made the contract with open eyes, and with every opportunity to know the facts. So far as the record shows, we think substantial justice has been done. It is recommended that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

MONTGOMERY V. NULTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. March 7, 1891.)

EJECTMENT—CROSS-PETITION—CAUSE OF ACTION.

In an action of ejectment, where M., who is not one of the original parties to the action, but becomes a party, and by leave of court files a cross-petition, showing that at a period prior to the commencement of the suit the plaintiffs were the absolute owners of the land in controversy, and at that time they sold and contracted in writing to convey the land to him for $200 and certain other considerations, and that he has tendered the cash payment, and is performing the other considerations according to the terms of the contract, and that plaintiffs have refused to convey, the cross-petition contains a cause of action against the plaintiffs. And when, in addition to such matter, the cross-petition alleges that the defendants claim an interest in the land in controversy under a certain sheriff's deed, and also under a quitclaim deed from the plaintiffs, and avers that the sheriff's deed under which the defendants claim is void, and that their purchase from the plaintiffs, evidenced by the quitclaim deed, was subsequent to his purchase from the plaintiffs, and that the defendants had full knowledge of his prior purchase when they purchased of the plaintiffs, and took their quitclaim deed, held, that such cross-petition states a cause of action against the defendants.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Ellis county; S. J. OSBORNE, Judge.

Montgomery & Harris, for plaintiff in error. D. Rathbone and Reeder & Reeder, for defendants in error.

STRANG, C. Action for specific performance and possession of land. E. M. Whyler settled upon the S. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 2, township 14, range 18, in Ellis county, Kan., under the homestead laws of the United States. April 29, 1882, he obtained a patent for said land. On or about November 24, 1879, E. M. Whyler contracted a debt to Kreuger & Kreuger, upon which judgment was obtained, execution issued thereon, and a levy made upon the said homestead of E. M. Whyler, which was sold, and a sheriff's deed therefor executed to the purchaser, Mary A. Nulton, who, with her husband, Jonah Nulton, went into possession of the land. Afterwards, on the 1st day of October, 1887, E. M. Whyler and Ellen M. Whyler, his wife, sold and agreed to convey said land to W. P. Montgomery for \$200, and the further consideration that said Montgomery should, at his own expense, clear the title of said land from the cloud thereon arising from the sheriff's deed aforesaid. November 11, 1887, Montgomery commenced a suit in the name of E. M. Whyler and Ellen M. Whyler against Mary A. Nulton and Jonah Nulton to recover the possession of the land. While this suit was pending, and before it came to trial, the defendant Mary A. Nulton purchased from plaintiffs Whyler and Whyler their interest in the land, paying them therefor \$300 and some costs, and took a quitclaim deed. Then Montgomery, by leave of court, filed a cross-petition, setting up his claim to the land under his contract with the Whylers, and alleged that Mary A. Nulton had full knowledge of said contract when she purchased the interest of E. M. Whyler and Ellen M. Whyler, and that she took said land subject to his rights under his contract, and prayed for specific performance, and for the possession of the land. May 7, 1888, E. M. Whyler and Ellen M. Whyler dismissed their action against the Nultons, and the Nultons filed a demurrer to the cross-petition of W. P. Montgomery, alleging several grounds therefor, none of which require any notice, except the fourth, which is as follows: "The cross-bill does not state facts sufficient to entitle said W. P. Montgomery to intervene herein, or to constitute a cause of action against the defendants, nor against Whyler and Whyler." The cross-petition alleges that E. M. Whyler settled upon the land in question under the homestead laws of the United States, and obtained a patent from the government therefor April 29, 1882, that on the 1st of October, 1887, and while the said E. M. Whyler and Ellen M. Whyler were the absolute owners in fee of said land, they sold, and agreed in writing to convey, the same to him, W. P. Montgomery, for the price and conditions therein named; that he had tendered the price of the land, and was performing the other conditions of his contract according to the terms thereof; that the defendants the Nultons claim an interest in the land by virtue of a certain sheriff's deed, and also under a quitclaim deed from the Whylers; that the sheriff's deed under which they claim is void because the judgment and sale upon which such deed was based were founded upon a debt contracted by E. M. Whyler before he became entitled to a patent to the land from the government; and that the quitclaim deed was obtained by the Nultons after the Whylers had sold the land to him, and with a full knowledge on their part of his contract, and his rights thereunder. He then prays for specific performance of the contract, and recovery of the possession of the land, and attaches a copy of his contract to the cross-petition.

We think the cross-petition states a cause of action, both against the plaintiffs and the Nultons, the defendants; and that the cross-petitioner may ask for specific performance and a recovery of the possession of the land in the same action. The defendants in error insist that the contract between the Whylers and Montgomery, on which Montgomery relies in this case, is champertous and void. By this contract, in consideration of the land therein described, the land in controversy in this case, Montgomery agrees to pay the Whylers the sum of $200 in cash, and in addition thereto to commence proceedings to quiet the title to said land, and pay the expense of such proceeding. We think this is a simple contract, as legitimate as though he had agreed to pay $200 for a quitclaim deed, and then had instituted proceedings to quiet title to the land. Counsel ask, what was Montgomery to get if he failed to secure the title to the land? And answer by saying, nothing. Nor would he have got anything if he had taken a quitclaim, and afterwards failed in a suit to recover the land. The fact that Montgomery was a lawyer, and agreed to quiet the title at his own expense, we think was nothing more than an agreement to pay $200, and whatever the expense of quieting the title to the land was in addition to the $200 for the land. It is therefore recommended that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

LYONS v. OSBORN.

LEASE—RENEWAL—WAIVER OF FORFEITURE—APPEAL—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

1. Where a written lease of real estate for one year contains the following stipulation, "And the said party of the second part [the lessee] has the privilege of continuing this lease, provided he fulfills the contract, at the same rent," held, that the lessee has the privilege of having the lease renewed for another year.

2. And in such a case, where the lessee paid the rent in installments, paying the last portion thereof between one and two months after it became due, but paying the whole of it for the first year more than two months prior to the expiration of the first year, and it was received by the lessor as thus paid without objection, held, that the failure to pay the whole of it when it became due did not deprive the lessee of his right to elect to retain the property under the lease for another year.

3. Where the district court, on a petition in error from a justice of the peace, reverses the judgment of the justice, it is not necessary for the aggrieved party to file a motion for a new trial in order to have the decision of the district court reviewed in the supreme court on petition in error.

Error from district court, Atchison county; W. D. GILBERT, Judge.

Smith & Solomon, for plaintiff in error.
J. T. Allensworth, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action of forcible detainer brought on March 12, 1888, before a justice of the peace of Atchison county by Rebecca Osborn against Charles Lyons, to recover certain real estate situated in said county. A trial was had before the justice and a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff, and the plaintiff, as plaintiff in error, took the case to the district court on petition in error, where the judgment of the justice of the peace was reversed; and afterwards the defendant, as plaintiff in error, brought the case for review to this court on petition in error. The facts of the case, briefly stated, are substantially as follows: On September 8, 1886, Rebecca Osborn, who owned the property in controversy, leased the same by a written lease to Charles Lyons for a term commencing on March 1, 1887, for which Lyons was to pay the sum of $325 on November 1, 1887; and the lease also contained the following stipulation: "And the said party of the second part [Lyons] has the privilege of continuing this lease, provided he fulfills the contract, at the same rent." Lyons took possession of the property under the lease about March 1, 1887, and continued in the quiet and peaceable possession thereof until this suit was commenced. He paid the aforesaid rent in installments, paying the last thereof about December 19, 1887; and all was received without objection. It was always understood by the parties that Lyons was to have the possession of the property for at least one year under the lease, commencing on March 1, 1887, although the lease does not in terms state how long he should have it; and in the latter part of August, 1887, it was orally agreed and understood between the parties that Lyons should have the property for one more year, commencing on March 1, 1888, and ending on March 1, 1889. The justice of the peace gave to the jury the following among other instructions: "(2) The defendant would be entitled to a continuance of said lease for another year, provided he has substantially filled all the terms thereof for the first year, provided no new contract has been made, verbally or otherwise, to the contrary. The burden of evidence is on the plaintiff to make out her case by a preponderance of the testimony." "(5) The continuing claim in said lease would be void, and you will so consider it, unless there was an understanding between the parties that it was a definite term of one or two years, or more. If from the evidence you find there was such an understanding between the parties, then it is not void." The plaintiff below, Mrs. Osborn, who is now the defendant in error, complained in the district court, and now complains in this court, of the foregoing instructions, and also of the judgment rendered by the justice of the peace; but we do not think that any substantial error was committed by the justice of the peace. It was originally understood between the parties that Lyons was to have the property for at least one year, with the right on his part to have, if he chose, a renewal of the lease for a second year. It was also agreed between the parties in August, 1887, that he was to have the property for another year. But he had a right independent of this agreement, under the above-quoted stipulation in the written lease, to elect to retain the property for a second year if he chose; and, by remaining upon the property and in the possession thereof after the first year had expired, he presumptively, as nothing was shown to the contrary, elected to retain the property for another year, as in fact he did. In support of the views herein expressed, see 12 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1006-1009, and cases there cited; Kolasky v. Michels, 24 N. E. Rep. 278, (decided by the New York court of appeals, April 15, 1890.) It is further claimed by the present defendant in error that as Lyons did not pay the whole of the rent at the time it became due, which was on November 1, 1887, but paid a portion thereof as late as December 19, 1887, he was not entitled to a renewal of the lease. But he paid the whole of the rent for the first year within less than two months after it became due, and more than two months prior to the expiration of the first year of his lease, and it was all received by Mrs. Osborn as thus paid without the slightest objection. We do not think, under the circumstances, that this failure on the part of Lyons to pay the whole of the rent when it became due deprived him of his right to elect to retain the property under the lease for another year. It is also claimed by the present defendant in error that the present plaintiff in error, who was the defendant in error in the district court and the defendant in the justice's court, is without remedy in this court, for the reason that he did not file a motion for a new trial in the district court after that court, on petition in error, reversed the decision of the justice of the peace. Such a motion was wholly unnecessary. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the judgment of the justice of the peace will be affirmed. Judgment of the district court reversed.

All the justices concurring.

PONCELER et ux. v. MARSHALL, Sheriff.
(Supreme Court of Kansas. March 7, 1891.)

JUDGMENT IN REPLEVIN.

Where the plaintiffs obtain possession of property in an action in replevin against a sheriff for goods taken on execution, and the jury finds for the defendant, the verdict and judgment should be in the alternative for a return of the property, or the amount of the special interest of the officer in the goods, in case a return cannot be had.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Anderson county; A. W. BENSON, Judge.

John W. Deford and D. J. Poncelier, for plaintiffs in error. H. L. Poplin, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This was an action in replevin, brought by the plaintiffs in error to recover certain specific articles of personal property levied upon by the defendant in error, as sheriff, under an execution issued on a judgment in favor of M. Trendenberg against C. J. Poncelier. The defendant denied generally, and alleged ownership and title of the property in C. J. Poncelier; that the execution had been levied upon the property described in plaintiff's petition as the property of C. J. Poncelier; and that the same was subject to sale for his debts. The plaintiffs obtained possession of the property. Upon the issues joined, a trial was had, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant. A reversal of this judgment is urged upon the ground that the court below erred in rendering judgment upon the verdict returned by the jury. The verdict was: "We, the jury, find that the defendant did not wrongfully detain the property replevied in this case from the plaintiffs; and said defendant is entitled to the return of the same, or the value thereof, set out in the affidavit for replevin."

The judgment of the court upon this verdict was that the plaintiffs should return said property taken in replevin, describing the same as in the affidavit for replevin; or, in case the same could not be returned, that the defendant should receive the value thereof, being the sum of $150. After hearing the motion for a new trial, the court directed the journal entry to be corrected by striking out of the judgment the words, "the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars." The value of the property taken in replevin was not ascertained. The affidavit was not in evidence before the jury, and is not in the record. We cannot tell how much the value of the property may have exceeded the judgment and costs upon which the execution issued. The interest of the sheriff could only be to the extent of the amount set out in the execution under which he made the levy. His interest in the property was special, and he would only be entitled to a judgment for the return of the property, or, if the same could not be had, the value of his special interest therein by virtue of the execution and levy. Shaban v. Smith, 38 Kan. 474, 6 Pac. Rep. 749; Friend v. Green, 43 Kan. 163, 23 Pac. Rep. 93. We are of the opinion that the verdict and judgment are erroneous, and recommend a reversal.

This was an action brought by D. E. Pettigrew against C. K. Mills, James Mills, and others to obtain possession of certain real estate situate in Allen county. All of the defendants answered, and disclaimed any interest in the premises, except James Mills. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the possession of the premises, and for $120 for rents and profits. James Mills excepted, and brings the case here. It is conceded by the parties that the title of the premises passed from the United States to the L. L. & G. Railroad Company; that D. E. Pettigrew obtained a good and sufficient title to the premises by warranty deeds from the railroad company to Henry Tidman, and from Tidman and wife to himself. James Mills contends that he has the superior title to the premises, which he claims he derived as follows: While the L. L. & G. Railroad Company was the owner of the premises in controversy, and while the company was operating its railroad, an action was brought against it by W. J. Richards in the district court of Allen county; that a petition was filed July 21, 1875; that on the 5th of July, 1876, a verdict and judgment were rendered in said cause against the railroad company for $7,000 damages; that subsequently execution was issued on the judgment, and the premises were levied upon by the sheriff by virtue of the execution; that at this time Charles Aldrich and 97 other persons, among whom were D. E. Pettigrew and Henry Tidman, his immediate grantor, as plaintiffs, commenced an action against W. J. Richards and John H. Walters, the then sheriff of Allen county; that this action was commenced September 3, 1881, and attempted to enjoin the sale of the premises on the judgment; that an application was made to the judge for a temporary injunction in the cause, which was denied September 7, 1881; that in the said action plaintiffs, on November 11, 1881, obtained leave to file an amended petition, but the action was finally dismissed by the court for want of prosecution. The sheriff having made sale of the premises, as well as others, on execution issued in the action of W. J. Richards vs. The L. L. & G. R. Co., a motion was filed by plaintiff in the judgment to confirm the sale, and at the same time a cross-motion was filed by D. E. Pettigrew and Henry Tidman, his immediate grantor, to set aside the sale. The motion to confirm the sale was sustained, and the sheriff ordered to make a deed to the purchaser, W. J. Richards. The court overruled the motion to set aside the sale, and Pettigrew and others, resisting confirmation of the sale, duly excepted, and took time to make a case for this court. Subsequently a deed was made by the sheriff to W. J. Richards for the premises sold at sheriff's sale, among which were the premises in controversy. W. J. Richards and wife, by deed, conveyed the lands in controversy to James Mills.

H. A. Ewing, for plaintiff in error.
Knight & Foust, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) After the L. L. & G. Railroad Company obtained its title of the land in controversy from the United States, Henry Tidman obtained his deed from the L. L. & G. Railroad Company and B. S. Henning, the receiver of the company. The receiver was appointed March 5, 1875, in an action then pending in the United States circuit court for the state of Kansas, wherein the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company was plaintiff, and the L. L. & G. Railroad Company was defendant, to foreclose a mortgage long prior to that time executed and delivered by the L. L. & G. Railroad Company to the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company. Pettigrew holds under Tidman and wife. The judgment of W. J. Richards was rendered July 5, 1876, more than a year after the appointment of the receiver. The contention of James Mills, that his title to the premises is superior either in law or equity, cannot be sustained. He bases his contention upon the ground that D. E. Pettigrew and his prior grantor, Henry Tidman, are stopped by their action commenced September 3, 1881, to enjoin the sale of the premises upon the judgment in favor of Richards, and also by their filing a motion to set aside the sale of the premises made by the sheriff upon an execution issued upon that judgment. The action to enjoin the sheriff's sale was dismissed for the want of prosecution only; it was not decided upon its merits, or upon any hearing. It was therefore no bar. Smith v. Auld, 31 Kan. 262, 1 Pac. Rep. 626, and cases there cited. The overruling of the motion to set aside the sale was not conclusive on the parties making the motion. Benz v. Hines, 3 Kan. 390; White Crow v. White Wing, Id. 276; Rice v. Poynter, 15 Kan. 263; Harrison v. Andrews, 18 Kan. 535; Bank v. Huntoon, 35 Kan. 577, 587, 588, 11 Pac. Rep. 369. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

HOOPES V. BUFORD & GEORGE IMPLEMENT CO.

VERIFICATION OF PLEADING—REVIEW ON APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF RECORD.

1. A pleading was verified by the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney as follows: "State of Kansas, Harper county—ss.: R. B. S., being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is one of the attorneys for the plaintiff in the above-entitled action; that he believes the facts stated in the foregoing answer to be true; and the reason why this affidavit is not made by the plaintiff is that said plaintiff is not a resident of, and is now absent from, the state of Kansas. R. B. S." No objection was made to this verification before the trial, nor until a large portion of the evidence was introduced on the trial, when the objection was made by the adverse party, and overruled by the court. Held not error.

2. When a case made or record, brought to the supreme court, does not purport to contain all the evidence introduced on the trial below, the supreme court cannot say that any finding or decision of the trial court founded upon such evidence is erroneous.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from district court, Harper county; J. T. HERRICK, Judge.

Love & Snelling and Geo. E. McMahon, for plaintiff in error. Shepard, Grove & Shepard, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. On July 10, 1886, an action was brought in the district court of Harper county by the Buford & George Implement Company, a corporation, against W. M. Warner and W. F. Miller, partners as Warner & Miller, to recover $3,083.61 on certain instruments in writing. Also, at the same time, an order of attachment was procured by the plaintiff, and was levied by the sheriff upon certain property as the property of the defendants. On April 6, 1887, E. G. Hoopes, under the provisions of the General Statutes, (Gen. St. 1889, pars. 4123, 4124,) interpleaded, claiming the property under a certain deed of assignment executed to him by Warner & Miller and their wives on June 15, 1886. On January 23 and 24, 1888, a trial was had between the plaintiff, the Buford & George Implement Company, and the interpleader, Hoopes, and afterwards, and on January 31, 1888, a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the interpleader, giving the property to the plaintiff, and assessing the costs against the interpleader; and to reverse this judgment the interpleader, as plaintiff in error, brings the case to this court. Extensive and elaborate briefs have been filed by counsel on both sides; but it seems to us that much of the argument made by counsel cannot be considered by this court. Two principal questions are presented by the brief of the plaintiff in error, as follows: "(1) Did the court below commit error of law at the trial by permitting the plaintiff below to introduce, over the objection and exception of the interpleader below, evidence tending to prove that the deed of assignment had not been executed and delivered as set forth in the interplea of the interpleader? (2) Was the finding of the court below unsustained by the evidence and contrary to the law?"

The first question is supposed to arise upon the following facts: The interpleader, in his pleading, set forth a claim to the property in controversy under the aforesaid deed of assignment. The plaintiff, in its reply thereto, set forth facts putting in issue the execution of such deed of assignment. This reply was verified by the affidavit of one of the attorneys of the plaintiff, as follows: "State of Kansas, Harper county—ss.: R. B. Shepard, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is one of the attorneys for the plaintiff in the above-entitled action; that he believes the facts stated in the foregoing answer to be true, and the reason why this affidavit is not made by the plaintiff is that said plaintiff is not a resident of, and is now absent from, the state of Kansas. R. B. SHEPARD." It is claimed by the interpleader that this verification is not sufficient, for the reason that it does not state that the facts set forth in the plaintiff's pleading were within the personal knowledge of the attorney verifying the same. This is the sole foundation for the first question presented by the interpleader. This verification was made, and the pleading thus verified was filed, on May 3, 1887. The trial did not take place until in January, 1888, as aforesaid. After the case was called for trial, and after the jury was impaneled, the counsel for the plaintiff stated its case in full to the court and jury. Then one of the counsel who appeared for both the defendants and the interpleader stated their case to the jury, setting forth in considerable detail the execution and delivery of the aforesaid deed of assignment; that the assignee, who was then the interpleader, had entered upon the discharge of his duties, had taken possession of the property, had had it appraised, etc. The plaintiff's counsel then made the following additional statement: "Gentlemen of the Jury: I will state our defense to this action of E. G. Hoopes in as few words as possible. We have about fifteen defenses to Mr. Hoopes' claim in this matter, and one of them is that Warner & Miller never executed a deed of assignment—and another is that Hoopes never gave any bond at the time of entering into the possession of this property; and another is that this property never went into the possession of Mr. Hoopes, and the assignment was only made for the purpose of worrying and delaying the creditors of Warner & Miller; that this deed was not executed until October, 1886, and that Hoopes never filed a bond; and that therefore Mr. Hoopes has no claim or right to the possession of this property; and for these facts Buford, George & Company are entitled to recover the amount of their claim." The parties then went to trial upon all the pleadings, including the aforesaid pleading of the plaintiff's, putting in issue the execution of the aforesaid deed of assignment and the verification thereof, without interposing any objection to the verification, and as though it was perfect in every respect. The plaintiff first introduced its evidence. The interpleader then introduced his evidence, which had relation to the execution of, and included, the deed of assignment and all that was done under it, etc. The plaintiff then offered to introduce evidence in rebuttal, but the interpleader objected because under the pleadings no evidence is necessary, the execution of the deed of assignment not being denied under oath, as required by law." The court overruled the objection, and the plaintiff then introduced further evidence, and the interpleader also introduced further evidence. It does not appear that any other or further objection was made to the aforesaid verification. We shall decide the question now presented upon the theory that, when a pleading is verified by the party's attorney, it should be stated or shown somewhere that the attorney has personal knowledge of the facts set forth or involved in the pleading; and upon this theory, did the court below commit any material error? The statutes applicable to this question are sections 108 and 114 of the Civil Code. We are inclined to think that the court below did not commit any material error. The pleading of the plaintiff gave ample notice to the interpleader that the plaintiff denied the execution of the deed of assignment, and that it intended upon the trial to rely upon such denial as a defense to the interpleader's claim; and such pleading was in fact verified, and no motion was ever made to strike it from the files, or to strike out or set aside the verification thereof. Warner v. Warner, 11 Kan. 121. Indeed, no objection of any kind was made to the verification before the trial. The interpleader went to trial upon this pleading and the verification thereof without objection, and did not object until after a large portion of the evidence had been introduced. The court probably then had the discretion either to overrule the objection, as it did, or to require that the verification should be amended; but, exercising a sound judicial discretion, the court probably did right in overruling the objection. The first question, therefore, presented to this court by the interpleader, (who is now the plaintiff in error,) must be decided against him.

The next question presented by the interpleader is whether the court below erred or not in its findings upon the evidence. The trial was at first commenced before the court and a jury, but before the trial was completed the court, with the consent of the parties, discharged the jury, and the trial was then carried on to its termination before the court alone. Now, the question whether the court erred or not in its findings depends entirely upon the evidence introduced on the trial, and we cannot determine that the court erred unless we have the whole of such evidence before us. We have nearly 100 pages of evidence, closely written upon a typewriter, but there is nothing in the case or record that shows that this is all the evidence; hence, according to all the decisions of this court upon the subject, we cannot say that the court below erred in its findings or decision upon the evidence. State v. Commissioners, 43 Kan. 195, 197, 23 Pac. Rep. 101, 102, and cases there cited; Johnson v. Johnson, 44 Kan. —, 24 Pac. Rep. 1099. The defendant in error (plaintiff below) raises this question directly and specifically, and objects to our consideration of the case upon the evidence for the reason that the record brought to this court does not purport to contain all the evidence; and under the foregoing decisions we think the objection is good. When a case made or record, brought to the supreme court, does not purport to contain all the evidence introduced on the trial below, the supreme court cannot say that any finding or decision of the trial court founded upon such evidence is erroneous. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

1. Error from district court, Woodson county; L. STILLWELL, Judge.

W. H. Slavens, for plaintiffs in error.
G. R. Stephenson, Co. Atty., and J. H. Sticher, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. This was an action brought in the district court of Woodson county by the state of Kansas, on the relation of the county attorney, against J. W. Turner, as principal, and T. W. Wilson, J. B. Fry, I. S. Jones, M. Reedy, N. F. Follett, J. H. Bayer, A. Hamilton, and August Todman, as sureties, on the official bond of J. W. Turner, former treasurer of said county, to recover $2,216.47, an amount alleged to be still due from Turner as treasurer, and never paid over by him to his successor in office, or accounted for in any manner. A trial was had before the court without a jury, and the court found generally in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants, and rendered judgment against them jointly and severally for the recovery of the sum of $2,026.40, the amount found due against the defendant Turner as county treasurer, and for costs of suit; and to reverse this judgment the defendants, as plaintiffs in error, bring the case to this court for review.

1. The first alleged error, as stated in the brief of the plaintiffs in error, is as follows: "The court erred in overruling the demurrers filed, for the reason that the petition shows an accounting and settlement between the county commissioners and J. W. Turner, the county treasurer, and no sufficient showing is made to justify going back of the settlement, particularly as against the other defendants, [plaintiffs in error,] who were his sureties." The petition is not fairly subject to the above objection, and the ruling of the court below upon the demurrers was correct; but, whether it was correct or not, it cannot be considered by this court, for the reason that no exception was taken thereto or saved in any manner. Lott v. Railroad Co., 42 Kan. 293, 21 Pac. Rep. 1070.

2. The next alleged error is stated in the brief of plaintiffs in error as follows: "The court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial, there being an error in the assessment of the amount of recovery." The real objection seems to be this: that the court below, upon the evidence introduced on the trial, found and assessed too great an amount as the amount of the plaintiff's recovery. Now, we cannot say from the evidence that any such error was committed. Indeed, from the case brought to this court it cannot be ascertained that we have all the evidence that was introduced on the trial in the court below. (On the contrary, the case shows affirmatively that we do not have all such evidence, and therefore it is utterly impossible for us to say whether the court below erred or not in the assessment of the amount of the plaintiff's recovery, or whether it erred or not in making any other finding of fact upon the evidence. See the case of Hoopes v. Implement Co., ante, 34, (just decided.) It is our opinion that no material error was committed in the case, and therefore the judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

WHO MAY BRING PARTITION.

A party owning an undivided half of an improved city lot, having acquired title to it from a person who had been exercising acts of ownership, paying taxes, building sidewalks, and receiving small sums for its use for 24 years, can maintain an action for partition of it against the owners of the other undivided half, who, at the trial, do not show that, before the commencement of the suit, they absolutely denied or distinctly repudiated the interest of the plaintiff in the partition proceedings.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

Quinton & Quinton, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. B. M. Davies commenced this action in the district court of Shawnee county against Carl Jockheck and Helena Schaffer, whom he alleged were tenants in common with him for the partition of lot No. 250, Kansas avenue, city of Topeka. Joseph Erhart was also made a party for the purpose of determining whatever interest he might have in the property. Davies alleged possession in his petition. Jockheck and Schaffer filed answers denying that Davies had any interest in the lot, and claiming to be the owners. Erhart filed his answer, claiming a mortgage on the lot executed by Davies. A jury was waived, a trial had, and a judgment rendered in favor of Davies. The court found that Davies was the owner in fee-simple of an undivided one-half interest, and that Jockheck and Schaffer, as the heirs of John A. Schaffer, were the owners of the other undivided half interest, and ordered partition, if it could be made, or, if not, that the lot be sold, and the proceeds of sale be divided accordingly. From this order of partition Jockheck and Schaffer bring the case here for review. The material facts are these: The record shows that on the 7th day of November, 1862, the fee-simple title to the lot in question was in John P. Greer and Robert Walker, and all the parties to the action claim title from that source. During the year 1862, Schaffer (the father of Helena Schaffer, who died in January, 1872, and whose widow Carl Jockheck subsequently married) and Erhart were in partnership, contracting and building masonry work in the city of Topeka. John P. Greer contracted with them to do the masonry work on a building that he was erecting on Sixth street, and in payment of said work John P. Greer and wife and Walker made a deed to Erhart and Schaffer for the lot in controversy. This deed was signed and acknowledged on the 7th day of November, 1862. Whether it was ever delivered or not was one of the controverted questions of fact at the trial. This deed was not recorded until July, 1886. On the 11th day of December, 1862, J. P. Greer and wife and Walker made a deed for the lot in suit to Joseph Erhart, that was recorded in February, 1863. Erhart paid the taxes and produced the tax-receipts at the trial for the years 1863, '64, '65, '66, '67, '76, '77, '78, '79, '80, '81, '82, '83, '84, '85. During a part of these years Erhart received small sums of money for the use of the lot for exhibitions and sale of nursery trees, and by the owner of a daguerreotype wagon. Erhart also constructed the sidewalks in front of said lots. The taxes of 1867 were paid by Erhart and Schaffer. Erhart states in his evidence that he thought that, when he paid taxes, Schaffer or Jockheck paid him back. On the 9th day of December, 1871, Joseph Erhart made a quitclaim deed to John A. Schaffer for the one undivided half of and interest in lot No. 250, which was recorded on the 14th day of December 1871; but before the execution of this deed Erhart had recognized Schaffer's interest in the lot, and they had joined in the payment of the taxes due thereon. At the time of Schaffer's death he left a widow and one child, Helena Schaffer, surviving. The widow married Carl Jockheck, and died before the commencement of this action. After the death of Schaffer the same relations were sustained towards this lot by Erhart and Jockheck as existed between Erhart and Schaffer. They shared in the payment of taxes, and in the small rental received. On the 19th day of January, 1884, a contract was executed between Elizabeth F. Richie, who owned lot No. 248, lying north of and immediately adjoining the lot in controversy, and Joseph Erhart and Rosa Jockheck, that recites that the parties of the second part, being Joseph Erhart and Rosa Jockheck, own lot No. 250. This agreement was about a party-wall, and is signed by Joseph Erhart and Rosa Jockheck. On the 28th day of May, 1885, an agreement was made with B. M. Davies, who owned lot No. 252, immediately south and adjoining lot 250, by Rosa Jockheck, as guardian of Helena Schaffer, and Joseph Erhart about a party-wall. On the 20th day of July, 1886, Joseph Erhart and wife sold and conveyed by warranty deed an undivided one-half of said lot No. 250 to B. M. Davies, and took a mortgage to secure the payment of the purchase money from Davies. At the trial, Howell Jones was allowed to testify, over the objection of the plaintiffs in error, that after the purchase of Davies from Erhart he had a conversation with John P. Greer, who was in possession of the deed from himself and wife to Erhart and Schaffer, of date November 7, 1862, in which Greer told him that this deed had never been delivered. The admission of this evidence is claimed as error. Joseph Erhart, while testifying at the trial, was asked if Schaffer paid him anything for conveying one-half of the lot to him, and he answered, "No, sir." Both the question and the answer were objected to, and this ruling is insisted on as error. It is also urged that as Davies alleged possession, and failed to prove it, he could not maintain this action. Finally, the contention is that the judgment is not sustained by the evidence.

Separate and apart from the special errors assigned, the trend of the material facts, and the application of legal principles, are in favor of an affirmance of the judgment. Erhart had been in possession of, and had paid taxes on, the lot for more than 20 years before his conveyance to Davies. The deed from Greer and wife and Walker to him had been of record for more than 24 years before he sold to Davies. The deed of November 7, 1862, from Greer and wife and Walker to Erhart and Schaffer was not recorded until after the sale to Davies. There is no intimation in the record from any source that Davies had either notice or knowledge of the existence of this deed before his purchase. Greer, the custodian and one of the grantors of this conveyance, declared to the agent of Davies who was seeking to make an abstract of the title to the lot, that the deed of November 7, 1862, was never delivered. Schaffer in his life-time, his wife after his death, and her heirs after her death had continuously until the commencement of this suit recognized that Erhart was a part owner of the lot. The only title shown by the heirs of Schaffer at the trial was the quitclaim deed from Erhart for an undivided half to their ancestor. The antecedent facts are harmonious with the theory that for some reason Erhart and Schaffer had determined that the title from Greer and wife and Walker should vest solely in Erhart, as shown by the deed of December 11th, rather than in them both, as was contemplated by the deed of November 7, 1862. The subsequent quitclaim of the 9th day of December, 1871, from Erhart to Schaffer, is easily explainable on this theory. That Erhart divested himself of all interest or title to the lot by that quitclaim cannot be reconciled with the subsequent action of Schaffer and his heirs with reference to the possession, payment of taxes, and reception of rents by them and Erhart conjointly. The stress of these general considerations; the strong inferences arising from the particular facts recited in the record; the irresistible construction arising from the acts of Schaffer and his heirs; the application of indisputable rules of law,—all compel us to say that the judgment rendered by the trial court is a legal sequence, produced by the concurrence of legal principles, equitable considerations, and facts proven. Had the delivery of the deed of November 7th to Erhart and Schaffer been conclusively shown, it would not have affected the general result, without knowledge of it had been brought home to Davies prior to his purchase. In the attitude of the proof on the question of delivery, Greer having at one time stated that it was not delivered, and at another time stating that it was, we could not disturb the general finding, perhaps included in the judgment, for evident reasons. Besides, the fact that it was found after the lapse of many years in Greer's possession, and never having been recorded until after the Davies purchase, very greatly increases the probabilities of non-delivery. Whether or not Greer's declaration is admissible does not become very material, in the view that we have taken. It would seem that Erhart and Davies, who claims under him, are entitled to the benefit of it. Greer testifies, on behalf of the plaintiffs in error, that the deed was delivered; and they claim certain rights by reason of its delivery. It would surely be competent for Erhart and Davies to show, in impeachment of Greer, that he had stated that it was not delivered; and, while this order in the introduction of evidence was not observed, the practical result of the conflict is the same. Again, Greer was one of the grantors in the deed, and the written instrument was in his possession. Now, in a controversy between grantees as to whether the deed had ever been delivered, it seems that his evidence and admissions as to the fact of delivery are primary, and not dependent on his agency for either or both parties. We have grave doubts about the ruling of the trial court in permitting Erhart to state, while on the witness stand, that Schaffer paid him nothing for the quitclaim deed of date December 9, 1871, for an undivided half of the lot. But the execution and delivery of the deed is not in issue,—is in fact admitted; and the consideration, whether for $1 or $500, is immaterial. Entertaining a very strong conviction that the judgment rendered below is inherently right, and being in accordance with legal rules and equitable requirements, it is not necessary to consider the question of how far the plaintiffs in error may be estopped by their attorneys having received and receipted for the fees allowed them by the court in distributing the proceeds of the sale of the lot by virtue of the partition proceedings.

One question made by the plaintiffs in error we have heretofore overlooked, and that is that Davies not being in possession, he could not maintain the action of partition; or, to state it as strongly as in the brief, that the possession of Jockheck and Helena Schaffer was an adverse one, and that by reason of this the action of partition could not be sustained. Davies alleged possession in his petition; and having acquired the interest of Erhart in good faith, and without notice or knowledge that the plaintiffs in error claimed adverse possession, he succeeded to all the rights of Erhart, and, among them, Erhart's long-continued, and, so far as the record discloses, his undisputed, joint possession with Schaffer and his heirs until his conveyance to Davies. This is enough for Davies to maintain the action, because it is not shown that, prior to its commencement, there was an absolute denial or a distinct repudiation of his rights in the lot. We recommend that the judgment of the district court of Shawnee county be affirmed.

LOCATION OF HIGHWAY—SUFFICIENCY OF PETITION.

Where a petition for the appointment of viewers to view, lay out, and locate a public road shows upon its face that it is signed by more than 12 householders of the county, and the prayer of the petition is granted, and the road is viewed and located, and a report of the viewers made to the county board, and the county board approves the report, and orders the road to be opened, held, that the petition and the proceedings following will be considered valid, although the county board did not make an express finding that the signers of the petition were householders. See, also, Laws 1885, c. 16.

Error from district court, Wabaunsee county; R. B. SPILLMAN, Judge.

J. F. Peffer, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Doollittle, for defendants in error.

VALENTINE, J. The controversy in this case is whether or not a certain road in Wabaunsee county is a legal highway or not. It appears that on or about October 2, 1874, a petition for the appointment of viewers to view, lay out, and locate a certain public road was presented to the board of county commissioners of Wabaunsee county, and on November 7, 1874, the petition was "taken up and granted," and three viewers were appointed for the above purpose. It appears that these viewers met at the proper time and place, viewed and located the road, and made a report of their proceedings to the county board. On January 4, 1875, the report was "taken up, report approved, and roads ordered opened" by the county board. The principal objection to the legality of the road as a public highway is that it does not appear from the records of the county board that the petition for the appointment of the viewers and location of the road was signed by 12 householders, as required by law. Gen. St. 1889, par. 5474. Now, as the petition itself shows that more than 12 persons signed the same, and states that they were "residents and householders" of Wabaunsee county, and as the county board granted the petition, appointed the viewers, and afterwards approved the report of the viewers, and ordered the road to be opened, we think it may be fairly said that the records of the county board show that the petition was signed by the requisite number of householders, as required by law, and that the petition itself was a legal and valid petition. Howell v. Redlon, 44 Kan. —, 24 Pac. Rep. 1109. Another objection is made to the legality of the aforesaid road upon the ground that the petition asked for two separate and distinct roads. Such is not shown to be the fact, however. From the petition and the entire proceedings we would think that the supposed two roads were in fact only one road. Besides, there being no substantial irregularities in the establishment of the aforesaid road, but only slight irregularities, if irregularities at all, it must be considered that the act of the legislature approved March 7, 1885, (Laws 1885, p. 13, c. 16,) legalizing certain roads and highways of Wabaunsee county, cures all defects and renders the aforesaid road and the record thereof legal and valid in every respect. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

AMENDMENT OF PLEADINGS—ACTION ON CONTRACT—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS.

1. In an action to recover a balance due on a contract for land, the defendant, in his answer, alleged that he was induced to enter into the contract by false representations respecting the land, made by the plaintiff and his agent; and pleaded a rescission of the contract. Afterwards he asked leave to amend his answer so as to allege that the false representations were made with intent to deceive him, that he relied on them, and aver that he was damaged, by reason of the land not being as represented, in the sum of $1,850; which amendment, over the objection of the plaintiff, was allowed by the court, upon condition that the defendant pay the cost in the case, taxed at $75.60; and the cause was then continued until the next term of the court. Held, that such amendment did not prejudice the substantial rights of the plaintiff, and therefore its allowance was not error. Section 140, Civil Code.

2. Evidence examined, and held sufficient to sustain both the general and special verdicts.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Labette county; GEORGE CHANDLER, Judge.

Kimball & Osgood, for plaintiff in error.
Case & Glasse, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. Action on contract for the sale of land. The defendant pleaded fraudulent representations as inducement for making the contract, and rescission of the contract. Afterwards, with leave of court, over the objection of the plaintiff, the defendant amended his answer, affirming the contract, and alleging that the fraudulent representations were made with intent to deceive him, and that he relied on them, and claiming damages in the sum of $1,850, as the difference between the real value of the land and what it would have been worth if as represented. This amendment was made at the cost of the defendant in the sum of $75.60, and the case continued to the next term. June 18, 1888, the cause was tried to a jury, resulting in a verdict for the sum of $496.40 in favor of the plaintiff. The jury also made the following special findings: "Question 1. Did the plaintiff himself, knowingly and with intent to deceive, make any false representations to the defendant concerning the land described, which were relied upon by him, and which induced the defendant to purchase said land? Answer. Yes. Q. 2. If you answer the last question in the affirmative, then what were such representations? Set forth the same fully. A. The plaintiff did misrepresent by saying the land laid very nicely, or very well. Q. 3. Did Mr. Barrows, the agent of the plaintiff, with intent to deceive the defendant, make any false representations to him concerning the land described, which were relied upon by the defendant, and which operated to induce him to purchase said land? A. He did. Q. 4. If the last question is answered in the affirmative, then state what were said representations. Set them forth fully. A. He said the block laid very nicely and smoothly, with the exception of a small draw across the south end. Q. 5. Were both plaintiff and defendant residents of the city of Parsons at the time of the making of the contract set forth in the petition? A. Yes. Q. 6. Were the means of ascertaining the lay of the land, the location of the draws or ravines, and other matters in relation thereto, equally within the reach of both plaintiff and defendant? A. Yes. Q. 7. Could the defendant, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have ascertained the facts concerning the lay and character of the land described, before signing the contract? A. Yes; and we think he did." The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he brings the case here for review.

The first error assigned is based upon the action of the court in permitting the defendant to amend his answer, over the objection of the plaintiff. It is claimed that the amendment substantially changes the cause of defense, and is therefore erroneous, under section 139 of the Code of Procedure. Amendments of pleadings are largely within the discretion of the trial court; and in this case the fact that the court allowed the amendment, only at the cost of the party asking it, and continued the case to the next term of court, indicates a proper exercise of judicial fairness and discretion. If section 139 was the only section upon the subject of amendments in our Code, the contention of the plaintiff would possess more force; but the following section (140) cuts an important figure in this connection: "The court, in every stage of action, must disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the adverse party; and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect." Were the substantial rights of the adverse party affected by the amendment allowed by the court? We think not. The court required the party amending to pay all the costs, amounting to $75.60, as a condition upon which his amendment was allowed; and the case was continued until the next term of the court. The plaintiff was not taken by surprise, and compelled to go to trial without an opportunity to secure evidence to meet the new condition of things in the answer. He had ample time to prepare his case for trial under the answer as amended. We do not see how the substantial rights of the plaintiff were affected by the amendment. Now, suppose the plaintiff had wanted to amend his pleading. If the court had refused he could have dismissed his case, paid his costs, and commenced his action over again with his petition as he desired to make it. The plaintiff's rights in a case should be no greater than those of the defendant; and where a court permits a defendant to amend his answer upon condition that he pays the cost, and submits to a continuance of the case, he is given no greater rights than the plaintiff may take. Every amendment of a pleading which substantially changes a cause of action or defense is not erroneous. It is only when such amendments are so made as to affect the substantial rights of the adverse party that they constitute error. Section 140, Code Civil Proc. In this case no substantial right of the plaintiff was affected by the amendment allowed in the manner and upon the conditions of its allowance.

The next contention of the plaintiff is that, under the issues as they were made up when the case was tried, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the contract price for the land, unless the defendant established by a preponderance of the evidence that by reason of false representations as to material matters of fact, made by the plaintiff or his agent, upon which the defendant relied, and had a right to rely, he was induced to agree to pay more for the land than he would otherwise have done; and the plaintiff asserts that the defendant failed to show this. The difficulty about the plaintiff's position in this matter is that the jury found against him upon the evidence both in their general verdict and special findings. The jury returned a general verdict for the plaintiff for only $496.40; so they in effect found the land to be worth in the neighborhood of $900, from which they deducted the $400 already paid by the defendant, giving the plaintiff a verdict for the difference between what they found the value of the land to be and the amount already paid thereon. In the special verdict, the jury found that the plaintiff and his agent both knowingly, and with intent to deceive, made false representations affecting the value of the land. Plaintiff's counsel seek to overcome all this by calling the court's attention to, and construing, special answers of the jury numbered 6 and 7. No. 6 is as follows: "Question. Were the means of ascertaining the lay of the land, the location of the draws or ravines, and other matters in relation thereto, equally within reach of both plaintiff and defendant? Answer. Yes." In the sense in which the jury seems to have answered this question, it does not affect the plaintiff's right of recovery. They had just answered that the plaintiff and defendant were both residents of the city of Parsons; and, being residents of such city, the means for going to and making an examination of the land were probably equally within the reach of each. But the other special answers of the jury, as well as the general verdict, show that the jury believed the allegations of the defendant that he did not know the lay of the ground, so far as the particular block in controversy was concerned, and that the plaintiff and his agent did, and that the defendant told them he did not, and relied upon their statements in relation to the lay of the land. The plaintiff seems to think that, because there was a greater number of witnesses on his side in relation to these facts, the preponderance of the evidence was with him, or at least was not with the defendant. The preponderance of the evidence does not depend upon the greater number of witnesses, but upon the greater weight of evidence; and the jury are the exclusive judges of the weight to be given the testimony. The jury weighed the evidence in this case, and found in favor of the defendant; and we cannot say they did not properly adjust the scales. The seventh special finding reads as follows: "Question. Could the defendant, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, have ascertained the facts concerning the lay and character of the land described before signing the contract? Answer. Yes; and we think he did." This question and answer, standing by themselves, are susceptible, perhaps, of both constructions contended for by the parties. But this question and answer must, if possible, be harmonized with the other special answers, and with the general verdict. In the first and third answers the jury say that the plaintiff and his agent made false representations with intent to deceive, and that the defendant relied on them, which he could not have done if he had ascertained the facts for himself before signing the contract; and this is so plain a proposition that it is difficult to believe that the same jury, at the same time that they answered the first and third questions, and in connection therewith, intended, in answering the seventh question, to say that the defendant had ascertained the facts about the lay of the land for himself before signing the contract. If we put such a construction upon this last question and answer, they are in direct conflict with the general verdict. Taking all the special answers together, and in connection with the general verdict, we cannot think the jury intended to say that the defendant ascertained the lay of the block of land in any way except from the statements of the plaintiff and his agent before he signed the contract therefor. We must conclude, therefore, that by this answer the jury meant to say that the defendant exercised reasonable diligence, by making inquiry of the plaintiff and his agent, before signing the contract.

The plaintiff also complains of the instructions, or portions thereof. The instructions are very full and complete, covering all the questions that in any way arose in the case, and, taken altogether, we think, are not only not erroneous, but very fair to the plaintiff. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—EXCEPTIONS TO CHARGE—ACTION ON CONTRACT—PLEADING.

1. The court, in stating the issues of the case, referred the jury to the petition for the terms of a contract alleged to have been violated, and also for certain statements alleged to have been made by the defendant, designating where each might be found in the petition by pencil-marks, but the construction of the petition, and the determination of what the issues were, were not left to the jury. Held not prejudicial error.

Error from district court, Finney county; A. J. ABBOTT, Judge.

A. J. Hoskinson, for plaintiff in error.
C. W. Morse, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. Joseph Myer asks a reversal of a judgment for $74, rendered against him and in favor of A. T. Moon, in the district court of Finney county. One ground for the reversal is that the petition did not state a cause of action. In substance, the allegations of the petition were that on August 19, 1886, Myer, who was in the ice business in Garden City, agreed to turn over his business to Moon, together with the benefits of a contract which Myer had with Olin Bros., of Pueblo, Colo., to furnish ice to him in Garden City at a certain price, and the ice was to be ordered and purchased from Olin Bros., in the name of Myer. In pursuance of this agreement, on August 20, 1886, a car-load of ice was ordered from Olin Bros., in the name of Myer, which was received by Moon, when Myer represented that Olin Bros., were indebted to him for the amount of the bill for that car-load, and that he would settle with Olin Bros. for the same, and would do so immediately, in order to preserve credit under the contract with them, so that the ice could be promptly procured from them when ordered. Moon, relying on the truth of these statements, paid Myer the amount due for the ice; but he alleges that the statements of Myer that Olin Bros. were indebted to him were untrue; that Myer did not pay or settle with them for the ice, as he agreed to do; and that, by reason of his failure to settle with them for the ice, Olin Bros. refused to ship ice to Moon when ordered by him in the name of Myer, and disposed of the ice which they intended to supply under their contract with Myer to other parties; and that thereby Moon was unable to procure ice under the contract; and that, by reason of the conduct of Myer, Moon has been damaged in the sum of $500. We think the demurrer to the petition was properly overruled. The contract between the parties is valid, and appears to be based upon sufficient consideration. Moon agreed to pay to Myer the sum of $25, and also to furnish to Myer 5,000 or 6,000 pounds of ice at the net cost of the same at Garden City. Although the petition is not as elaborate as it might have been, it states a valid agreement, a breach of the same by Myer, and that his non-compliance and wrongful conduct resulted to the damage of Moon. It may be that the allegations of the petition are not sufficiently specific, but, if this defect exists, it should be corrected by motion, and not by demurrer. Stringfellow v. Alderson, 12 Kan. 112. The motion to require defendant in error to elect on which cause of action he would proceed to trial was properly overruled, as only a single cause of action was stated. In charging the jury, the court, instead of reciting at length the contract alleged to have been violated and the misrepresentation alleged to have been made, referred the jury to the petition, and indicated those portions of the petition where the contract and misrepresentations might be found by pencil-marks, and permitted the jury to take the petition to the jury-room with them. The practice of referring the jury to the pleadings in order to determine in whole or in part the issues of the case is not to be commended. It is the province of the court to determine the issues, and state them to the jury, and not leave them to ascertain the effect of the pleadings or the issues which they present. In this case, however, the issues were stated by the court, and the jury were only referred to the petition to ascertain the terms of the contract, which were not disputed, and the misrepresentations which it was alleged had been made by Myer. The construction of the pleadings, or the determination of what the issues were, were not left to the jury, and no prejudice could have resulted from the action of the court. It is contended that the charge of the court was incorrect in several particulars, but the exceptions were not such as to require an examination of the questions suggested. The charge contains several propositions, but only a general exception was taken at the end of the instructions. The charge appears to be correct in its general scope, and hence a general exception is unavailing. Fullenwider v. Ewing, 25 Kan. 69, and cases cited. The sufficiency of the testimony is also challenged, but there is enough to sustain a verdict which has received the approval of the trial court. Judgment affirmed. All the justices concurring.

Error from district court, Wichita county; A. J. ABBOTT, Judge.

C. H. Coan, for defendant in error.

HORTON, C. J. Thomas W. Pelham brought this action against John H. Edwards, sheriff of Wichita county, in this state, to recover the possession of certain personal property of the value of $196.45, and also for $50 as damages for the wrongful detention of the property. An affidavit for an order for the delivery of the property to the plaintiff was also filed. On the 19th day of November, 1887, the clerk of the district court issued a summons directed "To the Sheriff of Coroner County." No return was made on this writ. On the 25th day of November, 1887, the clerk of the court issued another summons, directed "To the Sheriff of Wichita County," and delivered the same to the coroner, who executed the writ and made return thereof. On November 19, 1887, the clerk issued an order of delivery directed "To the Coroner of Wichita County." This was executed by him. The term of office of John H. Edwards, as sheriff, expired on the second Monday of January, 1888, and he was succeeded by M. P. Brown. On the 25th day of April, 1889, the clerk issued another summons, directed "To the Sheriff of Wichita County." This was served and returned. On the 12th day of June, 1888, John H. Edwards, the defendant, filed a special motion to strike the summons and the writ of replevin from the files, upon the ground that they were not directed to or served by the proper officer, and for want of any legal service on the defendant. This motion was sustained by the court. Exceptions were taken, and the plaintiff brings the case here. The summons of the 25th of November, 1887, was not directed to the coroner, and therefore was not issued in accordance with the provisions of the statute. Section 701, Civil Code; paragraphs 1778, 1779, Gen. St. 1889. It being irregularly issued, the court committed no error in setting the writ and the service thereon aside. The order of delivery of November 19, 1887, was directed to the coroner, but the service thereof was properly set aside, because it was issued before the commencement of the action, and such an order cannot rightfully issue before the action is commenced. Dunlap v. McFarland, 25 Kan. 488; Thompson v. Wheeler, 29 Kan. 476. There was no proper summons issued or service made until the 25th day of April, 1889. As no regular summons was issued or any valid service made upon the defendant within 60 days after the filing of the petition, all of the proceedings before the issuance of the summons of the 25th of April, 1889, were irregular, and therefore the ruling of the court must be affirmed. It seems that the summons of April 25, 1889, was properly directed, served, and returned. The action is pending in the court below upon that service, as it does not appear from the record presented to us that this summons or the service thereof has been interfered with by the court. If no new order of delivery is issued, the action can therefore proceed upon the service last made. As before stated, the ruling of the district court will be affirmed, with costs. All the justices concurring.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PAYMENTS ON ACCOUNT.

An entry of credit, made in a book of accounts by a creditor upon an account with his debtor after a cause of action thereon is barred by the statute of limitations, is of itself insufficient to establish such a partial payment on the account as will take it out of the statutory bar.

Error from district court, Coffey county; CHARLES B. GRAVES, Judge.

G. E. Manchester, for plaintiff in error.
J. I. Wolfe, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an appeal from the decision of the probate court rejecting a demand presented by Dr. A. V. Coffin against the estate of W. T. Hamilton, deceased. The demand was a long account for medicines and medical services running from 1868, and which Coffin claimed was open and unsettled at the time of Hamilton's death, the occurrence of which is not definitely shown by the record, but must have been about the first of the year 1886. The claim was filed in the probate court on August 27, 1886, and tried in the district court on April 11, 1888, without a jury. To establish his demand, Coffin introduced in evidence a book of accounts, in which was entered in his own handwriting an account against Hamilton. The first item in the account was dated June 1, 1868, and the last item entered as a charge is dated September 6, 1881. The last item of credit entered, other than the one in dispute, is in 1876. The last entry in the account is as follows: "1886, 8, 20. Cash on above account, $2.00." This entry is in the handwriting of Coffin, and which he testifies he made on August 20, 1885. No other testimony was offered to establish the account, and the administratrix demurred to the evidence, but the demurrer was overruled, and judgment given in favor of Coffin. The only question presented is whether the entry of credit in the book of accounts, made by the creditor himself after the statute has barred the account, is such an evidence of partial payment as will revive the claim, and start the statute of limitations to running again. Assuming that the account is correct, and that it was unsettled when the last charge was made, it appears that it had long been barred before the two dollars credit was given in 1885. It was not then a subsisting debt; and will a mere entry of credit by the creditor revive a barred debt, and take the entire account out of the statute? We think not. Entries in books of account are admissible in evidence under certain circumstances, (Civil Code, § 387,) and an entry of charge or credit in a current mutual account that was within the period of limitation would be evidence tending to take the entire account out of the statute; but, where the statute has run, it is no longer an open account or a present or subsisting debt, and the creditor cannot manufacture evidence for himself by making an entry of credit upon an account on which the debtor was not liable when the entry was made. When a claim is barred, it is the act of the debtor, and not of the creditor, that will take it out of the statutory bar. An indorsement upon a note or other written obligation is the usual proof of a partial payment. Notwithstanding this, it is held that an indorsement of credit by a creditor upon a note after the statute has run affords no evidence of payment in favor of the payee, "for the reason that it is an ex parte declaration made by a party in his own favor; and no one is allowed to make evidence for himself." Easter v. Easter, 44 Kan. 151, 24 Pac. Rep. 57. The supreme court of Ohio, in determining a similar question to the one presented here, held that "the items of credit in the account-book of the deceased, given after the statute had barred the action, constitute no evidence that it was the intention of the parties that the articles thus credited should be applied on the barred account as payment." Kaufman v. Broughton, 31 Ohio St. 424. See also, Oberg v. Breen, (N. J.) 12 Atl. Rep. 203; Acklen's Ex'r v. Hickman, 60 Ala. 568. In the absence of other evidence than the mere entry of a credit by Coffin in his book of accounts after that statutory bar against the account was complete, his claim was not established, and therefore the demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained. The judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with the direction to sustain the demurrer to the evidence interposed by the plaintiff in error, and to give judgment in her favor. All the justices concurring.

SCHOOL-DIST. NO. 2 OF CHEYENNE COUNTY
v. SCHOOL-DIST. NO. 1 OF CHEYENNE COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of Kansas. March 7, 1891.)

ACTION BY SCHOOL-DISTRICT—VALIDITY OF OR-GANIZATION.

In an action by one school-district against another to recover taxes alleged to have been assessed upon the territory of the former, and illegally paid over to the latter, the validity of the organization of such school-district cannot be called in question. If the school-district bringing the suit had a de facto existence at the time of the tax-levy, its organization cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Cheyenne county; L. K. PRATT, Judge.

E. M. Phillips and S. D. Decker, for plaintiff in error. Finley & Oberlander, for defendant in error.

GREEN, C. This was an action brought in the district court of Cheyenne county by school-district No. 2 against school-district No. 1 of said county to recover $460, taxes alleged to have been collected by the latter district in the year 1885, and the apportionment due from the state school fund for the years 1885 and 1886, claimed to have been collected and paid over to district No. 1 by the treasurer of Rawlins county. It seems that before the organization of Cheyenne county it was attached to Rawlins county, and an attempt had been made to form school-district No. 2 out of a portion of the territory comprising district No. 1; and when the tax-levy was made by the officer of Rawlins county it embraced the territory of both districts; and when the taxes were collected school-district No. 1 received the entire tax, and failed to account to the plaintiff below for its proportion of the tax. The court below found for the defendant, and the plaintiff brings the case here. From the evidence, it appears that school-district No. 2 was organized on the 15th day of April, 1885. On the 15th day of May following, the voters of the newly-organized district met to perfect the organization, and officers were duly elected and qualified. The defendant below questioned the organization, and considerable evidence was introduced in regard to such organization; and it is obvious that the court decided the case in favor of the defendant on the ground that such district was not organized prior to the annual tax-levy in August, 1885, by the board of county commissioners of Rawlins county. This, we think, was error. There was sufficient evidence to clearly indicate a de facto existence of this school-district when this levy was made, and was recognized as such; and it may be that at that time it was legally organized. But that question we do not care to decide in this action. All we care to know is that it had an actual existence at the time the levy was made. The organization, and the steps taken to effect such existence, cannot be questioned in this action. Such attack must be made in a direct proceeding, prosecuted at the instance of the state, by the proper officer. Railroad Co. v. Wilson, 33 Kan. 223, 6 Pac. Rep. 281, and authorities there cited. We recommend that the judgment of the district court be reversed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—APPEARANCE BY ATTORNEY—EFFECT.

1. Evidence in this case examined, and held sufficient to support the findings of fact made by the trial court.

2. In a foreclosure proceeding against a non-resident defendant, who employs an attorney authorized to practice in the court in which the case is pending to take charge of his case, without limiting his authority, and such attorney makes a general appearance, held, that such appearance binds the defendant, and gives the court jurisdiction over his person.

(Syllabus by Strang, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Washington county; E. HUTCHINSON, Judge.

J. G. Lowe and Charles Smith, for plaintiff in error. A. S. Wilson, for defendant in error.

STRANG, C. Action in ejectment for the recovery of the W. ¼ of the N. W. ¼, and the W. ¼ of the S. W. ¼, of section 8, in township 3 S., of range 5 E., in Washington county, Kan. The plaintiff claims the land as patentee of the government. The defendant claims under a sheriff's deed resting upon a judgment of foreclosure and sale of the land upon a mortgage executed by the plaintiff to one J. Mixell. The question in the case is, did the court in the foreclosure proceeding by Mixell against the plaintiff herein obtain and have jurisdiction of the person of the defendant in that proceeding? If it did, then the judgment in this case should stand; otherwise it should be reversed. Mixell commenced a suit in the district court of Washington county to foreclose his mortgage against Clark, plaintiff herein. Clark lived in Iowa at the time. Service was had by publication, and was defective. Clark had some correspondence with J. W. Rector, a lawyer of Washington, Kan., in relation to the foreclosure proceedings, in consequence of which Rector appeared specially in the case, and had the service set aside. The case was then continued until the next term of court. The defendant herein claims that Rector, when the service was set aside, appeared generally, and asked 30 days in which to answer. The plaintiff contests this point, and it becomes the principal question of fact in the case. There was no further attempt to obtain service by publication in said foreclosure proceeding, and if the court in that proceeding got jurisdiction of the defendant therein, Clark, it was by reason of the appearance made for him in the case by J. W. Rector. Trial was had in this case, June 21, 1888, by the court without a jury, the court making the following findings of fact and conclusions of law: "Findings of fact: (1) On the 1st day of August, 1873, the plaintiff was the owner, by virtue of a patent of that date from the United States to him of the west half of the north-west quarter, and the west half of the south-west quarter, of section 8, township 3, range 5, in Washington county, Kansas. Afterwards, on the 13th day of August, 1873, he gave to one J. Mixell his promissory note for $250, due in six months, without interest, and to secure the payment of the same on the same date he executed and delivered to Mixell a mortgage on said land. (2) On May 11, 1875, said Mixell commenced an action in the district court of Washington county, Kansas, to recover the amount of said note, and to foreclose said mortgage. The plaintiff, James D. Clark, was at that time residing in Bedford, Iowa. Service by publication was attempted to be made in said action, but the service was void, and no valid service was ever made on the defendant in that action in any manner. (3) Before the August term of said court the said Clark was informed of the pendency of said action, and employed J. W. Rector, an attorney of said court, to represent him in said action, and procure a delay in the rendition of judgment, without prescribing any particular course of action to be pursued. In pursuance of such authority, J. W. Rector appeared specially at the August term of said court to set aside the service by publication, and at the same term of court, on August 6, 1875, the service was set aside and vacated, and thereupon the said J. W. Rector entered a general appearance in said action for said Clark, and asked and obtained an order of the court allowing him to file an answer in the action in 30 days from that date, and continuing the action until the next term of court. No answer was ever filed in the action, and no further appearance was made by the defendant or any one for him. (4) At the November term of said court, on November 23, 1875, judgment was rendered by default in favor of J. Mixell against James D. Clark for the amount of said note, with costs, and a foreclosure of said mortgage. The said premises were duly sold at sheriff's sale under said judgment. The sale was afterwards confirmed by said court, and on May 19, 1876, the sheriff executed and delivered to J. Mixell a deed for said premises. Afterwards, on June 7, 1876, Jerome Mixell, and Maggie, his wife, executed and delivered to one John Benda a warranty deed conveying all of said premises. Afterwards, on May 30, 1877, John Benda, and Mary, his wife, executed and delivered to the defendant, William Lilliebridge, their warranty deed, conveying to him all of said premises for the consideration of $700, which was a fair and reasonable price for the land at that time. All of said conveyances were duly recorded in the office of the register of deeds of Washington county, Kansas. (5) The defendant William Lilliebridge, since purchasing the land, has grubbed and broken about 85 acres of the land, and maintained the same in cultivation. He has built, and now has on the premises, about three-quarters of a mile of wire fence, and has paid all taxes on the premises since he purchased them, amounting in the aggregate to about $350. The premises are now worth from $3,000 to $4,000, and have a rental value of $200 per annum." "Conclusions of law: The plaintiff was divested of his title to said premises by said judgment, sheriff's sale, confirmation, and sheriff's deed, and is not entitled to recover the premises, and the defendant is entitled to judgment for costs." Motion to set aside the findings of fact, and for new trial, overruled, and judgment entered for the defendant for costs. A very lengthy brief is filed by the plaintiff in error, whose counsel also made an able oral argument before the commission. The case, however, is quite free from complications, there being but few questions to settle in this court.

The first question argued by counsel is, did J. W. Rector in fact appear for Mr. Clark in the foreclosure proceeding? The court found that he did. This settles the question, unless there is a total want of evidence to support the finding. Counsel argue very strenuously that Rector did not appear for Clark in that case. We have examined the evidence with some care, and find—First, that the appearance docket shows an appearance by Rector in his own handwriting; second, the journal entry shows that Rector appeared first specially, and had service by publication set aside, and then that he asked for 30 days to answer, which was allowed him, and the cause continued to the next term; and, lastly, Rector testifies that he appeared. It would seem that this was sufficient evidence on which to base a finding that Rector appeared in the foreclosure proceeding for Clark. If it is not, we would not know how and where to look for evidence sufficient to uphold a finding of a trial court. The plaintiff next contends that, if Rector did appear for Clark in the foreclosure proceeding, he did so without authority from Clark, and that his appearance therein could not, therefore, bind Clark to his prejudice. The court finds that Clark employed Rector to represent him in said action to procure delay in the rendition of judgment, without prescribing any particular course of action to be pursued by him in connection therewith. Plaintiff moved to set aside this finding of the court, because not sustained by the evidence; and now contends that it is not supported by the evidence, and that, as the evidence is wholly in writing in the form of letters, this court should construe them, and say whether the evidence therein contained supports the finding of the court. It is conceded that all the authority Rector had to represent Clark was contained in certain letters from Clark to him. Clark first wrote Rector from Bedford, Iowa, May 31, 1875, asking Rector to let him (Clark) know whether or not Mixell had foreclosed the mortgage on his land. Rector evidently answered that letter, though the answer does not appear in the record, for on June 12th Clark again writes Rector, in which he says: "I was not surprised that Mixell had commenced suit." And after writing a long letter, telling Rector all about the transaction with Mixell, and his own hard luck, and some other matters, he winds up by saying: "Now these are the facts in the case. I wish you to attend to it accordingly. I will send you a retainer as soon as I hear from you again." It would seem as though the request of Clark, in this letter, for Rector to look after the foreclosure proceeding, is broad enough to justify Rector in appearing generally in the case, or in doing anything that an attorney could do legitimately for his client in the case. And if, pursuant to said request, Rector thought it best to appear for Clark, and get time to answer in the case, and he did so, we think the authority was sufficient. Counsel for plaintiff say, however, that Rector did not appear pursuant to the authority contained in the letter last above mentioned, and cite Rector's letters written to Clark thereafter on June 21st and July 18th as evidence to sustain their contention. They argue that the letters show that Rector did not accept the employment tendered him in Clark's letter when he received it, but demanded in his letters of June 21st and July 18th a retainer of $15; and that at the time of his appearance for Clark, August 4th, he had not again heard from Clark, and had not received his retainer fee; and that therefore no contract of employment was consummated which authorized Rector to appear for Clark. It is true Rector wrote, saying: "If you want me to attend to the matter for you, send me a retainer of $15." He did not say, however, that he would not attend to the matter for Clark until he received the $15. Rector had not heard from Clark, after writing him on July 18th, up to the time when it became necessary to act in the matter by reason of the fact that the court was in session, and the foreclosure case reached for trial. Rector then appeared. Looking back to Clark's last expression upon the subject, contained in his letter of June 12th, Rector concluded he would attend to the matter for Clark, and take his chances of getting his fee when he heard from Clark. We think he had a right to do that; and, having done it, and appeared, his appearance binds Clark. And to show that what he did was in exact accord with Clark's wishes in relation thereto, we call attention to Clark's next letter, written five days after Rector had appeared in the foreclosure case, in which Clark says: "I want you to stave off this case by all means, and I will send you the retainer certainly in a very few days. * * * Take hold of the case at once, and be sure to stave it off." If this letter had been received by Rector before he appeared, there would be nothing left to hang a doubt upon, concerning his right to appear. Being received by Rector immediately after he had appeared, and requesting him to do exactly what he had asked Rector in his last letter to him, before this one, to do, and exactly what Rector had done, we think Clark is estopped now from denying Rector's authority to appear for him. Rector having authority to appear for Clark in the proceeding to foreclose the Mixell mortgage, and having done so, the court in that case got jurisdiction over the person of Clark, and the judgment and sale which followed divested him of title in the land in controversy; and the defendant herein, having procured the title derived from the sheriff in that proceeding, has a good title to the land in dispute. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

SOUTHERN KAN. RY. CO. v. WALSH.

INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—BURDEN OF PROOF—DEGREE OF CARE—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

1. Where a passenger brings an action to recover for injuries resulting from the derailment of the train on which he was riding, and therein shows the occurrence of the accident and the extent of his injuries, a prima facie case is made out in his favor, and the burden is thrown upon the railway company to show that the injury did not result from a want of care upon its part.

2. The prima facie case thus made out may be overthrown by showing that the injury resulted from inevitable accident, or something against which no human prudence or foresight on the part of the company could provide.

3. The railway company owes a higher duty to its passengers than mere ordinary care and foresight in the construction and maintenance of its tracks. It is bound to exercise the highest degree of practicable care; not the utmost possible precaution that might be imagined, but the highest care and best precaution known to practical use, and which are consistent with the mode of transportation adopted.

4. The question of how general or how particular the question of fact to be submitted to the jury, in any particular case, should be, rests largely in the sound judicial discretion of the trial court.

5. The admission of improper evidence is not a ground of reversal, where the special findings show the testimony elicited to have been immaterial.

6. The testimony examined, and held to be sufficient to sustain the findings of the jury that the injury resulted from the negligence of the railway company; and the testimony in relation to the character of the injury is found to be of such a character that the allowance of $5,246 as damages is not so excessive as to warrant the court in interfering with the verdict.

Error from district court, Montgomery county; GEORGE CHANDLER, Judge.

Geo. R. Peck, A. A. Hurd, and Robert Dunlap, for plaintiff in error. William Dunkin, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an action for injuries received by L. C. Walsh while a passenger on one of the trains of the Southern Kansas Railway Company, en route from Moline to Independence. The train was derailed between the points mentioned, and he alleged in his petition that the track of the railroad between the points named was out of repair and dangerous for travel; that the company willfully and wantonly permitted the rails to become battered and worn, the cross-ties rotten and unfit for use, and negligently failed to use a proper quantity and quality of ballast on the track; and that on February 14, 1887, when the derailment occurred, the road was utterly unsafe and unfit for use. He avers that, as a result of this condition, the train was thrown from the track when running at a high rate of speed, and he was injured, as follows: "Severe wound on the left side of the head, laying open the scalp for two inches in length, cutting through to the bone; also severe contused injury of left shoulder, and to the entire scapular region of the left shoulder, tearing the scapula from its muscular attachments, and tilting it forward; and also causing a separation of the first, second, and third ribs from their sternal attachment; also causing a separation of the clavicle from its sternal attachment, throwing it forward and upward, permanently dislocating the said clavicle; also a severe contusion of the left lung, causing spitting and coughing of blood; also bruises in face and over various parts of the body." A verdict was rendered in favor of Walsh, in which the jury assessed his damages at $5,246.

It is first insisted that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict rendered, or to show any liability whatever on the part of the company. It appears that on February 14, 1887, Walsh purchased a ticket at Moline for a passage from that point over the Southern Kansas Railroad to Independence, paying therefor the sum of $1.10. The train was behind time, and when it arrived at Moline he entered one of the coaches, seated himself, and proceeded on his journey until they reached a point about two miles east of Longton, where the train was derailed. Some of the coaches were overturned, down an embankment, and Walsh was severely injured. There is testimony tending to show that the track was in bad condition where the accident occurred; that the ties were unsound, and not properly ballasted. It is shown, and conceded, that the immediate cause of the derailment was the breaking of a rail. It had been put in the track only two days before, to replace one which had also been broken at the same place. The company contends that an examination of the broken placed disclosed no flaws or defects which could have been detected by the exercise of the utmost caution and foresight, and that therefore the accident was fortuitous and unavoidable, for which it should not and could not be held liable. On the other side, it is contended that, although there were no apparent flaws or cracks in the rail, it was broken, because it was not sufficiently supported by ties and ballast. Upon this question there is a sharp conflict in the testimony. The sectionmen who put in the rail two days before the occurrence of the wreck testified that the rail was placed on a solid bearing; that ties were placed under the end of the rail which broke off, and that soil and ballast were tamped about the ties so as to make the track solid and secure. On the other hand, there is positive testimony offered by Walsh that the rail which broke extended about two feet over a cattle-guard, the frame-work of which was solid, and that the end which projected beyond the cattle-guard was spiked to ties, but that the ties were drawn or lifted from the ground at one end about six inches, and that the soil and ballast were not filled in and tamped under and about them. If the track was in this condition, it was dangerous and unfit for use; and this defect would fairly account for the breaking of the rail and the wreck of the train. In view of this testimony, and the finding of the jury that the sectionmen did not fill the space between the tie and the ground, but left the end of the rail with the ties attached suspended several inches from the ground, and that the ties at the place of the accident were unsound, we cannot say that the verdict is without support. The company are not insurers of their passengers, nor liable for injuries resulting from unavoidable accident in the operation of passenger trains; but there is testimony tending to show a great lack of care in providing a safe road-bed and track, and, "if the defendant could have prevented the accident by the utmost human sagacity or foresight with respect to their track, then the defendant is liable." Railroad Co. v. Hand, 7 Kan. 392.

It is also contended that there was error in permitting testimony to be offered by Walsh in regard to the condition of the track at other points than where the wreck occurred. Of course, testimony of defects which did not cause the derailment nor contribute to the injury was not admissible. An examination of the record indicates that the purpose of the court was to confine the testimony to the condition of the track in the immediate vicinity of the place, and near to the time where and when the train was derailed. The inquiry as to the condition of the company's track was considerably extended by both parties, and in many cases without objection, for the purpose of determining the real cause of the wreck; but as the trial proceeded it soon became evident to all that the breaking of the rail caused the derailment of the cars, and the findings of the jury showed that they attributed the accident to this cause; and, looking at the testimony and findings together, we see nothing substantial in any of the objections to the admission of evidence.

Complaint is also made that the court erred in refusing to submit three special questions which were asked. No error was committed in this respect. A long list of particular questions were submitted and answered, and, so far as any facts inquired about in those refused were proper and material, they were covered by the questions that were submitted and answered. The principal question refused was: "Could any reasonable and ordinary foresight have anticipated the breaking of the iron rail after it had been left in the track by the workmen?" In the first place, the question is somewhat general, while only particular questions of fact are required to be submitted; and the question of how general or how particular the question of fact to be submitted to a jury, in any particular case, should be, rests very largely in the sound judicial discretion of the trial court. Foster v. Turner, 31 Kan. 62, 1 Pac. Rep. 145. Then, again, as we have seen, the company owes a higher duty to its passengers than mere ordinary care and foresight in the construction and maintenance of its tracks. It must use the most exact diligence, and is answerable for any negligence, however slight. It is bound to exercise the highest degree of practicable care; not the utmost possible precaution that might be imagined, but the highest care and best precaution known to practical use, and which are consistent with the mode of transportation adopted. Railroad Co. v. Hand, supra; 2 Wood, Ry. Law, 1088.

There is also complaint that the court erred in the instructions given to the jury. The charge was very elaborate, calling attention to some of the evidence, and it is claimed that in doing so the court indicated its opinion of the facts, and improperly influenced the jury. A reading of the entire charge satisfies us that the court expressed no opinion on the facts, and that the company was not prejudiced by the course taken. The trial judge simply called attention in a general way to the theories advanced by the respective parties, and the testimony offered in support of their theories, without indicating his view on any disputed point in the testimony. Besides, he repeatedly stated to the jury that he did not intend to express any opinion on the facts, and told them that they were the exclusive judges of the facts established by the evidence in the case, the credibility of the witnesses, and the weight to be given to the testimony of each.

Special objection is taken to an instruction a portion of which reads as follows: "I may likewise say to you there is still another rule applicable to this case: That if you find from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff in this action was free from fault, and was injured, then the law presumes negligence on the part of the defendant." It is contended that this instruction was erroneous and misleading, and permitted the jury to find the company guilty of negligence, and liable therefor, on the mere evidence that the plaintiff was injured. It is conceded that, if the court had added to this instruction that if the jury found that Walsh was a passenger on the train of the company, and was injured on account of a defect in the track or some of the appliances of the road or its machinery, then the presumption of negligence would arise; but, as injuries frequently happen without any fault or misconduct on the part of the company or its employees, that, therefore, the instruction was erroneous and prejudicial. The instruction complained of is not to be taken by itself, and without reference to the other portions of the charge in which it is found. The court expressly stated to the jury that the burden rested on the plaintiff to show that the injury resulted from the negligence of the company, and that negligence could not be presumed. The part of the charge criticised referred to the presumption which arises where a collision between railway trains occurs, or where a train is derailed and passengers thereon are injured. It is well settled by the authorities that in such cases a prima facie presumption of negligence on the part of the railroad company arises, which throws the onus upon the company of disproving a want of care on its part. Proof of the occurrence of the accident, and the extent of the passenger's injury, makes a prima facie case in his favor; but this may be overthrown by showing that the injury resulted from inevitable accident, or something against which no human prudence or foresight on the part of the company could provide. Breen v. Railroad Co., 109 N. Y. 297, 16 N. E. Rep. 60; Railway Co. v. Napheys, 90 Pa. St. 135; Stokes v. Saltonstall, 13 Pet. 190; Railroad Co. v. Pollard, 22 Wall. 341; Smith v. Railroad Co., 32 Minn. 1, 18 N. W. Rep. 827; Railroad Co. v. Anderson, 6 Amer. & Eng. Ry. Cas. 407; Hipsley v. Railroad Co., 27 Amer. & Eng. Ry. Cas. 287; Railroad Co. v. Walrath, 38 Ohio St. 461; Bowen v. Railroad Co., 18 N. Y. 408; Feltal v. Railway Co., 109 Mass. 394; Railway Co. v. Findley, 76 Ga. 311; 2 Wood, Ry. Law, 1086; Patt. Ry. Acc. Law, 438, and cases cited. The instruction complained of should have required a finding by the jury that the injury resulted from the derailment; but this fact was not disputed, and, as the derailment is conceded to have been caused by a broken rail in the track of the company, the omission is unimportant. In other portions of the charge the jury are advised that, if the derailment was an inevitable accident, and not the fault of the company, the law will hold it blameless and free from liability. The degree of care required of the company and of Walsh, and the rules of law applicable to the case under the evidence that was given, were fairly stated, and we find nothing in the charge which requires a reversal.

One other objection remains, and that is that the damages awarded are excessive. Only compensatory damages were allowed, and the amount of the allowance ($5,246) was itemized by the jury, as follows: "For suffering in the past, $1,000; for suffering in the future, $1,000; for inability to perform physical labor, $3,000; for physician's bills, $150; for board and lodging, $42; for loss of time, 18 days, at $3 per day, $54." While it appears to us that the amount awarded is liberal, we cannot say that the jury acted corruptly, or under the influence of passion, partiality, or prejudice. At the time of the accident, Walsh was 31 years of age, in excellent health, and held the position of United States pension examiner, the compensation of which was about $2,500 per year. Dr. McCulley, who examined him shortly after the injury occurred, found a wound on the back of his head two inches in length, and half an inch deep; a fracture of the clavicle bone, near the middle breast-bone; a complete fracture of the first, second, and third ribs; the scapula was thrown out of its natural position, and one of the large muscles which held the scapula was torn from its attachment; the pleura which surrounds one of the lungs was ruptured; and he also found a continual coughing, and an occasional coughing up of blood. On a subsequent examination, shortly before the trial, the same witness stated that he found a vesicular condition of the lungs, and inability to expire air, and that it was his opinion that his ability for labor was greatly impaired, and perhaps to the extent of one-half; that the effect of his injury would be to render him liable to attacks of asthma and diseases of the lungs, and to shorten his life. Dr. Masterson, one of the surgeons of the railway company, examined Walsh shortly after his injury, and discovered the same fractures and injuries that were found by Dr. McCulley. He also found that there was an emphysematous condition of the lungs, and that the upper lobe of the left lung was injured. There was also a cough, and bloody expectoration. That, on account of a rupture of the lung tissue, the air escaped and passed through the pleura of the lung into the cellular tissues. On another examination, shortly before the trial, he found that there was a dilation of the air vessels, and enlarged condition of the terminal ends of the bronchial tubes, and that, in his opinion, Walsh would never fully recover from the effects of the injuries. Another physician who examined him stated that the effect of the injury would be to weaken his lungs, shorten his life, and occasion him pain and suffering. Walsh testified that he had suffered great pain from the injuries until the wounds were healed and the bones united; that the injuries had greatly affected his general health; that he had continuous pain in the region of his kidneys, a bloody discharge with his urine, a continuous cough, with pain in the lungs; that his powers of endurance were greatly lessened, and his ability to perform manual or mental labor was not more than one-half of what it was prior to the injury. The testimony shows that the injury, which has already caused Walsh great pain and suffering, is of a permanent character, that it greatly impairs his ability for labor, will subject him to discomfort and pain during the future, and render him less able to resist or recover from other diseases hereafter. In view of the age, former good health, and earning capacity of Walsh, and his condition as shown by the testimony referred to, we do not feel warranted in interfering with the verdict upon the ground that the award of damages is excessive. The judgment of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

CARTWRIGHT V. KORMAN.

RECOVERY OF LAND SOLD FOR TAXES—LIMITATIONS—TAX-DEED.

1. The limitation provided by section 141 of the tax law is not modified or limited by section 17 of the Civil Code, nor are persons who are insane excepted from its operation.

2. A tax deed recited that four lots on a certain street of a city, describing them, were subject to taxation for a certain year, and, the taxes not being paid, they were sold separately to a single purchaser. In the recitals of the sale the description of each is distinct from the others, but all stand described together in the body of the deed. In the subsequent recitals relating to assignment and redemption they were all referred to as "said property." The granting clause then provides that in consideration of the taxes due and paid on "said land" the county clerk conveys to the purchaser "the real property last hereinbefore described." Held, that the deed was valid on its face, and effectually conveys all four of the lots.

Error from district court, Shawnee county; JOHN GUTHRIE, Judge.

Hazen & Isenhardt, for plaintiff in error.
J. D. McFarland, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. This was an action in the nature of ejectment to recover the possession of lots 28 and 30 on Harrison street in the city of Topeka. Amelia Korman was the owner of the lots named in 1862, and still continues to be the owner, unless she has been divested of her title by a tax-deed executed and delivered to S. S. Cartwright on November 15, 1878. Amelia Korman has been of unsound mind ever since 1869, and on July 16, 1877, she was duly adjudged by the probate court of Leavenworth county to be insane and incapable of managing her own affairs, and immediately afterwards she was committed to the insane asylum, where she has since remained, never having been restored to her right mind. In May, 1873, the lots in question were sold for the taxes of 1872, and on November 15, 1878, they were conveyed by tax-deed to Cartwright, as has been stated, and the deed was duly recorded on the same day. The property was vacant and unimproved when the conveyance was made and until September, 1879, when Cartwright took possession of the same and erected buildings and fences thereon, and has continued in possession ever since that time. In July, 1877, B. Korman was appointed guardian of the person and estate of Amelia, and has continued to be such guardian till the present time. The district court found these facts, and also what the rental value of the lots would have been in an unimproved condition as well as in their improved condition for the time Cartwright has been in possession. It also found that the proceedings upon which the tax-deed was based were irregular, and insufficient to sustain the deed, and thereupon rendered judgment in favor of Amelia Korman and against S. S. Cartwright for the possession of the lots, and for $1,209 damages for the unlawful withholding of the same.

The main question presented by the record is whether the irregularities mentioned are now available to defeat the deed, or whether they have been cured by the limitation prescribed in section 141 of the tax law. It reads as follows: "Any suit or proceeding against the tax purchaser, his heirs or assigns, for the recovery of land sold for taxes, or to defeat or avoid a sale or conveyance of land for taxes, except in cases where the taxes have been paid or the land redeemed as provided by law, shall be commenced within five years from the time of recording the tax-deed, and not thereafter." This section is broad and general in its terms, and makes no exception of persons under disabilities. The limitation begins to run immediately upon the recording of the tax-deed, and against all persons except in such cases, and against such persons as are expressly excepted from its operation. The only exception provided is where the taxes have been paid or the lots redeemed as provided by law. Provision is made in the Code whereby persons who are under disability such as infancy or insanity when the cause of action accrues may bring their action within two years after the disability is removed. Civil Code, §17. But section 141 of the tax law is not modified, controlled, or limited to any extent by the provisions of the Code. It has been determined that it is complete in itself, except so far as it is modified by other provisions of the tax law. Beebe v. Doster, 36 Kan. 666, 14 Pac. Rep. 150. See, also, Edwards v. Sims, 40 Kan. 285, 19 Pac. Rep. 710. Our attention is not called to any provision of the tax law which modifies or limits this provision, except section 128 of that statute. It provides that minors may redeem lands sold for taxes at any time before they become of age, and one year thereafter. It also provides that the lands of idiots and insane persons may be redeemed at any time within five years after the sale in the manner provided in the tax law. In section 127 of the tax law the ordinary period of redemption is fixed at three years, and certainly, if there had been no exception to this general provision, neither minors nor insane persons could have had longer time than three years in which to redeem. The right to redeem is purely statutory, and the legislature having made the exceptions named, indicates that no others were intended. For the same reason the period for bringing actions to defeat or avoid a sale or conveyance of land sold for taxes as provided in section 141 cannot be extended, nor can any cases be excepted from its operation beyond those expressly provided by the legislature. An insane owner may bring an action to defeat the tax-deed within five years after the recording of the same, and may redeem or institute proceedings to redeem within five years after the sale of land for taxes. Taking the two provisions together, it is manifest that insane persons are not excepted from the operation of section 141. However wise and politic it might be to give persons laboring under the disability of insanity a longer time in which to redeem or to begin an action for the recovery of land sold for taxes, the courts have no power to extend the time of limitation beyond that fixed by statute. The legislature alone has this power. In this case the guardian was appointed prior to the execution of the tax-deed, and before the expiration of the time to redeem the land or to bring an action to defeat the tax-deed for irregularity. He neglected to take any steps to redeem or recover the property, and the responsibility for any loss or damage occasioned by his neglect to protect the interests of the estate rests upon him.

There is a further contention that the deed is void on its face, and therefore Cartwright acquired no right of possession under it; but counsel for plaintiff in error state that this position was not sustained by the district court. The deed purports to convey lots 24, 28, 30, and the south half of 22, on Harrison street. It recites that these lots, naming them, were subject to taxation for the year 1872, and, the taxes not being paid, they were sold separately for several distinct sums. In the recitals of the sale the description of each lot is distinct from the others, but all are given together in the body of the deed, and all were sold to the same purchaser. Then follows a recital that the purchaser assigned the certificate of sale of "said property" to Cartwright, who had paid the subsequent taxes thereon, and that "said property" had not been redeemed. The granting clause then provides that, in consideration of the taxes due and paid on "said land," the county clerk grants, bargains, and sells to Cartwright "the real property last hereinbefore described." It is claimed that the "property last hereinbefore described" is only the south half of lot 22, and that under the decision of Spicer v. Howe, 38 Kan. 465, 16 Pac. Rep. 825, it must be held that the deed was ineffectual to convey lots 28 and 30, which are in controversy. We do not think the present case is ruled by the one cited. In that case there was in the granting clause a single and independent tract of land, which was specifically described wholly apart from any other description, and it was held that the property "last hereinbefore described" referred alone to that description. In the present case all four of the lots are described together, and in the subsequent recitals of the deed all four lots are referred to as "said property" and "said land." As they were all sold to a single person, and as they stand described together in the deed, and as all are afterwards spoken of together as "said property" in the recitals relating to assignment and redemption, we think the phrase in the granting clause, "the real property last hereinbefore described," fairly includes all of them, and that the deed effectually conveys all. It follows from these considerations that the plaintiff in error was entitled to judgment upon the findings, and therefore the judgment of the district court will be reversed, and cause remanded, with direction to give judgment in favor of plaintiff in error. All the justices concurring.

MISSOURI PAC. RY. CO. v. BAXTER.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—KILLING STOCK—FENCES.

1. Whenever it is shown that a railroad has not been fenced, and that an animal has passed upon the track and been killed or injured, a prima facie case has been made out against the company. Railway Co. v. Bradshaw, 38 Kan. 583, 6 Pac. Rep. 917, cited and followed.

2. The laws of this state impose an obligation upon railroad companies to fence their tracks against all animals against which a good and lawful fence would be a protection.

3. The fence law makes a distinction as to animals and lawful fences. Where hogs are permitted to run at large, a certain fence is a lawful one; where they are not allowed to run at large, another standard is adopted.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Dickinson county; M. B. NICHOLSON, Judge.

Waggener, Martin & Orr and Stambaugh, Hurd & Dewey, for plaintiff in error. John H. Mahan, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. Baxter commenced this action before a justice of the peace in Dickinson county to recover from the railway company for killing and injuring certain sheep belonging to him. The case was tried before the justice, and then appealed to the district court. A trial was had before a jury at the October term, 1887, and a verdict and judgment rendered in favor of the defendant in error for $90 damages, and $33 attorney fees. At the trial in the district court it was shown that Baxter kept about 320 sheep in a large pasture, through which the track of the defendant's road was located. This pasture was in one inclosure, and fenced with a barb-wire fence, sheep-tight. The fence consisted of five wires stretched tightly from post to post, the posts being two rods apart. The top wire is about four feet from the ground. There is a space of fifteen inches between the first and second wires, a space of ten inches between the second and third wires, and a space of about nine inches between the third and fourth wires, and a space of from five to seven inches between the fourth and fifth wires; the latter wire being about four inches from the ground. The railroad track running through the pasture was not fenced. On the 10th day of April, 1887, 12 sheep were killed and 17 injured by the engine and cars of the railroad company. These were all killed or injured in the pasture. The negligence of the railroad company consisted of the fact that they had neglected to fence their track. When the plaintiff below rested his case, the attorneys for the railroad company demurred to his evidence, and the overruling of this demurrer is their first assignment of error.

The theory of the demurrer was that, if the railroad company had inclosed their track with a fence composed of posts and three wires, it would not have prevented the sheep from going onto the railroad track. All the law requires of a railroad company, to escape the charge of negligence, is the construction of a lawful fence. If such a fence, as a matter of fact, would not prevent the sheep from getting on the railroad track, yet the compliance of the company with the statutory requirement would relieve it from all damages. The law declares the material, height, and construction of a lawful fence. Its function is to secure the growing crops, the grass, and the live-stock of the land-owner from injury and damage. As a matter of legal presumption, a lawful fence is amply sufficient to protect the track from the invasion of live-stock and trespassing animals. The defendant in error, on cross-examination, virtually admitted that a fence whose lower wire was two feet from the ground would not be a protection to all the sheep; that some could pass under the lower wire of such a fence. The railroad stock law of 1874 imposes an obligation upon railroad companies to fence their tracks against all animals against which a good and lawful fence would be a protection. Railway Co. v. Roads, 38 Kan. 640, 7 Pac. Rep. 218; Railway Co. v. Bradshaw, 38 Kan. 533, 6 Pac. Rep. 917. Whenever it is shown that a railroad has not been fenced, and that an animal has passed upon the track and been killed, a prima facie case has been made out against the railroad company. Railway Co. v. Bradshaw, 38 Kan. 533, 6 Pac. Rep. 917. How legal fences are to be constructed is plainly set forth in chapter 40, Gen. St. 1889. The contention in favor of the demurrer to the evidence in this case assumes that a post and wire fence such as is described in paragraph 3062 of the General Statutes is the fence that a railroad company is obligated to build; whereas the law requires such a fence as will keep all animals off of the track. There was no showing as to whether hogs were permitted to run at large in the township in which the pasture was situated; and we think it was incumbent upon the railroad company to show affirmatively what would have been a legal fence in that township, and that such a fence, if built, would not have kept the sheep away from the track, in order to escape liability. There was no error in overruling the demurrer to the evidence.

Exceptions were taken to certain instructions given by the court, but the brief only criticises the seventh. It says: "It is not a question of negligence. The question is, did they have their railway fenced? If they did not, and if they killed this man's sheep on his premises, and failed and neglected to fence their right of way as it ran through his pasture, then they are liable to pay him the full value of the animals killed or injured." It being incumbent upon the railroad company to show a lawful fence, or, if they had a lawful fence, it would not have kept the sheep off the track, and no such showing having been made, the instruction is not error. We recommend an affirmance of the judgment.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

MISSOURI PAC. RY. CO. v. RICKETTS. .
(Supreme Court of Kansas. March 7, 1891.)
RAILROAD COMPANIES—KILLING STOCK—DEFECTION—CATTLE-GUARDS.

1. It is the duty of a railroad company operating a railroad to see that the proper cattle-guards exist wherever the track of the operated railroad enters or leaves inclosed or fenced land, whether such railroad company owns or is operating the railroad under a lease.

2. In an action for damages, caused by the neglect of a railroad company, operating a railroad that it owns or leases, to keep the cattle-guards in repair at the place the track enters and leaves the inclosed or fenced land of the complaining party, that party has the right to include in his claim for damages the value of his services, and that of his children, in driving out and berding stock to prevent further and additional damages.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Anderson county; A. W. BENSON, Judge.

W. A. JOHNSON, for plaintiff in error.
Kirk, Schoonover & Bowman, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. The defendant in error commenced three several suits before a justice of the peace of Garnett, Anderson county, Kan., and judgments were taken, and the cases appealed to the district court, where the cases were consolidated, and tried as one case. The several suits were for damages alleged to have been sustained by defendant in error for failure to put in and maintain cattle-guards on the line of road running through defendant's premises, which were particularly described in the bills of particulars. It is alleged in the several bills of particulars that the Missouri Pacific Railway Company owned, operated, and controlled the railway running through the premises of Flora R. Ricketts. The Missouri Pacific Railway Company denied that it owned or controlled a line of railway running through the premises of Mrs. Ricketts, and says that it is not liable for a failure to construct cattle-guards on said railway. The case was tried before the court and jury. The jury returned answers to special interrogatories as follows: "(1) What was the value of the services of Flora R. Ricketts per day for what she did about herding the cattle out of her crops? Answer. $.50 per day. (2) How many days did Flora R. Ricketts spend in and about herding her crops? A. 125 days. (3) Did Flora R. Ricketts devote all of her time to the keeping the cattle out of her crops? A. No. (4) What do you allow Flora R. Ricketts, if anything, per day for herding the cattle out of her crops? A. $1.00 per day. (5) What amount do you allow plaintiff for her children in searching her crops to keep cattle out of the crops? A. $.50 per day. (6) What amount do you allow plaintiff for the destruction of the oats crop? A. $5.33%. (7) What amount do you allow plaintiff for loss of corn? A. $10.66%. (8) Did the plaintiff keep the cattle out of her crops from the 1st day of April, 1887, to the 1st day of August, 1887? A. No. (9) Who owns the railroad which runs through the land on which plaintiff's crops were injured? A. Missouri Pacific Railway Company. (10) Did the plaintiff devote all her time to watching and herding the cattle out of her crops from April, 1, 1887, to August 3, 1887? A. No. (11) Did plaintiff attend to her usual household duties during all the time from April 1, 1887, to August 3, 1887, and watch the field from her house, and, when the cattle came to the field, send her children to drive the cattle away? A. No. (12) Did the plaintiff have any person herd or watch her crops from April 1, 1887, to August 3, 1887, except her children, one of about 12 years of age, and one of the age of about 9 years? A. No. (13) What amount do you allow in the aggregate for damages to crops by cattle in this action? A. $14.00. (14) What amount do you allow to plaintiff in this action in the aggregate, in addition to the amount allowed as damages to the crops? A. $125.00." A judgment was rendered in favor of Mrs. Ricketts for $139.

1. After the plaintiff below had introduced all her evidence, and rested her case, the railway company filed a demurrer to her evidence, for the reason that the evidence on behalf of the plaintiff did not prove a cause of action in her favor, which demurrer was overruled by the court, and defendant excepted to the judgment of the court in overruling said demurrer. This is the first error complained of. Robert Wing, the station agent of the Missouri Pacific Railway Company at Garnett, was called as a witness, and, after testifying to his agency, stated that on the 1st day of April, 1887, the Missouri Pacific Railway Company was operating the Kansas, Nebraska & Dakota line through Anderson county, and had been since about the 1st day of March; that they ran trains, collected fares and charges, and had full control. In view of this showing, we think the trial court ruled properly on the demurrer to the evidence. In the case of Railway Co. v. Morrow, 32 Kan. 217, 4 Pac. Rep. 87, it is said: "It is always the duty of a railroad company operating a railroad to see that proper cattle-guards exist wherever its railroad enters and leaves improved or fenced land, whether such railway company owns the railroad, or is simply operating it under a lease."

2. It may be that there is not sufficient evidence to justify the jury to say, in answer to the ninth special interrogatory, that the Missouri Pacific Railway Company owned the line that runs through the land of Flora Ricketts, but, as there was proof that it was being operated by that company, its ownership is immaterial.

3. It is claimed that the amount of recovery is too large; that, if the plaintiff below undertook to protect her crops at the expense of the railroad company, she should not be allowed for injury to the crops. This objection is covered by the cases of Railway Co. v. Sharp, 27 Kan. 184, and Same v. Ritz, 33 Kan. 403, 6 Pac. Rep. 533, that hold substantially that, for damages resulting by the omission of the railroad company to perform a plain duty under the statute, the injured party has the right to include in his claim for damages the value of his services in driving out and herding stock to prevent further and additional damages. The cases cited are sufficient in all respects to sustain the rulings and judgment of the trial court. It is recommended that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

DOTY v. BASSETT.

COLLECTION OF TAXES—PUBLIC LANDS.

Chapter 39, Sess. Laws 1877, relating to the collection of delinquent taxes on real estate bid off by counties and cities at tax-sales, is to be understood as referring to real estate where "taxes are due and unpaid," and not as including real estate belonging to the United States, and therefore not liable to taxation. Substituted for 24 Pac. Rep. 944.

On rehearing. For former opinion, see 24 Pac. Rep. 944.

PER CURIAM. The land in controversy was located by A. P. Hamilton with a land-warrant on June 6, 1871, and was approved August 20, 1872. It was assessed for taxes in the spring of 1871, before the location of the land-warrant, and while it was government land. It was sold to the county in May, 1872, for $4.84 for the tax wrongfully assessed against it in 1871. The land has always been vacant. The taxes for the year 1872, and each year since, have been paid by Oren Doty or his grantors. In October, 1877, an action was begun in the district court of Greenwood county to subject a large number of pieces of land to the payment of taxes, under the provisions of chapter 39 of the Laws of 1877. This land was attempted to be described in an exhibit filed with the petition, but it is doubtful whether it was ever attached as an exhibit. A judgment was rendered for the alleged tax of 1871 and penalties, amounting to $19. The land was appraised at $200. It was subsequently sold and bid in by the county with much other land, and retained by the county until after the repeal of said chapter 39. On the 9th of January, 1880, the board of county commissioners sold about 14,000 acres of land, including this piece, at private sale, to Ira P. Nye, J. M. Seidle, H. C. Rizer, and C. A. Wakefield, for $1,000, and conveyed the same by a quitclaim deed. Albert Bassett claims title by a quitclaim deed from Nye and Seidle, executed March 10, 1882. He paid about six cents per acre. Oren Doty and his grantors, having all been non-residents of Greenwood county, had no actual knowledge of the existence of the claim of title of Bassett, or the facts upon which the same is based, until a few months before the bringing of this action, when, in attempting to sell, an abstract of title revealed the same. On the 7th of September, 1887, Doty obtained a decree quieting title against Greenwood county. This is an action to quiet his title as against the pretended claim of title of Albert Bassett. The collection of taxes is a proceeding in rem. There is no inherent vice in collecting taxes by judicial proceedings in the courts, if the property or real estate is taxable, and there are taxes to collect. A tax, when duly levied, becomes a lien upon the land, which may be enforced in such manner as the legislature may prescribe. Pritchard v. Madren, 24 Kan. 486. But in this case no tax was duly levied. The real estate was government or public land, and not subject to assessment or taxation on the 1st of March, 1871. The 1st of March is the time at which the taxability of property is determined. This is true, as a general rule, of both personal and real property. Gen. St. p. 1023, § 8; Id. p. 1024, § 11; Id. p. 1027, § 19; Id. p. 1029, §§ 25, 27; Id. p. 1032, § 35. The last section provides that "lands entered on or before the 1st day of March in each year shall be subject to taxation for that year." Long v. Culp, 14 Kan. 412. As the land was not taxable in the spring of 1871, and as the land had not been sold or bid in by the county for any delinquent taxes, chapter 39, Sess. Laws 1877, had no application, and the district court no jurisdiction to condemn or sell the land. Said chapter 39 has application only "for any taxes due and unpaid." Where land is not taxable, there are no "taxes due and unpaid." Railway Co. v. Culp, 9 Kan. 38, (see note containing the opinion of Mr. Justice MILLER, of the United States supreme court;) Taylor v. Miles, 5 Kan. 498. As the alleged tax of 1871 was not merely voidable, but absolutely void from the beginning, for the reason that the land in question was not subject to taxation for that year, neither the legislature nor the court had any control over the land to levy or collect taxes thereon for 1871. In Taylor v. Miles, supra, it was said, among other things, by Mr. Justice VALENTINE, that "when a party may know that his land is subject to taxation, (and in such a case the law conclusively presumes that he does know it,) he is presumed to take notice of all the steps taken with reference to the assessment, levy, and collection of taxes thereon; the sale, the deed, and the record thereof; and all other proceedings connected therewith; and, if any mere irregularities occur in the proceedings, he is presumed to have waived the same, unless he commences his action within the prescribed time. But no such presumption can arise in favor of a void tax-deed, founded upon a void tax, which the state has no authority to impose. * * * The legislature cannot say that a man shall do a thing that they have no right to compel him to do, and then say, if he does not do it, he shall forfeit his estate. The legislature may properly compel a man to watch the offices of the county treasurer, the county clerk, and the register of deeds, to see that no tax-title shall accrue upon his land, if it is subject to taxation,—to see that no valid tax-lien shall ripen thereon by lapse of time into an absolute estate; but they have no authority to compel men to watch to see that no tax-title shall accrue upon land not subject to taxation. The defendant had no right to suppose his land would be taxed for the year 1858. On the contrary, he had a right to believe it would not be taxed for that year, as it was not subject to taxation." The motion for a rehearing will be overruled, and the judgment of the district court will be reversed, solely upon the ground, however, that the land could not be assessed for taxes in the spring of 1871, as it was not subject to taxation; and therefore that said chapter 39 did not apply, because that act relates to the collection of delinquent taxes on real estate. Here there was no delinquent tax. The district court therefore had no jurisdiction. See, also, People v. Doe, 36 Cal. 220. The syllabus and opinion originally filed in this case are hereby reconsidered. The questions referred to in the syllabus and former opinion are not passed upon, and this opinion will be substituted for the opinion handed down from the commission. As before stated, the judgment of the district court will be reversed, and the motion for a rehearing overruled.

CALAHAN v. WARD.

DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. It is error for a trial court to sustain a demurrer to the evidence of the plaintiff, and render a judgment against him for costs, when there is any proper evidence offered in support of all the material questions involved in the issues of the case.

2. Whether the goods were sold upon the credit of Mounts or Ward in this case was, under all the evidence offered, a question of fact for the jury.

Commissioners' decision. Error from district court, Atchison county; W. D. GILBERT, Judge.

J. T. Allensworth, for plaintiff in error.

STRANG, C. Action on account, commenced before a justice of the peace of Atchison county, where the plaintiff obtained a judgment for $50. Defendant appealed to the district court, where the case came on for trial November 12, 1888, before the court and jury. After the plaintiff had introduced his evidence, and rested, the defendant demurred thereto, and the court sustained the demurrer. A motion for a new trial was filed and overruled, and the plaintiff asks this court to reverse the action of the district court on said demurrer, and send the case back to be tried by a jury. We think the court below should have submitted the case of the plaintiff to the jury. There certainly was some evidence to support his contention. The evidence, as it now stands, makes a prima facie case against the defendant. It shows that one J. F. Mounts desired to purchase of the plaintiff, a merchant in the city of Atchison, some groceries, on credit. That the plaintiff, by his chief clerk, refused to sell Mounts any more goods on credit, he already being indebted to the plaintiff for goods before purchased of him. Mounts then called the defendant, for whom he (Mounts) was at the time working, to the rear of the store-room, and asked him if he would become responsible for some groceries for him. Defendant said he would. Mr. Toohy, plaintiff's clerk, asked Mr. Ward, the defendant, how much in groceries he should let Mounts have, and Ward said, "What he wants." Toohy then asked Ward "if he should let Mounts have $100 worth," and Ward replied that "he did not think Mounts would need so much." Mounts also said "he did not think he would want $100 worth." Toohy then asked Ward "if he should let Mounts have $50 worth," and Ward said, "Yes, but he wanted some time on it, until the money would be coming to Mounts from him." Toohy asked him "how long a time he wanted;" and he said, "90 days." This evidence was corroborated and supplemented by other witnesses. The account for the goods sold pursuant to the arrangement made, as above described, was kept with Mounts; that is, the goods sold him were charged to him, instead of being charged to Ward, and the defendant claims that he is thus let out. The plaintiff offered evidence to explain why the goods were charged to Mounts instead of to Ward. We think the whole matter should have been submitted to the jury, for them to say whether the goods were sold to Mounts on his own credit, or on the credit of Ward. If the goods were sold to Mounts on the credit of Ward, then the undertaking of Ward was an original one, and he would be liable, under the circumstances set forth in the evidence of plaintiff. Burkhalter v. Farmer, 5 Kan. 477. The evidence shows that the plaintiff had before sold some goods to Mounts, for which he had taken Mounts' note for $23.13. After the arrangement was made with Mounts and Ward to sell Mounts goods on Ward's credit, plaintiff surrendered to Mounts his note, and charged the amount thereof up to the new account, so as to secure the payment of said sum through Ward. This plaintiff could not do. Ward in no way became liable for goods sold by the plaintiff to Mounts before the arrangement of February 27, 1888, was made with Ward. This item should be dropped from plaintiff's claim, on a new trial. It is recommended that the judgment of the district court be reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

KEMPER v. CAMPBELL, Mayor, et al.

TEMPORARY INJUNCTION—DISSOLUTION—CHANGES OF STREET GRADE.

1. Where a temporary injunction is granted without notice by a probate judge, in the absence of the district judge, the defendant, at any time before the trial, may apply, upon notice, to the district judge to vacate the same; and where the notice of the motion to dissolve or vacate states that the motion will be heard upon the petition and affidavits, and the court, upon the hearing of the motion, vacates the temporary injunction upon the ground that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the notice is sufficiently specific.

Error from district court, Brown county; R. C. RASSETT, Judge.

On the 7th day of September, 1889, Grace G. Kemper commenced her action against A. X. Campbell, mayor of the city of Horton, and Joseph Madeau, street commissioner of that city. The petition, omitting caption, was as follows: "Comes now the above-named plaintiff, and complains of the said defendants, and for cause of action alleges that the city of Horton is a municipal corporation, duly organized and existing under the laws of the state of Kansas as a city of the second class, in Brown county, Kansas, and has been such corporation for more than two years last past; that said defendant A. X. Campbell is the duly elected, qualified, and acting mayor of said city of Horton, and has been for more than four months last past; that said defendant Joseph Madeau is the duly appointed, qualified, and acting street commissioner of said city of Horton, and has been for more than four months last past. Plaintiff further alleges that she is the owner in fee-simple of the following described real estate, situate in Brown county, state of Kansas, to-wit, lot No. one (1) and two (2) in block number twenty-five (25) in the original town (now city) of Horton; that said lots are situate at the corner of Main and Front streets in said city; that there is situated thereon two two-story brick buildings, which said buildings are of the value of more than thirteen thousand dollars; that the said buildings are situated on the lot line of said described real estate along the said named streets, and that the lower or first-floor rooms of said buildings are used and occupied by the tenants of said plaintiff as store-rooms in which to carry on and transact mercantile business of various kinds; that the grade of said streets along and in front of said lots, as it now exists, and is established by the mayor and city council of the city of Horton, is such as makes the said buildings and rooms easy of ingress and egress, and fit for the purposes for which they were built and are occupied; that said defendant Joseph Madeau, as street commissioner of said the city of Horton, and under the orders and direction of said A. X. Campbell, acting as mayor of said city, threatens and is about to excavate and change the grade of said streets along and in front of said described property by removing the dirt therefrom, without authority of law, and in such a manner as to make said buildings hard of ingress and egress, and almost totally unfit for the purpose for which they were built and are occupied, to the great injury and damage of said plaintiff; that said defendant A. X. Campbell, acting as mayor of said the city of Horton, threatens, and is unlawfully procuring and suffering the said Joseph Madeau and others, to excavate and change the grade of said streets along and in front of said property by removing the dirt therefrom in such a manner as to make said buildings hard of ingress and egress, and almost totally unfit for the purpose for which they were built and are occupied, to the great injury and damage of said plaintiff. Plaintiff further alleges that, unless said defendants are enjoined and restrained as herein prayed for, said plaintiff will be irreparably injured, and that said plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law. Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment that until the final hearing of this cause the said defendants be enjoined and restrained from in any manner excavating or changing the grade of said streets along and in front of said described property, and from procuring or suffering the same to be done, and that upon the final hearing such injunction be made perpetual, and that she recover her costs herein, and for such other and further and different relief as may seem to the court just and right." At the commencement of the action the probate judge of Brown county granted a temporary injunction restraining the defendants from excavating certain streets in the city of Horton. Upon the præcipe of plaintiff, a summons was issued, indorsed: "Injunction granted." This was personally served upon each of the defendants. On the 10th day of September, 1889, defendants served notice that an application would be made to the judge of the district court on the 11th day of September, 1889, at Chambers, for the vacation of the temporary injunction. The application, after being continued, came on for hearing on the 16th day of September, 1889. On said notice, plaintiff objected to the hearing of the application for the dissolution of the injunction. This was overruled. Defendants thereafter offered in evidence the petition in the case, and several affidavits. The district judge, over the objection and exception of plaintiff, dissolved the temporary injunction because the petition did not state a cause of action. Plaintiff excepted, and brings the case here. Ryan & Stuart, for plaintiff in error. Flintoft Smith, for defendants in error.

HORTON, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) A temporary injunction was granted in this case, without notice, by the probate judge, in the absence of the district judge. Upon notice, and after hearing of a motion therefor, the district judge dissolved the temporary injunction. It is contended that the notice of the hearing before the district judge was not specific or sufficient. The notice stated that "the application for dissolution would be made upon the petition and the affidavits on which the injunction was granted, and such other affidavits as the defendants might deem proper to use in support thereof." Upon dissolving the temporary injunction, the district judge ruled that the petition did not state a cause of action. Under these circumstances the notice was sufficiently specific. The notice was served on the 10th day of September, 1889, and stated the motion would be heard on the next day, (September 11th,) but upon the 11th, as the plaintiff objected to taking up the motion at that time, the hearing thereof was continued to September 16th. Ample time was thereby given for the hearing of the motion. It appears from the petition that the city of Horton is a city of the second class, and cities of that class have the power to alter the grade or change the level of the land on which the streets are laid out. The petition treats the acts of the mayor and street commissioner as if they were acting for the city of Horton. It is true that it alleges that they are excavating and changing the grade of the streets "without authority of law," and that the mayor was "unlawfully" procuring and suffering the excavation to be done, but these words add nothing to the petition. Methodist Church v. City of Wyandotte, 81 Kan. 721, 3 Pac. Rep. 527. Upon the authority of that case, the petition does not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action. Again, "an injunction in limine is not a matter of strict right. It may sometimes be properly refused upon the same facts which would entitle the party of right to a perpetual injunction on final hearing." Akin v. Davis, 14 Kan. 143; Olmstead v. Koester, Id. 463. The order of the district court will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

STATE v. ELLIOTT.

SALES OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a prosecution under the prohibitory law of this state for selling intoxicating liquor for an unlawful purpose, the state elects to rely on a sale made on the 6th of April, evidence of other sales on other days may be given to the jury for the purpose of showing that the liquor was not needed for medical purposes, but was wanted for use as a beverage, and that the defendant knew, or had good reason to know, that the applicant wanted the liquor for use as a beverage; and in such a case the applications on which the sales were made may be used in evidence for such purposes.

(Syllabus by Strong, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Republic county; F. W. STURGIS, Judge.

A. D. Wilson and Noble & Surface, for appellant. L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., and J. F. Close, for the State.

STRANG, C. This was an action brought by the state of Kansas against Charles N. Elliott, charging the said Elliott with the violation of the liquor law of Kansas. The information contained 10 counts. The defendant was acquitted upon all of them but the last one. Upon this count he was convicted. A motion for a new trial was overruled, also a motion in arrest of judgment; and the defendant was sentenced to pay a fine of $100, and costs accruing on the tenth count, and to undergo imprisonment in the county jail for the period of 30 days. From this sentence the defendant appeals to this court. The tenth count of the information reads as follows: "And I, the county attorney, come now here and give the court to understand and be informed that on the 15th day of August, 1889, the said Charles N. Elliott, in Republic county, Kansas, did then and there willfully and unlawfully sell and barter malt, vinous, fermented, spirituous, and other intoxicating liquors for other than medical, mechanical, and scientific purposes." The charge against the defendant in this count is the sale of intoxicating liquor for unlawful purposes. The defendant could not, under this count, be tried for selling in an unlawful manner for a lawful purpose. Nor do we gather from the record that there was any attempt in the court below to try the defendant for so selling. We do not understand that the defendant was tried for selling without the statement required by law having been first made, nor for selling upon a statement mistakenly filled out. If the liquor sold to Emil Rudeman on April 6th was for medicine, then the fact that there was a technical error in the filling of the blank application for the liquor would not render the defendant guilty of a violation of the law, and subject to punishment. The state does not seek to convict her citizens of crime upon mere technicalities growing out of immaterial errors. In this case the attorney general disclaims any desire to hold the defendant guilty because of the error in the manner of filling up the blank application for the liquors. The contention of the state is that the defendant was tried for selling liquor for an unlawful purpose,—a purpose for which, under the constitution and laws of Kansas, it cannot be lawfully sold, no matter what the manner of the sale may be. The purpose for which it was sold was clearly set out in the tenth count of the information, and upon the trial the defendant was convicted. There was some evidence to support the verdict of the jury, and therefore this court could not disturb the judgment of the court below. The sale complained of was admitted, and also proved by the application for the liquor sold. The only question is, was it sold for a lawful purpose? If it was, then the judgment of the court below should be reversed; if it was sold for an unlawful purpose, then the judgment should stand.

The appellant complains of the character of the evidence to show that the sale was unlawful. He says the evidence consisted in statements that the law compelled the defendant to take in his business, and that they could not be used against him, because he could not, under the law, be required to criminate himself. There is no force in this position of the appellant. The statements taken by a druggist who has a permit to sell intoxicating liquors for lawful purposes are not his statements, but are the statements of the applicant for the liquor. There is nothing in the law that requires a druggist to sell even upon such statements. He may refuse to sell notwithstanding the statement. And besides, the purpose to be subserved by the requirement in the law which necessitates the taking and filing with the probate judge of such statements is that the public may ascertain whether the druggist, who has been given the right to sell for legitimate purposes, is complying with the law or otherwise.

Appellant also complains that statements relating to other sales were introduced in evidence after they had been withdrawn by reason of the state electing to rely on the sale made on the 6th of April. The state denies that such statements were reintroduced, but says the defendant was simply cross-examined with reference to them. We think, however, that the state had a right to such statements in evidence, not for the purpose of convicting the defendant of other sales, nor for the purpose of proving the sale relied on, but for the purpose of showing—First, that the defendant had made other sales to Rudeman of liquor so recently before the sale complained of that Rudeman could not have wanted the liquor, the sale of which was relied on to convict him, for medical purposes; and, second, to show that defendant knew the appellant did not want the liquor, the sale of which was complained of, for medical purposes, and to show the defendant's want of good faith in making the sale. The application for liquor made by the purchaser, no matter how regular it is, does not constitute an absolute shield to the druggist selling thereon. If, from any source, he knows the liquor is sought to be used as a beverage, and with such knowledge he sells it, he is guilty of a violation of the law, notwithstanding the statement. In this case the evidence shows that the defendant sold Rudeman one-half pint of alcohol on April 1st, one-half pint April 2d, a half pint April 3d, a half pint April 5th, one pint April 6th, a pint April 9th, and a half pint April 10th, and so on. The question on this evidence was, did Rudeman need the liquor sold him on the 6th for medical purposes, or did he want it for use as a beverage? and, second, if he wanted it for use as a beverage, did the defendant know that the appellant wanted the liquor to be used as a beverage? The applicant had purchased from the defendant a pint of alcohol, equivalent to at least half a gallon of whiskey, the very day before the sale on the 6th. He also purchased on the 1st, 3d, and 5th of the month a half pint each time. We think the jury had a right to this evidence for the purposes mentioned, and that having heard it, together with the other evidence, had a right to say Rudeman did not need the alcohol purchased on the 6th for medical purposes, but wanted it for a beverage; and had a right also to say that the defendant knew it was wanted as a beverage when he sold it, and that he was therefore guilty of a violation of the law. A druggist who does not know that a man does not need a pint or half pint of alcohol every day for a mere tonic or "stimulant" should be disqualified to handle poisons of any kind.

The appellant complains of the eleventh instruction given by the court to the jury, and says that the court should have limited the sale to the 6th of April, instead of the statutory limit. Where, in a prosecution for an alleged violation of the prohibitory law, the state relies on a single sale of intoxicating liquor, it may prove the sale on any day within the statutory limitation.

We have examined the third, fifth, and sixth instructions asked by the appellant, and refused by the court, which refusal is complained of, and do not think any error was committed in refusing to submit them to the jury. We recommend that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF NEWTON et al. v. WM. B. GRIMES DRY-GOODS CO.

VACATION OF JUDGMENT—VALIDATING VOID JUDGMENT.

1. A judgment irregularly obtained within the meaning of the third subdivision of section 568 of the Civil Code, or a void judgment within the meaning of the last clause of section 575 of the Civil Code, may be corrected or vacated upon a motion of a party affected thereby upon reasonable notice given to the adverse party or to his attorney of record in the action, (Civil Code, §§ 535, 569;) and it is not necessary that the motion should be filed at the same term at which the irregular or void judgment is rendered, but it may be filed at any time afterwards within three years after such judgment was rendered, and even at a later period of time if the judgment should be considered as absolutely void.

2. A judgment rendered against a person without any service of summons upon him and without any appearance by him, and only upon an appearance made by an unauthorized attorney, which appearance has never been ratified or confirmed, is absolutely void as to the person for whom the appearance was made.

3. An appearance in an action by a person upon a motion to have a judgment, which is void as to him but valid as to others, so corrected that it will not affect or seemingly affect any of his rights or interests, will not render the void judgment valid as to him.

Error from district court, Harvey county; L. HOUK, Judge.

Brown & Kline, for plaintiffs in error. William G. Clark and E. C. Ellis, for defendant in error.

VALENTINE, J. The present proceeding in error was instituted in this court by the First National Bank of Newton and others against the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company, a corporation, to reverse an order of the district court of Harvey county made upon a motion filed in such court by the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company, under the third subdivision of section 568, and the last clause of section 575, of the Civil Code, for the purpose of having a judgment formerly rendered by such court vacated or modified so far as the same might seem to affect or interfere with any of the rights or interests of the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company. In the original action in which such judgment was rendered, Tootle, Hosea & Co. were the plaintiffs, and the First National Bank of Newton and a great many others were the defendants. The petition of the plaintiffs in that action named the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company as a defendant, but no service of summons was ever made upon the company, nor did it in fact at any time appear in the action, except at a time long after the time when such judgment was rendered, to file and prosecute the aforesaid motion. Some of the attorneys of the other parties, however, who were friendly to the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company, upon their own volition, and without any authority from the dry-goods company, made an appearance for the company and filed an answer for it, and also on the trial attempted to introduce evidence to prove its case; but counsel representing the First National Bank of Newton and others objected to the introduction of any such evidence, for the reason, among others, that another suit was pending in the same court in which such matters should be litigated; and the court, for that reason, sustained the objection, and the aforesaid attorneys appearing for the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company were not permitted to litigate or protect its alleged rights or interests at that time, nor in that action. Afterwards the court rendered a judgment in the action, but it did not at that time have, and never had, any intention to render any judgment that would in any manner or degree affect any of the rights or interests of the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company, but always intended otherwise; but, after the decision of the court, counsel for the First National Bank of Newton and others drew up the form of the judgment which they desired to have entered, and the court, believing that it did not in any manner affect or interfere with any of the rights or interests of the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company, permitted it to be entered. This form of judgment, however, if permitted to remain, would, it is now believed, contrary to the intention of the court, seriously and materially affect the rights and interests of the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company. But the judgment, as entered, is not only irregular for the reason that it did not and does not express the real intention of the court, but it is also absolutely void as against the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company for the reason that such company was never a real party to the action. The attorneys who appeared for the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company in that action had no authority from the company to make any such appearance, or to file any answer, or to do anything else for the company in that action; and the company never ratified or confirmed any of the acts of such attorneys. The judgment was rendered on February 6, 1890. On February 17, 1890, the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company instituted proceedings in the said district court to vacate or modify the judgment so that it would not in any manner affect, or seem to affect, any of the rights or interests of the company. Such proceedings were instituted upon the aforesaid motion filed by the company in the district court, with proper notice thereof given to the adverse parties or to their attorneys. The motion was founded upon the third subdivision of section 568 of the Civil Code, which provides, among other things, for vacating or modifying judgments or orders "for mistake, neglect, or omission of the clerk, or irregularity in obtaining a judgment or order;" and also upon the last clause of section 575 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows: "A void judgment may be vacated at any time, on motion of a party, or any person affected thereby." And the motion was also filed, and notice given, upon the authority of section 569 of the Civil Code, which reads, so far as it is necessary to quote it, as follows: "The proceedings to correct mistakes or omissions of the clerk, or irregularity in obtaining a judgment or order, shall be by motion, upon reasonable notice to the adverse party or his attorney in the action." See, also, generally, as to the notice required to be given of the hearing of motions, section 585 of the Civil Code. At the hearing of the motion a great many objections were urged by counsel for the First National Bank of Newton and others, but it will be necessary to mention only a very few of them.

The court below in effect found that sufficient notice had been given to every "adverse party or his attorney in the action," that is, to every party or his attorney who really had any interest in the case adverse to the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company; and in our opinion the finding of the court below was correct. It is not necessary that a proceeding to vacate or modify a judgment in a case like the present should be by petition, but it may be upon motion; and it is not necessary that the motion should be filed at the same term at which the judgment was rendered, but it may be filed afterwards, and at any time within three years after the judgment was rendered, (Civil Code, § 575,) and even at a later period of time if the judgment should be considered as absolutely void. Foreman v. Carter, 9 Kan. 674; Hanson v. Wolcott, 19 Kan. 207; Toble v. Commissioners, 20 Kan. 14. And a service of the notice upon the adverse party's attorney is certainly sufficient, for the statute itself so provides. Civil Code, §§ 535, 569. And, where the attorney has been the attorney of record in the action of the adverse party, it can certainly make no difference that the attorney may not, at the time of the service of the notice, be the attorney of the adverse party, unless the party making the motion knew that fact. And possibly even knowledge of that fact would not make any difference, unless the adverse party should have designated some other attorney or person equally accessible upon whom the service could be made. All that the statute requires is that the attorney shall be the adverse party's "attorney of record," (Civil Code, § 535,) or "his attorney in the action," (Civil Code, § 569.) We would also think that service upon the adverse party, or his attorney "of record" or "in the action," might be made through the United States mails, though it is probably not necessary to decide this question in this case. Under the facts of this case, about the only party interested in preventing the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company from having the judgment vacated or modified as such company desired, was and is the First National Bank of Newton; and there can be no question but that the bank had ample notice. And it and all, or nearly all, the other parties were present at the hearing of the motion.

The bank, with some of the other parties, urge another objection which we might perhaps mention. It is this: The notice states that the motion will be heard before the district court on February 27, 1890, "or as soon thereafter as the same can be heard by said court." The notice was not served on some of the parties until after February 27, 1890, but it was served long before the hearing of the motion, which was on March 24, 1890, and the First National Bank of Newton was present at the hearing by its attorneys, and so were all, or nearly all, the other parties. The judgment, however, as we think, was absolutely void as against the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company, and therefore it was not necessary that all the adverse parties should have notice or be present, but only those against whom the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company might desire to have the judgment declared void as entered. The findings of the court below show that the judgment as entered was absolutely void as against the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company. The court below made the following finding, among others, to-wit: "That no summons in this action was ever served on the defendant, Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company; that the act of the attorneys, Bowman & Bucher, and of E. C. Ellis, and of J. D. Henry, in appearing on behalf of the defendant, Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company, and filing the various pleadings on its behalf in this action, was wholly unauthorized by said defendant, and that said defendant has never ratified or confirmed said acts other than by this motion." And certainly the defendant did not by this motion ratify or confirm any of the aforesaid acts of the attorneys so as to render the previously void judgment valid. Shaw v. Rowland, 32 Kan. 154, 4 Pac. Rep. 146; Green v. Green, 42 Kan. 654, 657, 22 Pac. Rep. 730. It is true, the motion stated all the facts of the case, giving a complete history of the case up to the filing of the motion, but the object of the motion was simply to have the judgment, as entered, so modified that it would not affect, or seemingly affect, any of the rights or interests of the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company. It was virtually and in effect an application to have the judgment, as entered, declared void as against the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company; and certainly an application to have a void judgment declared void would not render such judgment valid. The court corrected the judgment, or rather the entry thereof, as desired by the Wm. B. Grimes Dry-Goods Company, and so modified it that it does not now affect, or seemingly affect, any of such company's rights or interests; but with this exception, and as to all the other parties and the other matters, the judgment remains precisely the same as the original entry thereof made it appear to be. With this modification it is now precisely as it was originally intended to be, and as it was in fact rendered by the trial court, although it is not the same as it was originally entered upon the records of the court. The judgment of the court below will be affirmed. All the justices concurring.

STATE V. READY.

ROBBERY—INDICTMENT—COMPETENCY OF JUROR—NEW TRIAL.

1. In an information for robbery, that follows the language of the statute, it is not necessary to use the word "rob," or the words "to rob." The statute defining the various degrees of robbery does not contain these words.

2. An information for robbery charged the feloniously taking from the person of affiant "thirty-five dollars, lawful money of the United States, a more particular description of which said money is unknown to this affiant," and the proof showed that three $10 bills and $5 in silver were taken. Held to be no variance.

3. When a juror, examined upon his voir dire, said that he had not served upon a jury in any court of record in this state within 12 months, and it is shown that he had, and the fact of the prior service of the juror was not known to the appellant until after the trial, the fact of the prior service of the juror is not sufficient to grant him a new trial. The case of State v. Jackson, 37 Kan. 581, followed.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

ON REMARKING.

Where an objection to the competency of a juror, namely, that he had served as a juror in the same court in another case within the preceding year, is first raised after verdict, and the party objecting fails to show that the ground of challenge was unknown to him and his counsel when the juror was accepted, or that he would have exercised his right of challenge if he had known that the cause therefor existed, or that he has suffered any prejudice by the retention of the juror, the objection will not be available for the purpose of obtaining a new trial.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Shawnee county; A. H. VANCE, Judge.

James J. Hitt, for appellant. L. B. Kellogg, Atty. Gen., and R. B. Welch, for the State.

SIMPSON, C. An information was filed against one Rough Ready, charging that on the 15th day of February, 1890, and within the jurisdiction of the district court of Shawnee county, he "did then and there unlawfully and feloniously make an assault on one Wm. Glaze, and did then and there unlawfully and feloniously and by violence overcome and put in fear, and from the person of him, the said Wm. Glaze, did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, by violence and against his will, take, steal, and carry away, of the property of the said Wm. Glaze, thirty-five dollars, lawful money of the United States, a more particular description of which said money is unknown to this affiant, and cannot be given, of the value of thirty-five dollars," etc. Trial at the April term. The jury returned a verdict of guilty "as charged in the information." A motion for a new trial was made and overruled, and the defendant brings the case here for review.

1. The first objection made is to the sufficiency of the information, because the description of the property taken is indefinite, and the cases of State v. Tilney, 38 Kan. 714, 17 Pac. Rep. 606, and State v. Segermond, 40 Kan. 107, 19 Pac. Rep. 370, are invoked in aid of the objection. These cases hold that general descriptions of the property taken, such as "national bank notes," "United States treasury notes," "United States silver certificates," "money of the amount and value of one thousand dollars," and "twenty-five dollars in money," without any allegation of the inability of the prosecutor to give a more specific description, is insufficient and fatally defective. It is almost universally held, by courts of last resort everywhere, that, where there is an allegation in the indictment or information that a more particular description could not be given for some sufficient reason, a general one, as contained in this information, is sufficient.

2. It is also insisted that the county attorney could have given a better description of the money taken than was recited in the information, if he had exercised ordinary diligence. This is a question of fact that we are not required to investigate. At the trial the prosecuting witness testified that the money taken from him consisted of three $10 bills and $5 in silver, and it is claimed that there is a variance between pleading and proof, but the fact that there was no particular description of the money is now overlooked by counsel for appellant. The charge was "thirty-five dollars, lawful money of the United States;" the proof was "three ten-dollar bills and five dollars in silver," and one is the equivalent of the other.

8. It is shown by the record that one of the jurors, when examined on his voir dire, said that he had not served upon a jury in any court of record in this state within 12 months last past, when it is shown that he had. The fact of the prior service of the juror was not known to the appellant or his attorney until after the trial. At the trial the appellant exhausted all his peremptory challenges. We think that for the reasons given and authorities cited in the case of State v. Jackson, 27 Kan. 581, the objection to the juror is made too late.

4. Finally, it is said that the information is not good on a motion in arrest of judgment, because the words "to rob" are not used therein. It will be noticed that every essential element constituting the crime of robbery is charged in the information, in the exact language of the statute, and that the statute, in defining the crime of robbery in the various degrees, nowhere uses the words "rob" or "to rob." It is recommended that the judgment of conviction be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

ON REHEARING.

JOHNSTON, J. The appellant asks the court to re-examine all the points of error originally assigned by him, but it is not deemed necessary to re-examine or notice any, except the single one that a juror who returned the verdict had within a year before that time served as a juror in the same court. It is now insisted that the objection, made after verdict, was not too late, and that the case of State v. Jackson, 27 Kan. 581, is not controlling. The record shows that Cope had within a year served as a juror in another case; and it further appears that all of the jurors, including Cope, answered the question, "Have any of you served upon a jury in any court of record in this county within one year last past?" in the negative. Appellant urges that he had a right to rely on the answer given by the juror in his voir dire, and was therefore excused from making further inquiry. It is true that a party may ordinarily rest on the testimony given by a juror on his voir dire in regard to his qualifications. Lane v. Scoville, 16 Kan. 402. But neither the inquiry as to prior services by the juror, nor the answer which he gave, proves that the appellant or his counsel had no knowledge of such prior service. In his motion for a new trial appellant alleges that neither he nor his counsel was aware that Cope had served as a juror within 12 months of the trial, but no testimony was offered to sustain the allegation, and it does not appear to have been one of the conceded facts. "A known cause of challenge is always waived by withholding it, and raising it as an objection after verdict, since such a practice is incompatible with the good faith and fair dealing which should characterize the administration of justice." Thomp. Trials, § 114. The fact that Cope had served as a juror during the preceding year is not a positive disqualification which vitiates the verdict, but is only a ground of challenge, which may be waived. There is nothing to show that Cope solicited the place, nor that he is what is known as a "professional juror." It does not appear but that Cope had no recollection of his former service, and had no intention to prevaricate and mislead. No attempt is made to show any bias or prejudice on his part, or that he is other than an honorable and fair-minded man. Appellant made no showing that he desired to challenge all jurors who had served in that capacity within the preceding year, or that he desired to or would have excluded Cope from the jury upon this or any other ground of challenge. For all that is shown in the record, appellant may have known of this statutory ground of challenge, and yet, with a full understanding of it, desired to retain Cope upon the jury. If this is the fact, will any one contend that the verdict should be set aside and a new trial granted? Although there is much complaint in the brief filed, there is absolutely no showing that the verdict is unjust, nor that the appellant was prejudiced by Cope's wrong answer, or by his presence on the jury. If it had been shown upon the motion for a new trial that appellant and his counsel were ignorant of Cope's former service, and that they desired to exclude from the jury all those who had served as jurors within the preceding year, or that they desired to have Cope excluded from the jury, and would have used this ground of challenge to accomplish their purpose, but that the answer of the juror misled them, and prevented the challenge, it might be that the objection first made to the juror after the verdict would be available. In the absence of any such showing, we cannot say that the appellant has not waived the objection to the juror, nor that it is made in good time. We are still of the opinion that no injustice has been done to the appellant, and that the verdict should be allowed to stand. The motion for a rehearing will therefore be denied. All the justices concurring.

STATE v. LEIGH.

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL FROM JUSTICE.

To effect an appeal in a criminal trial before a justice of the peace, upon a judgment of conviction the appellant must, within 24 hours after the rendition of the judgment, enter into a recognizance to the state, in the sum and with sureties to be fixed and approved by the justice before whom the trial was had. Simply going to the office of the justice of the peace at the dinner hour, with a recognizance, during the statutory time allowed, is not sufficient.

(Syllabus by Green, C.)

Thomas Dever, for appellant. J. N. Ives, Atty. Gen., and W. J. Franklin, for the State.

GREEN, C. The facts material to this case are substantially as follows: On the 6th day of May, 1890, the appellant was tried before a justice of the peace and a jury in Junction City, Geary county, and convicted of violating the prohibitory law. Judgment was rendered against her on the same day, by the justice of the peace, at 2:50 P. M. Upon the following day the attorney for the defendant went to the office of the justice of the peace with a recognizance, a few minutes before 1 o'clock in the afternoon, but found the door locked. The attorney, being engaged in the trial of another case before another justice of the peace in the same city, did not return to the justice's office before whom the defendant was tried until a quarter to 5 o'clock on the same afternoon, when the bond was declined, for the reason that the 24 hours had expired in which a recognizance could be accepted. Subsequently, the bond was presented to the justice, who made the following indorsement thereon: "This bond presented for filing and approved on May 7th, 1890, at 4:45 P. M. of that day, and by me accepted and approved as of that date and hour." The papers were transmitted to the district court, and a motion was made and sustained to dismiss the appeal for the reason that the same had not been taken in time. The appellant brings the case here, and insists that the appeal was taken within the 24 hours after the rendition of the judgment; that the recognizance was at the office of the justice of the peace within the statutory time. The language of the statute is: "No appeal shall be granted or proceedings stayed unless the appellant shall, within 24 hours after the rendition of such judgment, enter into a recognizance to the state of Kansas, in a sum and with sureties to be fixed and approved by the justice before whom said proceedings were had, conditioned for his appearance at the district or criminal court of the county, at the next term thereof, to answer the complaint against him." Section 5454, Gen. St. 1889. There is nothing in the record to show that this recognizance was filed in time. The defendant had the right of appeal; and to complete that right certain conditions were imposed upon her, viz., the giving of a bond, to be approved by the justice before whom she had been convicted, within 24 hours after judgment. This she did not do. It is clearly the duty of a party wishing to effect an appeal in a criminal case to see to it that the recognizance is furnished and delivered to the justice of the peace within the statutory time, and, if not delivered in accordance with the requirements of the statute, no valid appeal is effected. While appeals are favored, and substance rather than form should control, the appellant failed to place herself within the provisions of the law granting the right of appeal. If she had presented her recognizance, with sufficient sureties, at the office of the justice of the peace within the time allowed by law, during business hours, or if the justice had indicated his approval within the 24 hours, it would have been good; but this was not done. The attorney for the defendant went to the justice's office at the dinner hour with the bond, and, not finding the officer, carried it away with him, and made no further effort to furnish a bond until the time had expired. While an appeal cannot be defeated through any omission of the justice of the peace to make the necessary and proper entries upon his docket, yet the statute must be substantially complied with by the appellant to make an appeal effectual. Bubb v. Cain, 37 Kan. 692, 16 Pac. Rep. 89; Struber v. Roblfs, 38 Kan. 202, 12 Pac. Rep. 880. We recommend an affirmance of the judgment of the district court in dismissing the appeal.

DEFORD V. HUTCHINSON.

REPLEVIN—PLEADING—GENERAL DENIAL—EVIDENCE.

In an action of replevin by a mortgagee for the possession of mortgaged property, the defendant in possession thereof may, for the purpose of defeating the plaintiff's right of recovery, prove, under the general denial, a sale of the property by her to the plaintiff subsequent to the execution and delivery of the mortgage and his refusal to take the goods and pay her the contract price. Further held, that, in such an action, where the plaintiff is permitted to retain the goods, the defendant may plead such sale, and, if maintained on the trial, may recover judgment against the plaintiff in the alternative for a return of the property, or the value of her interest therein. Modifying 25 Pac. Rep. 641.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

On rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Upon a re-examination of the former opinion and syllabus handed down, we think it necessary to correct the same so far as to eliminate therefrom all reference to any counter-claim or set-off. In the action the defendant successfully maintained the sale of the goods from her to Deford, with the right upon her part to retain the same until her interest therein was paid. She was therefore entitled to recover a judgment against the plaintiff in the alternative for a return of the property to her, or the value of her interest therein. The original syllabus and opinion will be corrected accordingly.

GAGE V. PHILLIPS. (No. 1,337.)

(Supreme Court of Nevada. March 16, 1891.)

PAROL EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

1. In the absence of fraud or mistake, parol proof of the contents of letters is inadmissible to vary the terms and effect of a mortgage subsequently executed between the parties.

2. One who executes a bill of sale, and does not claim that there were misrepresentations in its procurement, cannot contest it, on the ground that she thought she was signing something else.

3. Under St. Nev. 1881, p. 80, prohibiting a person from testifying when the other party to the transaction is dead, or when the opposite party to the action is the representative of a deceased person, as to facts which transpired before the death of such deceased person, defendant, in a suit by a surviving partner to foreclose a mortgage, cannot testify that the deceased partner accepted property under a verbal agreement in satisfaction of the mortgage.

Appeal from district court, Ormsby county; RICHARD RISING, Judge.

Trenmore Coffin and Wm. Woodburn, for appellant. W. E. F. Deal, for respondent.

MURPHY, J. This action was brought by W. S. Gage, as surviving partner of the firm composed of Clark P. Hubbell, J. C. Hampton, and W. S. Gage, doing business under the firm name of J. C. Hampton & Co., to foreclose a mortgage executed by M. A. Phillips, the defendant, to J. C. Hampton & Co., of Virginia City, Nev., dated on the 16th day of May, 1887. The complaint contains the usual allegations in actions of the kind. In her answer the defendant avers: "That on or about the — day of May, 1888, said defendant was the owner of a certain lot of furniture, carpets, bedding, stoves, and all necessary articles for the complete furnishing of a lodging-house, which was then in a lodging-house situated on B street, in Virginia City, Nev., * * * and which said lot and lodging-house were then owned by said J. C. Hampton, now deceased, or by said firm of J. C. Hampton & Co. That on or about said — day of May, 1888, this defendant and said J. C. Hampton, now deceased, agreed together that said J. C. Hampton should take said furniture, bedding, carpets, stoves, and other articles, then in said lodging-house, in full satisfaction of the note and mortgage mentioned in plaintiff's complaint. That said J. C. Hampton, now deceased, then, either for himself, or for said J. C. Hampton & Co., did take said furniture and property in full satisfaction of said note and mortgage. That said J. C. Hampton died without satisfying said mortgage, or the record thereof. That said furniture and other property was of the reasonable worth and value of three thousand dollars." The plaintiff introduced his note and mortgage in evidence, and rested his case in chief. It appears from the transcript that in the year 1881 the defendant borrowed a large sum of money from J. C. Hampton & Co., giving as security for the payment thereof notes secured by mortgages on property situated in Virginia City and Carson City, Nev. That the furniture now in controversy was in the house in Virginia City, and has never been removed therefrom. That on the 16th day of May, 1887, J. C. Hampton, for the firm of J. C. Hampton & Co., had a settlement of accounts with the defendant, and it appears that on such settlement defendant owed the firm of J. C. Hampton & Co. about $12,000. The defendant gave to J. C. Hampton a deed to the Virginia City property; consideration, $1,000. She also executed and delivered to J. C. Hampton & Co., at the same time and place, and as a part of the same transaction, the note and mortgage sued upon, and a bill of sale of all the furniture in the Virginia City house. The defendant now swears that, at the time she signed the bill of sale, she did not know what she was signing, as she had no glasses with her, and, as she had borrowed $150 from Hampton on the day she signed the papers, she supposed she was signing a note for that amount. The defendant also testified, or attempted to, that she had a conversation and some correspondence with J. C. Hampton, in which he agreed to take the furniture in payment of the $2,000 indebtedness, and enter satisfaction of the mortgage sued upon. The letters claimed to have been received from Hampton could not be found, and the defendant called a Mrs. C. H. Robinson as a witness, and offered to prove by her the contents of the letters written by her for Mrs. Phillips to Hampton, and Hampton's letter in reply, which it appears that Mrs. Robinson had read to the defendant; to all of which counsel for the plaintiff objected, on the ground and for the reason that all the correspondence was had before the note and mortgage were given. The court sustained the objection, and the defendant excepted to the ruling. The testimony was inadmissible for the purpose offered. When parties reduce their contract to writing, all oral negotiations and agreements are merged in the writing, and the instrument must be treated as containing the whole contract, and parol proof is not admissible to alter its terms, or to show that, instead of being absolute, as it purports to be, it was in reality conditional, unless the party attacking the instrument can establish fraud or mistake in its execution. The case of Stewart v. Babbs, 120 Ind. 571, 22 N. E. Rep. 770, is directly in point on this case. In that case the defendants purchased land. They gave notes and mortgages to secure the payment of the purchase money. On the trial of the case the defendants gave testimony changing the terms of the deed and mortgage. On appeal, the supreme court said: "It is well settled, by a long line of decisions of this court, that, when the parties reduce their contract to writing, all oral negotiations and stipulations are merged therein." See, also, Wight v. Railroad Co., 16 B. Mon. 4; Fairbanks v. Metcalf, 8 Mass. 238; Ward v. Lewis, 4 Pick. 520; Worrall v. Munn, 5 N. Y. 238; Clark v. Gifford, 10 Wend. 818; Gilbert v. Insurance Co., 23 Wend. 45; De Witt v. Berry, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 536; Polhill v. Brown, (Ga.) 10 S. E. Rep. 921; Land Co. v. Dromgoole, (Ala.) 7 South. Rep. 444; Bruns v. Schreiber, (Minn.) 45 N. W. Rep. 861; Northwestern Fuel Co. v. Bruns, (N. D.) Id. 699; Hills v. Rix, (Minn.) 46 N. W. Rep. 297.

There is neither fraud nor mistake charged in the answer, and the attorney for the defendant stated in open court "that they did not claim that there was any fraud in the transactions." The mere statement of the defendant "that she did not know what she was signing, when she signed the bill of sale," is no excuse in law. In order to be of any benefit to her, she should have set out in her answer that the paper introduced in evidence was obtained by misrepresentations of its contents, and that the misrepresentations were false, and that she had exercised due diligence to guard against fraud; and, to excuse a want of due care and diligence in a case of this kind, the defendant should show that there was known trust and confidence between the parties to the instrument, and that the relationship of the parties was such as to justify the existence of such trust and confidence.

Defendant attempted to prove that in the spring of 1888, and prior to the death of Hampton, she had a conversation with him, wherein he agreed to take the furniture in full payment of the amount due on the note and mortgage, to-wit, $2,000, and enter satisfaction of the same. To the introduction of this testimony plaintiff objected to the defendant testifying to any conversation had between herself and Hampton in relation to their business transaction, for the reason that the other party to the transaction was dead. The defendant admitted that all her dealings and conversations were with J. C. Hampton. The court sustained the objection, and this defendant claims to be error, and in support thereof rely upon the authority of the cases of Crane v. Gloster, 18 Nev. 279, and Vesey v. Benton, Id. 284. In the statute of 1864, p. 77, we had an act of the legislature defining who should and who should not be witnesses. Under that statute the decision in the case of Roney v. Buckland, 4 Nev. 45, was rendered, in which this court held: "When a surviving partner is sued for a loan for the use of the firm made to the deceased partner, and of the particulars of which the deceased partner only was cognizant, the plaintiff is not a competent witness in his own behalf." In 1869, at the time of the adoption of our civil practice act, (either by mistake or design,) the following paragraph was omitted from the act: "Except where the adverse party is dead, or where the opposite party shall be the administrator or executor." Under the act of 1869, the cases in 18 Nev. were decided, and each of these opinions were written by the judges under protest, and they did not hesitate to express their contempt of an act that required of them to affirm judgments, when such judgments had been obtained on the testimony of parties to a transaction, when the opposite parties, and the only persons who could testify or contradict their statements, were dead. In the case of Crane v. Gloster, Justice BEATTY, at page 281, said: "It appears, then, that the old law recognized two reasons for excluding the testimony of a party interested, while the present law recognizes but one. Of the two principles of exclusion, the sounder and better has been rejected, and the more arbitrary and unreasonable retained. The result is that our law on this subject is about as bad as it could be made. The policy of sealing the lips of the surviving party to any transaction, when the opposite party, whether principal or agent, is dead, is sanctioned and approved by the statutes of several of the states. * * * We, however, have retained this rule in its most arbitrary form, and have abolished altogether the other rule, which invariably operated to the promotion of justice." HAWLEY, C. J., in Vesey v. Benton, said: "It seems proper, however, in view of the results reached in Crane v. Gloster, ante, and in this case, to call the attention of the legislature to the crude and unsatisfactory provisions of the statute referred to. The only object of incorporating any provision of exclusion is to prevent fraud and injustice." Then, after commenting upon the facts in the two cases mentioned and the application of the statute, he says: "Thus, as will readily be seen, giving to the defendant in the former, and the plaintiff in the latter, case an undue and unfair advantage. A statute that leads to such results is repugnant to every sense of justice and of right, and ought to be amended." It was amended by an act of the legislature of 1881, (St. 1881, p. 80,) and reads as follows: "No person shall be allowed to testify * * * when the other party to the transaction is dead, or when the opposite party to the action, or the person for whose immediate benefit the action or proceeding is prosecuted or defended, is the representative of a deceased person, when the facts to be proved transpired before the death of such deceased person." Under the above statute, the defendant was not a competent witness to prove the conversations had between herself and Hampton. She is prohibited from testifying as to any statement made by the deceased to her, or to any business transaction between herself and the deceased. The statute has in view transactions between parties one of whom had since died, and whose representative was engaged in a suit with the survivor. As to such transaction neither party is allowed to testify. The survivor should not, because the mouth of the other party to the transaction is forever closed. Therefore the rule as laid down in the case of Roney v. Buckland, 4 Nev. 55, is a clear exposition of the law as it then existed, and re-enacted in 1881, while the cases in 18 Nevada were a correct interpretation of the law at the time the decisions were rendered. The act of the legislature governing the cases being repealed, they are no longer authorities in actions such as the one under consideration. In support of the views herein expressed, we cite as authorities: Wilcox v. Corwin, 117 N. Y. 502, 23 N. E. Rep. 165; Clift v. Moses, 112 N. Y. 431, 20 N. E. Rep. 392; Tuck v. Nelson, 62 N. H. 471; Parks v. Andrews, 10 N. Y. Supp. 344; Kimble v. Carothers, 81 Pa. St. 506; Koehler v. Adler, 91 N. Y. 657; Shain v. Forbes, 82 Cal. 583, 23 Pac. Rep. 198; Parks v. Caudie, 58 Tex. 221; Dolan v. Dolan, (Ala.) 7 South. Rep. 425; Glover v. Thomas, (Tex.) 12 S. W. Rep. 685; Fulcher v. Mandell, (Ga.) 10 S. E. Rep. 582; Nesbitt v. Parrott, Id. 590; Patterson v. Martin, (W. Va.) Id. 820; Gunther v. Bennett, (Md.) 19 Atl. Rep. 1048; Gavin v. Bischoff, (Iowa,) 45 N. W. Rep. 806. In the case of Simpson v. Simpson, (N. C.) 12 S. E. Rep. 450, plaintiff was permitted to testify that the sum of $50 had been paid on the note and mortgage. The mortgagor and maker of the note was dead. The supreme court held "that the plaintiff was not a competent witness to prove what was or was not paid. The proof necessarily concerned transactions with the deceased about which he could testify, and might testify, differently, if living, and we think he was rendered incompetent as a witness for any such purpose." Counsel for appellant, in their oral argument in this court, claimed that, the action being prosecuted by Gage as surviving partner, the rule did not apply, and the defendant should have been permitted to testify. The act of the legislature under consideration in this case accomplishes the very purpose of its enactment, namely, it prevents living witnesses from establishing contracts, by their own evidence, as to personal transactions and communications with parties whose lips have been sealed by death. The case of Green v. Edick, 56 N. Y. 613, was an action against the defendant, as surviving partner of the firm of Edick & Son. Upon the trial plaintiff, as a witness in his own behalf, was allowed to testify to a conversation between himself and the deceased partner. Held to be error, and judgment reversed. Roney v. Buckland, 4 Nev. 45; Shain v. Forbes, 82 Cal. 583, 23 Pac. Rep. 198; Dolan v. Dolan, (Ala.) 7 South. Rep. 426. There was no error in the ruling of the court in refusing the defendant permission to amend her answer: (1) The amendment was intended to vary the terms of a written contract, which was not permissible, in the face of the admission of the defendant that she did not claim there was any fraud in the transaction; and (2) the court stated that, if the defendant wanted to show that the bill of sale was intended as a mortgage, she could do so. There was no error in the court's refusal to make the finding asked for by the defendant. There is nothing in the case that would justify the making of any such finding. It therefore follows, from the views we have expressed, and from the authorities we have cited, that there was no error committed by the court in its rulings, and the claim of the appellant that there is no evidence to sustain the decree of the court is not well founded. The judgment of the district court and the order refusing a new trial are affirmed.

COUNTY OF EUREKA v. COUNTY OF LANDER.
(No. 1,830.)

COUNTIES—CREATION—BOUNDARIES.

L. county was created, and the fortieth meridian designated as its western boundary, being also designated as the eastern boundary of H. county. The line was established by the surveyors of both counties, as provided by law, for the guidance of their public officers, and was generally recognized. E. county was afterwards created out of L., to be divided by a line beginning on the north line of L. county, equidistant from its north-east and north-west corners. Held, that E. county was created with reference to the north-west corner of L. county, as then established, though it was afterwards found not to be on the fortieth meridian.

Appeal from district court, Ormsby county; RICHARD RISING, Judge.

W. D. Jones, Henry Mayenbaum, and T. Coffin, for appellant. Baker & Wines, for respondent.

BELENAP, C. J. Mr. Wenbaw, the owner of real estate lying near the boundary line of Eureka and Lander counties, and assessed by each county as within its jurisdiction, paid his taxes to Lander county, under the law authorizing a tax-payer to pay either county. Gen. St. § 1205. The county of Eureka, claiming that the assessed property is within its boundaries, brought their action to recover back the amount of money paid. The statute creating the county of Eureka describes the boundary line between Eureka and Lander counties as follows: "Beginning at a point on the north boundary line of Lander county, equidistant between the north-east and north-west corners of said Lander county; thence running due south from said initial point to the south boundary line of said Lander county." Eureka county was required to establish this line at its own expense. St. 1873, p. 107. The line was accordingly established by Mr. Edwards, the county surveyor of Eureka county. His survey placed the disputed territory in Lander county. At the time of the passage of the law creating Eureka county the north line of Lander county and its north-east and north-west corners had been established. As the position of the north-west corner is the principal matter of contention upon this appeal, the manner in which it was established may be stated. The statute creating Lander county designates the fortieth meridian as its western boundary. St. 1862, p. 53. The meridian is also the eastern boundary of Humboldt county. In the year 1870 the position of this boundary line was established by a joint survey of the county surveyors of the respective counties, made at the instance of the county commissioners, in pursuance of a statute requiring the establishment of boundary lines between counties by their surveyors whenever the positions of such lines are disputed by reason of the settlement of persons or ownership of property thereon. St. 1866, p. 130. Subsequently the north-west corner of Lander county was established by the county surveyors of Humboldt and Lander counties. The point was accepted by the county surveyor of Elko county; and the south boundary line of that county, which is the north line of Lander county, commences at this corner. This line and corner were established in order that certainty could be attained in questions touching the territorial extent of the jurisdiction of courts of the right of taxation, and other matters of a public nature; and, having been established for the information and guidance of public officers and private citizens, their position was matter of public knowledge. When the legislature created the county of Eureka from the territory embraced within Lander county, and referred to the line and corners mentioned, it must be presumed to have acted with knowledge of these public facts. There was in fact no other north line or north-west corner of Lander county than these, nor was provision made for the ascertainment of any other. The position of the line and corner was matter of interest to the counties of Elko, Humboldt, and Lander, as well as Eureka, and, if the legislature had intended any other, provision would probably have been made for a joint survey by the counties interested. But at this time no one had questioned the correctness of their position. Another act, framed at the same session, illustrates the understanding of the members of the legislature upon this subject. The act is entitled "An act to define and establish the boundary line between Humboldt and Lander counties," (St. 1873, p. 189,) and describes the portion of the line under consideration as follows: "Beginning at the north-west corner of Lander county, and running due south on the present line between Humboldt and Lander counties to a point due north of Battle Mountain station. * * * The "present line" here mentioned was that made by the joint survey of 1870, because down to the time of the passage of this law no other line had been run, and the "north-west corner" could have been no other than that made by the intersection of the southerly boundary line of Elko county with the Humboldt-Lander line in the year 1871. In the year 1887 it was discovered that the Humboldt-Lander line, as fixed by the joint survey of 1870, was not at the fortieth meridian, but was one and a half miles east of it; and it results that if the north line of Lander county were extended westward so as to intersect the meridian, and the equidistant point mentioned by the statute taken upon such extended line, the disputed territory would fall in Eureka county. But the error in the survey was not known until long after the enactment of the law creating Eureka county, and has no bearing upon the question of the intention of the legislature. The intention must be ascertained from the facts existing at the time of the passage of the law, and not from facts arising afterwards. At the time the law was framed the impression was that the position of the line and corner had been correctly ascertained, and they were, therefore, adopted by the legislature as fixed objects from which the Eureka line could be established. The judgment of the district court in favor of Eureka county is reversed, and the cause remanded.

JUDGMENTS BY DEFAULT—FICTITIOUS SUITS—MOTION BY AMICUS CURIAE—PRACTICE.

1. On default in an action for the conversion of personal property, it is not error for the court, before entering judgment, to require proof of the value of the property.

2. No notice is necessary before motion by an amicus curiae to dismiss an action on the ground that it is fictitious.

3. Defendants purchased property, and organized a company, of which they elected plaintiff secretary. Afterwards, to settle their title to the property, they transferred the title thereto to plaintiff, and had him sue them for its conversion, agreeing to submit to a judgment by default, after which plaintiff was to transfer to them all his legal rights in the property. Defendants retained and paid plaintiff's attorney. It appeared that plaintiff had paid nothing for the property. Plaintiff claimed that the suit was not fictitious, but hostile to defendants. Held, that the suit should be dismissed as fictitious, on motion by defendants' counsel, as amicus curiae, supported by affidavits. BIGLOW, J., dissenting.

4. Such suit may be dismissed after the assignment of a judgment by default, since there are no rights under such a judgment to assign.

5. Communications to plaintiff's attorney in such case are not privileged, since he was acting both for plaintiff and defendants.

6. A party cannot, on appeal, complain that judgment was entered without trial by jury, which was not waived, if the record does not show that a jury was demanded.

7. Any attorney may, as amicus curiae, move the dismissal of a fictitious suit.

Appeal from district court, Eureka county; A. L. FITZGERALD, Judge.

Wren & Cheney, for appellant. Baker & Wines, for respondents.

MURPHY, J. This case came before this court on appeal from an order of the district court, setting aside the default of the defendants. The order was reversed, and the cause remanded. 22 Pac. Rep. 1098, 20 Nev. 410. It is unnecessary to repeat the history of the case here. On the return of the case to the district court, the plaintiff, by his attorney, appeared in court, and asked for judgment on the pleadings for the full amount prayed for in the complaint, no answer having been filed; which motion was by the court denied, on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment without proof of the value of the property alleged to have been converted. In an action arising upon contract, for the recovery of money or damages only, a default and final judgment may be entered by the clerk. In all other cases the plaintiff must apply to the court for the relief prayed for in his complaint, and when he does so the court may require additional proof, and it is not error for the court to refuse to enter judgment on the pleadings alone, and the proof must be made when demanded. Parker v. Wardner, (Idaho,) 13 Pac. Rep. 178.

G. W. Baker, as an officer of the court, and as amicus curiae, submitted a written motion to the court "to dismiss the action as to all the defendants, except the Eureka County Bank, upon the ground and for the reason that the same was and is a sham action, colorably instituted between the plaintiff and the defendants Sadler, Torre, Barbieri, and the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company, without any intention of ever determining any dispute, or litigating any question, or ever having any adversary trial, but simply to obtain the judgment and decision of the court upon a feigned issue, which might affect other parties not impleaded; and that said action between the parties last above mentioned was amicably instituted, without any real dispute between them, and their interest in the question when the said suit was brought was one and the same, and not adverse. That in these proceedings the plaintiff and said defendants mentioned were seeking to secure such a judgment to be entered as might result to the advantage of the defendants, with reference to the title of the property mentioned in the complaint, and adversely to the interest of other parties not before the court, and who had no knowledge of the suit, and no opportunity to be heard, and have any interest they might have in the subject-matter of the suit determined. That the attorney for the plaintiff, who brought the action for the defendants last above mentioned, was employed and paid by them, and such suit was simply a scheme to in some way obtain a judgment of the court upon a feigned issue, which it was conceived might be of advantage to the defendants, and for which purpose the plaintiff permitted his name to be used in instituting the same." In support of this motion, the amicus curiæ offered the affidavits of Sadler and Rives, and it was stipulated between the parties that the testimony taken on the hearing of the motion to open the default should be considered admitted as evidence on the hearing of this motion, in so far as the same was applicable. The plaintiff objected to the consideration of the motion, upon the ground that the same had not been noticed. The court permitted the motion and affidavits to be filed, and informed the plaintiff that he might have all the time he required to prepare counter-affidavits and argue said motion. The plaintiff denied the right of counsel to make the motion, and excepted to the ruling of the court.

The objection of the plaintiff to the filing and hearing of the motion to dismiss, on the ground that the same was not noticed, is without merit: (1) Because upon the reading and filing of the motion the court informed counsel for plaintiff that they should have all the time they desired to file counter-affidavits and argue the motion, which offer they declined to avail themselves of, but stipulated that the affidavits, submitted to the court on the consideration of the motion to open up the default, on the former hearing of this case, should be admitted as the evidence on this motion, in so far as the same was pertinent to the question submitted for decision. And (2) a motion of this character is in the nature of a suggestion to the court that the action then pending is not a real, but a fictitious, one, to obtain a judgment of the court, not upon any issue then involved between the parties to the action, but that might be used by either the plaintiff or the defendants against strangers to the action who might thereafter come in and claim an interest in the property sued for. When actions are brought in a court of law, a duty devolves upon the judge, and that is scrupulously to guard its proceedings from being used by the parties collusively, and not suffer a judgment to be entered without being fully satisfied that a cause of action really exists as provided for by law. Whenever facts are placed before a court, which cause any suspicion that there is any collusion between the parties, no matter in what way or form the facts are brought to the knowledge of the court, it is the duty of the judge at once to institute such an examination as will satisfy him of the truth or falsity of the charge.

There are many circumstances connected with this case which certainly give a strange appearance to the mode in which this action was commenced and has been prosecuted, sufficient, in our opinion, to sustain the order of dismissal. It appears from the uncontradicted testimony that one Townshend had a contract from the government of the United States for the transportation of the United States mail from Eureka, in Eureka county, to Pioche, in Lincoln county, all in this state. He was in possession of horses, wagons, and harness sufficient to stock the route. R. Sadler and John Torre were his bondsmen. Townshend became indebted to the Eureka County Bank in the sum of "four thousand eight hundred dollars, to Torre, Sadler, and Barbieri in the sum of two thousand dollars, and there was still due to the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company the sum of two thousand dollars, balance of purchase money for the stock on the road; making a total indebtedness of eight thousand eight hundred dollars." The Eureka County Bank insisting upon the payment of its claim, Townshend, on the 11th day of March, 1887, sold and delivered to the bank all the property used in transporting said mail, and his interest in the said contract with the government. That the said Sadler, Torre, and Barbieri, in order to protect themselves from loss, upon the failure of the parties to carry said mail in accordance with the contract for which they were bondsmen, with the knowledge and consent of Townshend, purchased the property and contract from the Eureka County Bank, paying therefor the sum of $4,800. They also assumed the indebtedness due from Townshend to the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company. That after the purchase of said property by Sadler, Torre, and Barbieri they organized the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company, and they subscribed for and owned all the stock. That in order to qualify Thomas E. Haley, the parties above named gratuitously transferred to him 25 shares of the capital stock of said company, and made him secretary thereof. The Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company setting up its claim to the property, R. Sadler purchased all the right, title, and interest of the said Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company, for himself, Torre, Barbieri, and the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company, agreeing to give notes signed by himself, Torre, and Barbieri for the sum of $2,000. When the time came for the giving of said notes, Torre was absent from Eureka, and the notes of Sadler, Haley, and Jackson were offered in lieu thereof; but the same were not accepted by the company, and they were returned to the makers thereof, and the notes of Sadler, Torre, and Barbieri were made, and accepted by the company, and, through the advice of Henry Rives, the title of the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company was taken in the name of Haley, for the purpose of commencing a suit and clearing the title to the property, which was to be done for the use and benefit of Sadler, Torre, and Barbieri, and the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company, but that the said Haley never bargained for, purchased, or paid one dollar for said property, and only received the legal title to said property at the request of Sadler, and with the express understanding and agreement that he was in all things to be governed by the advice of the said Henry Rives, and that, if a suit was to be instituted, it was to be conducted in a friendly manner, and under the control of the defendants, and in their interests, and, when the title thereto was settled, to convey all of said property to the said Sadler, Torre, and Barbieri, or to any person whom they might designate. This suit for conversion was commenced by the plaintiff while he was acting as secretary of a corporation, against the corporation and three of the stockholders. The defendants Sadler, Torre, and Barbieri employed and paid the fees of the attorney for the plaintiff and all the costs of court. Haley testified, and denied that there was any agreement between himself, Sadler, Torre, and Barbieri that a judgment should not be taken against the defendants Sadler, Torre, Barbieri, and the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company; or that the suit should be a friendly one, and should inure to the use and benefit of the defendants above named. He admits that Sadler first spoke to him about purchasing the title of the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company; admits the giving of the notes of Sadler, his own and Jackson's, and the return of them to him; admits that he never paid any money whatever for the property, but says he expected to pay his notes. But they were returned to him, and Sadler, Torre, and Barbieri gave notes, and paid them as they became due. They had prior thereto paid the Eureka County Bank the sum of $4,800, and had been in possession of all the property.

The evidence was sufficient to satisfy the court that there was collusion between the plaintiff and the three defendants named, and that the action was not commenced for the purpose of settling any real controversy then existing between the parties. In the case of Brewington v. Lowe, 1 Ind. 23, the supreme court said: "We think these proceedings were instituted under a mistaken apprehension of the proper function of the judiciary. Courts of justice are established to try questions pertaining to the rights of individuals. An action is the form of a suit given by law for the recovery of that which is one's due, or a legal demand of one's rights. * * * Indeed, it is well settled that courts will not take cognizance of fictitious suits, instituted merely to obtain judicial opinions upon points of law." In the case of Loughead v. Bartholomew, reported in Wright, (Ohio,) 91, LANE, J., said: "Courts are instituted to try questions pertaining to the real interests of individuals; to settle substantial controversies; to preserve the peace of society; and where questions submitted to their action are merely questions of speculation, and where their discussion is contra bonos mores, or against public policy, or where the inquiry tends to cast ridicule upon the court, or where the investigation is palpably injurious to the interests or feelings of third persons, without affecting the substantial rights of the litigants, some means will be found to arrest the inquiry." In the case of Lord v. Veazie, 8 How. 255, TANEY, C. J., said: "It is the office of courts of justice to decide the rights of persons and of property, when the persons interested cannot adjust them by agreement between themselves, and to do this upon the full hearing of both parties. And any attempt, by a mere colorable dispute, to obtain the opinion of the court upon a question of law which a party desires to know for his own interest or his own purposes, when there is no real and substantial controversy between those who appear as adverse parties to the suit, is an abuse which courts of justice have always reprehended, and treated as punishable contempt of court. * * * The objection in the case before us is not that the proceedings were amicable, but that there is no real conflict of interest between them; and that the plaintiff and defendant have the same interest, and that interest adverse, and in conflict with the interest of third persons. * * * A judgment entered under such circumstances, and for such purposes, is a mere form. The whole proceeding was in contempt of the court, and highly reprehensible, and the learned district judge, who was then holding the court, undoubtedly suffered the judgment pro forma to be entered under the impression that there was in fact a controversy between the plaintiff and defendant, and that they were proceeding to obtain a decision upon a disputed question of law, in which they had adverse interests. A judgment in form, thus procured, in the eye of the law, is no judgment of the court. It is a nullity, and no writ of error will lie upon it. This writ is therefore dismissed." In Smith v. Railway Co., 29 Ind. 546, a fictitious name was used for plaintiff in the action. The testimony shows that the name of Smith, instead of Reeder, was more by accident than intentional. But the court did not dismiss the appeal on that ground, but that the interests of Reeder and the railroad company were not antagonistic, and the decision was intended to affect third persons. See, also, Hotchkiss v. Jones, 4 Ind. 260. The case of Cleveland v. Chamberlain, 1 Black, 425, was a real action. The plaintiff had judgment. Thereafter defendant purchased the plaintiff's judgment, and perfected an appeal to the supreme court. These facts were called to the attention of the court. Mr. Justice GRIER said: "This appeal must be dismissed. Selah Chamberlain is, in fact, both appellant and appellee. By the intervention of a friend, he has purchased the debt demanded by Cleveland in his bill, and now carries on a pretended controversy by counsel, chosen and paid by himself, and on a record selected by them, for the evident purpose of obtaining a decision injurious to the rights and interest of third parties." In the case of Berks Co. v. Jones, 21 Pa. St. 416, BLACK, C. J., speaking for the court, said: "Without a doubt, the object of the proceeding was not to settle a real dispute, but merely to ascertain the law; in other words, to make the court act as counsel for the commissioners. But they have no right to get advice in this way. Courts ought to encourage amicable submissions of real disputes, but people have no right to propound abstract questions to them. For this there is not only the clearest reason, but the highest authority. * * * The judge of the common pleas, overindulgent to the parties, decided the law for them, when he might have stricken the case from the record. With an easy good nature, equally inexcusable, we have done the same thing. We have considered the subject with as much care as if it had been regularly before us, and we unanimously agree in pronouncing the opinion of the court below to be a perfectly sound exposition of the law. But, because there was nothing on which a judgment could be entered, the writ of error must be quashed." Pittsburgh v. Allegheny, 1 Pitts. R. 99. In the case of Meeker v. Straat, 38 Mo. App. 248, the supreme court said: "This decree cannot stand. Suits contemplate adversary parties, although amicable suits may be brought to determine the respective rights of the parties thereto. When a suit is brought with a view of affecting the rights of third parties, and it is apparent that that is its sole object, the suit ceases to be adversary, and becomes collusive. No court should lend its aid to such a proceeding, least of all a court of equity. * * * All these considerations lead to the inevitable conclusion that the decree in the present case was unwarranted by the law and the evidence, and that the trial court, instead of rendering a decree for plaintiff, should have dismissed her bill. Judgment reversed, and bill dismissed."

Courts of justice are established for the purpose of deciding really existing questions of right between parties who in good faith submit a case to the court for a decision, and the court should not try an action upon a feigned issue, or an abstract question of law, or judicial practice, not arising out of circumstances really existing, in which the parties have a legal interest. An action is a legal prosecution by a party complainant against a party defendant, to obtain the judgment of the court in relation to some rights claimed to be secured, or some remedy claimed to be given by law to the party complaining. It is given by law, for the recovery of that which is one's due, or a legal demand of one's rights. From the evidence in this case we are satisfied that, at the time of commencing this action, the plaintiff had no legal demand against the defendants, and they did not infringe upon any of the plaintiff's rights in relation to the property in controversy; that the action was commenced by the plaintiff as the agent and trustee of the defendants, and his denial "that there was no agreement between himself and Sadler that no judgment should be taken against Sadler, Torre, Barbieri, or the Nevada Stage & Transportation Company," need occupy but little attention, as all the circumstances connected with the purchase and possession of the property, as well as the affidavits of Rives, Sadler, and Torre, in support of the motion to dismiss, clearly show that plaintiff had agreed to and was holding the bill of sale of the property in trust for the defendants named, and for their use and benefit, and for the purpose of protecting their title to the property, and, as they supposed, to prevent Townshend from asserting any claim to the property, under an agreement entered into by Townshend on the one part, and Sadler, Torre, and Barbieri on the second part, wherein they covenanted and agreed "that immediately upon the receipt by us of all moneys which we have agreed to pay said Eureka County Bank, and all money now due us from W. J. Townshend, together with all which we may hereafter have to pay out in order to conduct said stage line, and upon our being secured from loss by reason of our being sureties upon the mail contract bonds of said W. J. Townshend, we will transfer and set over unto said Townshend, or his order, all of said property connected with said lines which we may acquire in connection with the conduct of said lines, and which we may charge as having been necessarily purchased in the conducting of said lines and business. It is also understood and agreed that, in case we have to pay interest, and any money, to the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company, in order to carry on said stage lines, or to retain possession of the property hereinbefore mentioned as having been transferred to us, this agreement to reconvey shall not become operative until such interest and payment to said Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company shall be repaid to us;" and, as was said in the case of Lord v. Veasie, supra, any judgment, entered under the above state of facts, would be a nullity; and a right of action must be complete before the suit is brought, and no subsequent occurrence of a material fact will avail the plaintiff in maintaining the suit. Moore v. Maple, 25 Ill. 343. Therefore the assignment of the judgment by Haley to Ahern did not change the condition of things as to the fictitiousness of the action when commenced. There could be no rights, under such a judgment, to assign.

The plaintiff also objected to the reading of the affidavit of Rives, for the reason that the same was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and discloses information which was obtained when he was acting as attorney for the plaintiff, and discloses privileged communications between attorney and client, and that it attempts to prove facts contrary to the admitted allegations of the complaint. It did not disclose privileged communications. Some of the statements made by him were in the nature of communications received while acting as the agent and attorney for the defendants in the purchase of the property from the Eureka County Bank, Townshend, and the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company, and conversations had by Haley and Sadler, in the presence and hearing of Rives; and such statements are not privileged, when the action is between the parties to the conversation. Michael v. Foil, (N. C.) 6 S. E. Rep. 264. Where an attorney was acting for both plaintiff and defendant in drawing a contract for them to sign, communications of the parties to such attorney are not confidential. Appeal of Goodwin Gas-Stove & M. Co., (Pa.) 12 Atl. Rep. 736; Griffin v. Griffin, (Ill.) 17 N. E. Rep. 782; Hurlburt v. Hurlburt, 2 N. Y. Supp. 317. In the case of Bauer's Estate, reported in 21 Pac. Rep. 762, the supreme court of California said: "When two persons address a lawyer as their common agent, their communications to the lawyer, as far as concerns strangers, will be privileged, but as to themselves they stand on the same footing as to the lawyer, and either can compel him to testify against the other as to their negotiations. The appellant claims that the court erred in granting said motion to dismiss, and in entering said judgment, for the reason that no jury was ever waived in this action." An answer to that objection is that a jury was not demanded, and by the silence of the plaintiff he waived his right thereto if any he had. In the case of Sheets v. Bray, 24 N. E. Rep. 358, the supreme court of Indiana said: "We have been unable to find any bill of exceptions in the record showing a request on the part of appellants for a jury trial, and a refusal and exception thereto, nor is any such bill referred to by counsel in their brief. In the absence of such request, the right to a trial by jury, if such right existed in this case, must be regarded as waived." Grant v. Hughes, (N. C.) 2 S. E. Rep. 345.

The objection of the plaintiff to G. W. Baker, as amicus curiæ, making the motion to dismiss the action, is without merit. In the earlier English cases we find that any stranger, as amicus curiæ, may move the court of matters apparent in the writ, and the court ex officio is bound to abate the writ, if it be vicious, for false Latin or default of form, or that the one plea goes to the whole, and the court will discharge all others; or may move to quash an indictment apparently vicious, be the crime what it will; and a party was permitted to state in court that he was present at the making of the statute, and what was the intention of parliament in enacting the law; and, if an action be abated, any one may move to have the verdict set aside, even the defendant himself. 2 Vin. Abr. 175. If a judge be doubtful or mistaken in a matter of law, a stander-by may inform the court, as amicus curiæ. In some cases, a thing is to be made apparent by suggestion; on the roll, by motion; sometimes by pleadings; and sometimes as amicus curiæ. Tayl. L. Gl. 43, and 29 Ind., supra. In the case of Ex parte Randolph, 2 Brock. 454, Mr. Nichols appeared as amicus curiæ at the request of the court, and argued the question therein pending. And in Ex parte Yeager, 11 Grat. 656, where the petitioner had made application for a license to keep a public house, Fry, who was counsel in a similar action, was permitted to appear as amicus curiæ, and argue against granting the same. In the case of People v. Gibbs, (Mich.) reported in 38 N. W. Rep. 258, Thompson asked permission of the court to assist in the prosecution of the case, he having theretofore had something to do with the prosecution, but his request was denied. Thompson then suggested to the court that the defendant be required to plead to the information. Counsel for the defendant objected to Thompson addressing the court, the objection was overruled, and the defendant required to plead. On appeal, the supreme court said: "The suggestion of Thompson was one which might very properly have been made, as amicus curiæ, by any member of the bar." The court may, and often does, of its own motion, ask of counsel information upon a point in doubt, or in relation to the merits of the case on trial. State v. McCullough, 18 Pac. Rep. 756, 20 Nev. 154. It is not only the right, but the duty, of an attorney of the court, if he knows or has reason to believe that the time of the court is being taken up by the trial of a feigned issue, to so inform the judge thereof; and it is discretionary with the court to stay proceedings, make due inquiry, and, if the facts warrant the suggestion, then dismiss the case. The judgment of dismissal is affirmed.

BIGELOW, J., (dissenting.) In the verified complaint filed in this action, the plaintiff alleges that he is the owner and entitled to the possession of certain personal property of the value of $6,200, which the defendants have unlawfully taken from him, and converted to their own use. The defendants demurred; their demurrer was overruled; and, all but the bank failing to answer, their default was entered. Subsequently, upon their motion, the default was set aside by the district court, but, upon appeal to this court, (22 Pac. Rep. 1098,) the order was reversed. Upon the return of the case to the district court, for further proceedings upon the default, on motion of the defendants' attorney, G. W. Baker, acting as amicus curiæ, the action was dismissed, upon the ground that it was collusive and fictitious. It is agreed that the property originally belonged to the Utah, Nevada & California Stage Company. One Townshend was in possession of it, under a contract of purchase, the company retaining title until it was paid for. The defendants were sureties upon a certain bond for Townshend, and he was also indebted to them. Becoming involved, he transferred the property to the Eureka Bank, to which he was also indebted. The defendants paid the bank the amount due it, and took possession of the property, under an agreement with Townshend that when they were indemnified upon the bond, and repaid the money advanced upon the property, and the amount then owing them, it was to revert to him. The defendants' evidence, upon the motion, tends further to prove that the stage company, demanding payment of the balance due it, was also paid by the defendants, but the legal title to the property was taken in the name of the plaintiff, under an agreement that he was to hold it in trust for them; that it was further agreed that the plaintiff should bring this action, obtain judgment against the defendants, and sell the property out in their interest. This, of course, vested the legal title in him, but as a trustee for the defendants, other than the bank. On the other hand, the plaintiff denies this, and upon the hearing of the motion testified that he bought the property for his own purposes, paid for it with his notes, and that there was no agreement or understanding that he should hold it in trust or in any manner for the defendants. Under these circumstances, I shall not investigate the evidence, to determine whether the plaintiff's or the defendants' contention is the better supported by it. In my judgment, the principles asserted in Lord v. Veasie, 8 How. 261, and similar cases, concerning fictitious actions, have no application here. Taking the broadest and most charitable view of the defendants' case as presented upon the motion, it appeared that the plaintiff alleged by his verified complaint that he was the owner and entitled to the possession of the property. The defendants admit that he holds the legal title, but claim that it is only in trust for them, and consequently he is not, as against them, entitled to its possession, nor to recover its value. The burden of showing this is, of course, upon them. This is the ordinary situation in a contested lawsuit: The plaintiff asserts a right, which the defendant denies. Under such circumstances, it has heretofore been supposed that the parties are entitled to a regular trial, either with or without a jury, as they may elect, to determine whether this right exists or not. This is perhaps the first time where, in advance of the trial, against the protests of one of the parties, the case has been taken up, the evidence heard, and the merits of the action decided upon a simple motion,—decided, too, against a plaintiff whose evidence made at least a prima facie case, such a case as would have prevented a nonsuit upon a trial. Unquestionably, before it could be determined that the action was collusive, it was necessary to decide the very point in dispute between the parties; that is, that the plaintiff was holding the title to the property, in trust for the defendants. If he was not, if, as he alleged and testified, it was absolutely his, and they were wrongfully detaining it from him, then there was no collusion in commencing the action, nor in maintaining it. In determining this point against him, the court decided in the defendants' favor the only defense they could possibly have made, had they been allowed to answer. Usually, after a claim legal upon its face is sufficiently stated in a complaint, and the defendant has lost the right to make any defense, judgment goes against him as a matter of course. But here, after this right had been lost, the defendants were allowed, upon a mere motion, to make their whole defense, and in a much more expeditious manner than they could had they been permitted to answer. I say the defendants were allowed, because the proposition that Mr. Baker, who had been their attorney through all these years of litigation, made this motion, not in their interest, but as an amicus curiæ,—a friend of the court,—is too transparent for sober consideration.

2. If the transaction was just what the defendants claim it to have been, if the plaintiff took the title to the property in trust for the defendants, and commenced the action in their interest, it also appears clearly enough that this was done for the purpose of obtaining some unfair advantage of Townshend or his creditors. It is hard to determine just what their ideas were, probably owing to the fact that they themselves did not have a clear perception of them, but it is safe to say that men do not resort to such crooked methods for honest purposes. The bill of sale, vesting the legal title to the property in the plaintiff, was, in my judgment, under the circumstances, equivalent to the deed in Peterson v. Brown, 17 Nev. 175, and brings the case directly within the principles there laid down. In the attempt to overreach some one else, through the treachery of their confederate, they have been caught in their own trap, and neither law nor justice calls upon the courts to interfere in their behalf. Why this should be the rule has been so clearly and fully stated in the last-mentioned case that I refrain from saying more concerning it. A fictitious case is one where, without there being any real litigation between the parties, a pretended case is presented, in which it is sought to obtain an authoritative decision of some point of law that will, as a precedent, determine the rights of others, who may have a real controversy with the parties to this collusive proceeding. This constitutes a fraud upon the third person, as well as the court, because it is highly probable that only one side will be properly presented or argued, and that consequently a biased decision will be rendered, that will affect their rights without their being heard. This is not that kind of a case. There is no question of law to be decided here, nor, whatever may have been the purpose in the beginning, will the result affect any third person. This is a case of attempted fraud, where the parties to the attempt, after going a certain length, and after, perhaps, reaping all the benefits they expected from their acts, have fallen out, the same as they did in Peterson v. Brown, and now the defendants are trying to relieve themselves from a position which they have voluntarily assumed, by showing that the bill of sale was not made, and the action based thereon was not brought, bona fide, but for the purpose of deceiving and overreaching others. To permit them to do this is to allow them to plead their own fraud in avoidance of the consequences of their acts. Of course, the plaintiff did not demand a jury trial upon the hearing of the motion. He would not have been entitled to it, if he had; for juries are not called to decide motions. Upon this point the error of the court consists in hearing and deciding, upon a mere motion, the entire merits of the action, without a trial of any kind, either with or without a jury. I think the judgment should be reversed.

MASTER AND SERVANT—CARE REQUIRED OF RAILROAD COMPANY—NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW-SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

1. Any duty which the master is required to perform for the safety and protection of his servants cannot be delegated to any servant of any grade, so as to exempt the master from liability to a servant who has been injured by its non-performance.

2. It is the duty of a railroad company to keep its road-bed and track, rolling stock, machinery, and appliances in good and safe condition, to cause frequent and thorough inspection of these as can be done consistently with the conduct of its business, for the purpose of discovering any defects that may occur from accidental causes, or the effects of wear and tear or the progress of decay, to exercise care in the selection of its servants and in their retention in its service, and to adopt such rules and regulations as are calculated to guard against accidents, and to make the servants in its employ reasonably safe.

3. It is the duty of a switchman to operate the switch, and see that it properly adjusts the rails, so that the trains may pass with safety. The act he performs involves no duty of construction or repair, or other duty in regard to the switches of the road, if out of repair, or unfit for use, whether by wear or tear, or by the criminal interference of strangers, than to promptly notify the company of its condition, so that it may be repaired, or its place supplied.

4. It is the law, in the absence of express contract, that establishes the relation of the parties, creating him agent or representative of the master who performs duties which the law itself makes it incumbent on the master to perform, and not the rules or regulations of the company designed for the guidance of its servants, and to secure reasonable safety in the conduct of its business.

5. The co-operation of the switchman is necessary to the successful management of the trains, and employs upon the train in the common service assume the risk of the negligent discharge of his duty.

6. Where the trial court refused to admit as evidence the indictment and judgment of the conviction of one W. A. Hill for the killing of the plaintiff's intestate by disarranging a switch on the defendant's railroad, and certain confessions he had made to one Dr. Davis, upon the ground that such conduct was res inter alios acta.

Appeal from circuit court, Marion county; R. P. BOISE, Judge.

Bronaugh, Northrup & McArthur, for appellants. R. & E. B. Williams and Chas. H. Carey, for respondents.

LORD, J. This is an action to recover damages, brought by the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of her husband, J. W. Miller, deceased, under section 371, Hill's Code, for the death of the intestate, who was killed on the night of the 28th of July, 1889, by the derailing of an engine, of which he was engineer, in the employ of the defendant. His death is alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant and its agents in suffering a certain switch at Lebanon Junction, on the line of the road, to be out of order, so that in operating it the rails did not form a continuous line, whereby the engine was thrown from the track, and he was so badly injured that he died the next day. After denying these facts, the defendant alleges as a separate defense

(1) that the derailing of the engine was caused by one W. A. Hill, who, immediately before the engine was thrown from the track, criminally, and without the knowledge of the defendant, broke and disarranged said switch, whereby the rail was thrown out of line, so that the engine in passing at that place was derailed, and the intestate mortally injured; (2) that if any agent or servant of the defendant was guilty of negligence which caused the injury of the plaintiff's intestate, he was a fellow-servant of such intestate of Miller; and (3) that the injury was caused by the criminal act of one W. A. Hill, a stranger to defendant, combined with the negligence of said Miller and his fellow-servants. Issue being joined on this, a trial was had, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, and from which this appeal is brought. At the close of the evidence for the plaintiff, the defendant interposed a motion for a judgment of nonsuit, which, the trial court refusing, is assigned as error.

The evidence tended to show that the overland train, on which the plaintiff's intestate was acting as engineer of the locomotive drawing such train, was derailed at a switch about one and a half miles south of Albany, a little after 9 o'clock on the evening of Sunday, July 28, 1889; that the locomotive was overturned, and Miller was caught in or under it, whereby he was so badly bruised and scalded by the escaping steam that he died the next day. That the train reached Albany about 8:40 o'clock P. M., and stopped there 20 minutes for supper; that shortly after its arrival the Lebanon locomotive, in charge of Conductor Huston, left Albany on the main track to the Lebanon switch. On reaching the switch, Huston's locomotive was halted until a brakeman aboard of it could throw the switch, and let his locomotive pass from the main track to the Lebanon branch track; that it was after dark, necessitating the use of a lantern, and that when he attempted to move the switch, so as to throw the rails in position for the passage of the locomotive, something interfered with the shoving over of the switch-rails, whereupon, taking his lantern to discover the cause of it, he found clamped between the rails a stone, and that to remove it he had to return to the switch-lever, and throw it back into the same position it had occupied before he touched it, but that, in doing so, he observed the rails came properly back into place for the main line; that he went and threw the stone from the track, and then returned the switch-lever, without further difficulty, into position for the passage of the locomotive from the main track to the Lebanon branch track; that the locomotive passed through, and he then threw the switch back into proper position, for the passage of trains on the main track, but that he did not observe at the time, whether or not the rails obeyed the switch, and came back into line with the rails of the main track, but supposed that they did. Huston however, who was on the locomotive at the time, and about 20 feet distant from the switch, testified that he did not notice and observe that the rails at that time came into line with the rails of the main track; that he was able to observe the movements of the rails by the brakeman's lantern, which shone on the bright surface of the rails; that the switch was then locked by the brakeman, who remounted the locomotive, and it moved on towards Lebanon. In a few minutes after this, Miller came on the main track with his engine and train from Albany, and when within about 50 feet of the switch observed that the switch-rail was not in line with the main-track rail adjoining to and next beyond it on the south, but it was then too late to stop the train, and the locomotive was derailed, whereby Miller was so badly injured that he died the next day. The cause of the accident was due to the fact that a draw-bar of the switch was out of place, the linch-pin being out, so that the rails had not come back to place when the brakeman had adjusted the switch after the engine going to Lebanon passed it. The construction of the switch was such that two iron rods attached to it passed from it through the switch-rail, one of the rods pushed the T-rail over into line with the rails on the branch line when desired, and the other rod pulled the rail back, when it was necessary, into line with the rails on the main track. Each rod had an iron eye or ring on the end next to the switch, which fitted into a shank, and was held in to it by an iron pin or split key, passing through a hole in the outer end of the shank. An iron washer worked between the eye of the rod and the split key, so that the eye of the rod could not be slipped off of the shank without first drawing the split key out of its hole, and removing the washer from off the shank. When the switch was examined soon after the accident it was found that the switch indicated, or at least appeared to have been tampered with prior to the accident, either before or after the Lebanon locomotive passed through the switch. The rod which should have pulled the switch-rail back into line with the rails on the main track had been taken off of its shank, and dropped to the ground. The split pin which had held that rod in place on its shank was not found, but the washer which worked between the split pin and the rod's eye had been put back on the shank after the rod was removed off it. There is no other testimony than this tending to show how long the switch had been so disarranged before the accident occurred, or that the defendant company knew, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence ought to have discovered, that the switch had been tampered with, or was not in proper working order, before the time when the accident occurred.

Numerous exceptions were taken to instructions asked and refused and to instructions given by the trial court, and to the refusal to admit certain testimony relative to the confession and conviction of one W. A. Hill for tampering with and disarranging the switch which caused the accident, but all the questions involved may be reduced to two, namely: (1) Whether Conductor Huston or the brakeman who operated the switch occupied the position of vice-principal to the plaintiff's intestate Miller, so that his negligence in failing to discover that the switch was disarranged was the negligence of the company, and rendered it liable for the injury he sustained; and (2) whether the trial court erred in refusing to allow the judgment roll of the circuit court of the state of Oregon for Linn county, showing the indictment and conviction of one W. A. Hill for the killing of the said John W. Miller by disarranging a switch on the road of the defendant, and thereby causing the locomotive to be derailed in Linn county on July 28, 1889, to be received in evidence, or to allow Dr. Davis, a witness for the defendant, to answer certain questions as to whether he (W. A. Hill) ever confessed or admitted to him that he interfered with or broke the switch on the occasion under consideration. These will be considered in the order stated. There was a general rule of the company providing that conductors would be held personally responsible for the proper adjustment of switches used by their trains, and it was claimed that the effect of this rule was to create Huston vice-principal of Miller as between the latter and the company. The argument for the plaintiff proceeds upon the assumption that the switch was broken and disarranged when the Lebanon locomotive used it, and that Huston had devolved upon him the duty of seeing that the switch was properly adjusted, which being a personal duty the company owed to Miller, that the negligence of Huston in failing to discover that the switch was out of order was the negligence of the company, and rendered it liable for the injurious consequences which ensued. The rule was a proper and needful regulation, and obedience to it was well calculated to insure safety, but it was not designed to create any new or distinct liability other than the law established. As a rule, it did not operate to change the rule of law which governed the relation of the parties and fixed their liabilities. The conductors were not expected to perform the duties of switchmen,—some one under them, usually a brakeman, discharged this duty, by their direction; and the object of the rule in making them responsible was to secure the best possible performance of the duty of a switchman to insure safety in operating the trains. It added no new or other element to the legal relation of the parties concerned than already existed. The whole duty combined and to be performed in this regard by conductor and switchman, in operating the switch, only constituted the proper discharge of the duty of a switchman. It is not the duty of the master "as with a personal sight and touch" to operate the switches on the road. "It is utterly impracticable so to do, and a brakeman or fireman on a train knows that he is, as well as any person, connected with the business." And FOLGER, J., said: "The duty of the master is performed when he provides beforehand, and makes known to his servants, rules explicit and efficient, which, if observed and followed by all concerned, will bring personal notice to every one entitled to it," (Slater v. Jewett, 85 N. Y. 61;) and in the present case, "if followed and observed," will bring safety and security, as was intended by the rule. But the act performed was that of a switchman, the duty being to operate the switch and adjust the rails, and the object of the rule was to secure its proper performance, or to avoid its negligent discharge to insure safety. It was its negligent discharge which caused the injury. It is, then, the character of the act to which we must look to determine the legal relations of the parties concerned. The act involved the duty of a switchman, which was to operate and properly adjust the switch, a duty which could not properly be performed without discovering any failure of the switch to properly adjust the rails. In the case at bar the duty was to operate the switch and pass the locomotive on the branch track, and then adjust it so that the south-bound train coming on the main track would have a continuous line at that point. A like duty would have devolved upon any switchman who might have been detailed and stationed at that switch, and which counsel claim ought to have been done to guard against the switch being tampered with and disarranged. The duty of a switchman is to operate the switch, and see that it properly adjusts the rails, so that the trains may pass with safety; and it is the negligent discharge of this duty with which we are to deal. We begin by saying that the principle that any duty which the master is required to perform for the safety and protection of his servants cannot be delegated to any servant of any grade so as to exempt the master from liability to a servant who has been injured by its non-performance, cannot be questioned, nor that among these duties are not included the duty of a railroad company to keep its road-bed and track, rolling stock, tools, machinery, and appliances in good and safe condition, to cause as frequent and thorough inspection of these as can be done consistently with the conduct of its business for the purpose of discovering any defects that may occur from accidental causes, or the effects of wear and tear, or the progress of decay, to exercise care in the selection of its servants, and in their retention in its service, and to adopt such rules and regulations as are calculated to guard against accidents, and to make the servants in its employ reasonably safe. Our inquiry then is: Was the character of the act performed by the servant such an act as the law implies a contract duty upon the part of the master to perform? For if it was, then such servant, in respect to that act, ceases to be a servant, and becomes an agent or vice-principal. Now, the case presented is not negligence of a switchman in leaving a switch, safe and suitable as an appliance, open and misplaced, whereby a like accident would have happened, but negligence in failing to discover that a switch had been put out of order by some extraneous circumstances, so that it did not operate to adjust the line as it ought, and was supposed to have done. In one case the negligence consists in leaving a switch, sound and suitable for its purposes, open and misplaced; and in the other, in leaving the switch open and misplaced, because the switch, having been put out of order, did not operate, and that fact was not observed. But in either case the switchman would seem equally derelict or negligent, for the duties of his employment require him to see that the switch moves the rails, and puts them where it is designed that they should go for the operation of the trains; and this duty, when properly performed, necessarily includes the observance of any failure of the switch to operate or perform its office in adjusting the rail. Taking the view of the facts as claimed by the plaintiff, his position is that the switch was tampered with, or put out of order, before the Lebanon locomotive passed over it. Nor is it claimed that the switch was not originally a safe instrumentality, and suitable for its purpose, or that a sufficient length of time elapsed since the switch was disordered to charge the defendant with notice of its condition; but the claim is that the employe, upon whom was devolved the duties of a switchman, stood for the master in the performance of that duty, and that, when the Lebanon engine passed, the switch being out of order, if such employe had exercised ordinary care in the performance of this duty, he would have seen that the switch did not operate and adjust the rails, and examined the cause of it, and discovered its disordered condition, and prevented the accident. Counsel admit that such employe or servant may be a fellow-servant of Miller in the performance of some of his duties, but they say, "In the duty of maintaining a switch in order as a safe instrumentality for the performance by Miller of his duty within the line of his hazardous employment he was not a fellow-servant," citing Ford v. Railroad Co., 110 Mass. 260, in which the court say: "The agents who are charged with the duty of supplying safe machinery are not, in the true sense of the rule relied upon, to be regarded as fellow-servants of those who are engaged in operating it." But can it be said that a switchman or employe upon whom is devolved the duty of a switchman is charged with the duty of maintaining a switch in order as a safe instrumentality; that is, if the switch is out of order, to repair it or to supply a new one when necessary? It is no doubt true that such a duty devolves upon the defendant as master, or any servant to whom it delegates the duty, to exercise care, not only in the construction, but the maintenance in repair, of its switches as well as its tracks, road-beds, bridges, and trestles, etc. The reason is that these are personal duties, which the company is legally bound to perform, and owes to its employes operating its trains over the road; but when the company delegates such duties to its servants it is liable for the negligent performance of such duties. Hence, as Mr. McKinney says: "A section boss in charge of a squad of hands working, altering, and repairing the road, or one of his subordinates, can in no sense be regarded as a fellow-servant of employes operating trains over the road, so as to exempt the company from liability for their negligence in leaving the track defective. The company delegates to these employees the performance of a duty which the law makes it incumbent on the company to perform, i. e., that of furnishing a reasonably safe track and road-bed, and keeping it in repair, and it is liable for the negligent performance of this duty." McKinney, Fel. Serv. § 138, and note of authorities.

If we take the character of the act performed by such servant to determine whether he is an agent or representative of the company or a fellow-servant, what is there in the act of operating a switch so as to properly adjust the rails for the passage of trains, which may be considered in any sense to impose or delegate the duty to such employee to furnish, construct, keep, or maintain in repair such switch? However liberally we may construe the rule as to co-servants, it is difficult to perceive, if the rule itself is to remain, that a servant engaged in the operation of a switch is a representative of the master, or other than a fellow-servant engaged in a common employment for the successful management of the trains. The act he performs involves no duty of construction or repair, or other duty in regard to the switches of the road if out of repair and unfit for use, whether by wear and tear or by the criminal interference of strangers, than to promptly notify the company of its condition, so that it may be repaired or its place supplied. It is the law, in the absence of express contract, that establishes the relation of the parties creating him agent or representative of the master who performs duties which the law itself makes it incumbent on the master to perform, and not the rules or regulations of the company, which are designed for the guidance of its servants, and to secure reasonable safety in the conduct of its business. The failure to make proper rules and regulations adapted to the proper management of a hazardous business might render a railroad company liable, but the object of the rules is not to alter or effect the legal relation of the servant. In this regard the defendant was not negligent; it had promulgated a rule designed to secure safety in the passing of trains, and to remind its servants of their responsibility, and to enforce the observance of care in the proper adjustment of its switches when used. "It may be conceded," said Johnson, J., "that it is the duty of a railroad corporation to prescribe, either by means of timetables or by other suitable modes, regulations for running their trains with a view to their safety; but it is obvious that obedience to these regulations must be intrusted to the employees having charge of the trains. Such obedience is matter of executive detail, which, in the nature of things, no corporation or general agent of a corporation can personally oversee, and as to which employees must be relied on." Rose v. Railroad Co., 58 N. Y. 221. It is not the rule, but the legal relation which the parties sustained to each other, whether co-servants or not, which determined the liability of the company. The case stands in this wise: As the switch was originally safe and suitable as an instrumentality, and the evidence indicating that it was tampered with and put out of order before the Lebanon train passed, and none tending to show that by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence the company knew or ought to have known that it was so disarranged, and not in proper working order, so as to affect it with notice of its condition, unless the employee upon whom was devolved the duty of a switchman represented the company, and is chargeable with notice of its disordered condition, the plaintiff has no standing ground. The necessities of the case require that such employees shall be considered as a representative of the company in the negligent performance of this duty to affect it with liability. It is therefore claimed that it was the duty of such employee to maintain the switch in good order as a safe appliance for the passage of trains, which, being the duty of the company, the company must be considered as constructively present in the person of the switchman when he operated it and left it misplaced, and is chargeable by reason thereof with notice of its condition, and his negligence in not discovering it was the negligence of the company. But we have already shown that no duty of constructing, repairing, or maintaining in good order such appliances is delegated to such employee, or that he is invested with any power or authority in the premises other than performing the duty of a switchman; and, there being no evidence to charge the company with notice of its disarranged condition, except through such employee, the company is entitled to be considered as having performed its duty, unless he was its agent or representative, so as to affect the company with notice, and render it liable for his negligent discharge of the duty of switchman. That a switchman is a fellow-servant to the employees on the train has been so frequently held as seems to admit of little doubt. McKinney on Fellow-Servants (section 138) says: "The co-operation of the switchman is necessary to the successful management of the trains, and employees upon the train in the common service assume the risk of the negligent discharge of his duty." In Roberts v. Railroad Co., 33 Minn. 218, 22 N. W. Rep. 889, the train ran off the track in consequence of a misplaced switch, negligently left open by a switchman, thereby causing the death of a baggage-master on the train. The court held that the switchman and baggage-master were fellow-servants within the rule exempting the company from liability. In Brown v. Railroad Co., 68 Cal. 174, 8 Pac. Rep. 828, the court say: "The engineer and switch-tender, although on duty in separate departments, were, in the discharge of their duties, under the same general employment; and for the negligence of the fellow-servant of the intestate the defendant is not liable." In Harvey v. Railroad Co., 88 N. Y. 484, an engine attached to a train on defendant's road was thrown from the track by a misplaced switch, which the switchman had neglected to close, he being engaged at the time in conversation with another. The plaintiff's intestate, who was the fireman on the engine, was killed. The court say: "This is a plain case. It is evident that the cause of the injury was the neglect of the switchman to properly adjust the switch after using it to pass the local freight. As the switchman must be deemed to have been the co-servant of the plaintiff's intestate, the plaintiff cannot recover, unless some neglect of the defendant as principal also contributed to produce the injury." In Naylor v. Railroad Co., 33 Fed. Rep. 801, in an action against a railroad company for the death of the plaintiff's intestate, who was an engineer, it appeared that the death was caused by the negligence of a switchman, who left a switch open. Held, that the engineer and the switchman were fellow-servants. In Randall v. Railroad Co., 109 U. S. 488, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 322, it was held that a brakeman working a switch for his train on one track in a railroad yard is a fellow-servant with the engineer of another train of the same corporation. Mr. Justice GRAY, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "The general rule is now firmly established that one who enters the service of another takes upon himself the ordinary risks of the negligent acts of his fellow-servants in the course of the employment. * * * Persons standing in such relation to one another as did this plaintiff and the engine-man of the other train are fellow-servants according to the very great preponderance of judicial authority in this country, as well as the uniform course of decision in the house of lords and in the English and Irish courts, as is clearly shown by the cases cited in the margin;" citing numerous authorities. In Slattery's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 23 Ind. 83, it was held that a brakeman on a train and one whose duty it is to attend a switch are engaged in the same general undertaking, and the company is not liable to one for an injury caused by the negligence of the other. In Railroad Co. v. Henry, 7 Ill. App. 322, it is held that an engineer running a switch-engine and a switch-tender are engaged in common employment, and are fellow-servants. In Walker v. Railroad Co., 128 Mass. 10, an engineer and fireman were killed by a misplaced switch, which had been negligently left open; and upon an action to recover damages the court below directed a verdict for the defendant, which was sustained, the court saying: "The cause of action in each of these cases was the misplacement of a switch through the negligence of a fellow-servant of the plaintiff's intestate;" citing Farwell v. Railroad Corp., 4 Metc. (Mass.) 49; Gilman v. Railroad Co., 10 Allen, 233. See, also, Railroad Co. v. Troesch, 68 Ill. 549; Tinney v. Railroad Co., 62 Barb. 218; 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 886, "Fellow-Servants;" McKinney, Fel. Serv. § 188. Nor is there anything decided in the cases to which our attention has been specially called in conflict with the principle we are deciding. In the case of Davis v. Railroad Co., 55 Vt. 84, it appeared that through the negligence of the company's bridge builder in constructing and the road-master in repairing a culvert it washed out, whereby a foreman was killed, and the court held that the company was liable, saying: "The bridge builder and road-master, while inspecting and caring for the defectively constructed culvert, were performing a duty which, as between the intestate and the defendant, it was the duty of the defendant to perform. Their negligence therein was the negligence of the defendant." This is but applying the rule that where the master has intrusted a duty to a servant which the law devolved upon him to perform such servant is his representative, and any negligence on his part is the negligence of the master. Calvo v. Railroad Co., 23 S. C. 531, was decided on the same principle. There a locomotive engineer, while running his engine, was injured through the negligence of a section-master and supervisor of the track-laying force, who, in disregard of the appropriate signals, took up a portion of the track, and thereby derailed the engine. The court held that the true test was whether this section-master was employed to discharge the duties of the master, and also that it was the duty of the master to provide a suitable and safe place for his employees to work in and on, which duty in this case has been committed to the section-master. His negligence was therefore properly adjudged the negligence of the master. The same principle was recognized in the case of Moon v. Railroad Co., 78 Va. 745. In that case the decedent was a brakeman on a material train. A section gang at work on the track failed to signal the train, although it had the rails misplaced. In consequence the train was derailed, and the decedent so badly injured that he died in a few hours. The court held that the section-men and the decedent were not fellow-servants, saying that "when a company delegates to an agent or employe the performance of duties which the law makes it incumbent on the company to perform, his acts are the acts of the company, his negligence is the negligence of the company." Here the section-master was in charge of a squad of men working, altering, and repairing the road,—duties personal to the master, and which he was legally bound to perform, and consequently for which the master was responsible, if negligently performed by the servant to whom he intrusted them. The cases cited by the court—Brothers v. Carter, 52 Mo. 372; Flike v. Railroad Co., 53 N. Y. 549; Corcoran v. Holbrook, 59 N. Y. 517; Mullan v. Steam-Ship Co., 78 Pa. St. 25; Ryan v. Railroad Co., 60 Ill. 171—recognize the same principle, and it is not questioned. Among other cases affirming this doctrine are O'Donnell v. Railroad Co., 59 Pa. St. 239; Railroad Co. v. Carroll, 6 Helsk. 348; Railroad Co. v. Holt, 29 Kan. 149; Slater v. Jewett, 85 N. Y. 61. In all these cases the master intrusted a duty to the servant which the law made it incumbent on him to perform, and within the meaning of the rule as to liability for negligence he was a representative of such master in the performance of that duty, and not a fellow-servant. The duties of a switchman to operate the switch and to adjust it properly for the passage of trains involve no delegation of authority to furnish or keep or maintain in repair the track or its switches, or any of its appliances. No duty of this kind was confided to such employe, or included in the character of the act he performed, and without which he cannot be made a representative of the company, so as to effect it with liability for negligence. It is unquestionably the duty of the master to every employe to provide suitable appliances, machinery, and instrumentalities, and a reasonably safe place to perform his labor, and his failure to do so, whether by personal negligence or negligence of a servant to whom he has delegated such duty, will render him liable; but the master cannot be held liable for the negligent performance of a duty by a servant which involves the performance of no such personal obligation. If the company is to be held liable for negligence, some other ground must be sought upon which to predicate it; for the books seem decisive to the point that such a servant, engaged in the performance of the duties of a switchman, is not a representative of the master, but a fellow-servant of the employe upon the train,—of the plaintiff's intestate,—who assume the risk of his negligent discharge of his duties. While some of the authorities extend the rule further than others, and embrace a more numerous and various class as fellow-servants engaged in a common employment,—and further than we are inclined to extend it,—yet none of them have so limited and restricted its operation as to destroy the relation of fellow-servants between a switchman and the servants on the train, and consequently the master cannot be held liable for the negligent discharge of his duties.

The next objection relates to the refusal of the court to admit as evidence the indictment and judgment of the conviction of W. A. Hill for the killing of the plaintiff's intestate by disarranging a switch on the defendant's railroad, and certain confessions it was proposed to prove that he had made to Dr. Davis. The court considered the evidence as res inter alios acta, and declined to admit it. It was shown by the evidence that Hill and his companions applied to Conductor Huston about one-half hour before he left Albany with his locomotive on that evening for the privilege of riding upon his locomotive to the farm at which they were working on the line of the Lebanon branch of the company's road, and that Huston refused to allow them to ride, as it was contrary to the rules of the company, and that they left and walked away in the direction of the switch. The evidence is offered on the ground, as stated by counsel, that "it is a matter of public notoriety that the switch mentioned in the pleadings was, on the evening of the day on which this accident occurred, tampered with and disarranged by one W. A. Hill and his accomplices, and that as a result the train was derailed, and the intestate and his fireman, Guthrie, were mortally injured; that Hill was convicted of the crime upon his own confessions, and sentenced to the penitentiary therefor; that his accomplices escaped because there was no witness to their acts except themselves, and their confessions were ruled to have been made under such circumstances as to exclude them from being given in evidence against them; that, as there was no witness of their general subsequent conduct with the breaking of the switch, there was no proof of it other than by the record of Hill's conviction," etc., of which a certified transcript was offered in evidence, and ruled out, and the defendant left without any evidence in support of its plea. Counsel say they "have searched the books in vain for a case in point," but they have been unable to find any bearing on the subject. Their argument in support of its admission is that the record of the conviction of a party of a crime by the public prosecutor is public property, and may be given in evidence whenever it becomes a fact material to be shown in connection with the issues joined in any other suit or action; that it is not conclusive evidence against whom it is offered, nor does not estop him to controvert or deny it, but that it is prima facie evidence of the facts thereby established. They cite Maybee v. Avery, 18 Johns. 352, and Mead v. Boston, 3 Cush. 404. The effect of the ruling in Maybee v. Avery, supra, can be best understood from Judge SUTHERLAND's statement of it in People v. Buckland, 13 Wend. 596, and from which we cite. He says that Judge SPENCER, "after stating the general rule that in order to render a verdict and judgment competent evidence it must be on the same point, and between the same parties or privies, and give the reason on which the rule is founded, he adverts to the exception to the rule which has already been noticed, to-wit, that where the matter in dispute is a question of public right all persons standing in the same situation as the parties are affected by it; and he remarked that in his opinion a verdict on an indictment formed another exception, and upon the same principle; that the public was the party aggrieved, the prosecution was carried on by their officer, and that any person might when necessary avail himself of a conviction. He observed that the plaintiff in the case could not complain, for he had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness, and to produce his testimony, and to reverse the judgment if erroneous; but that the verdict was not conclusive, and that the plaintiff should have been allowed to repel it." The evidence which was objected to in that case was a record of conviction for stealing two hens, but was admitted by Judge SPENCER, who tried the case. The plaintiff then offered to show that the evidence on which he was convicted was false, and that he in fact owned the two hens. This was objected to on the ground that the record of conviction was conclusive until reversed, which was sustained, and the evidence rejected. Upon a motion for a new trial it was held that the record of conviction was admissible in evidence, but that it was only prima facie, and that the plaintiff should have been allowed to disprove the fact, and to give evidence of the falsity of the testimony on which the conviction was founded. This case, as SUTHER-

ERLAND, J., observed, "only decides that a verdict and judgment on an indictment are competent prima facie evidence against the defendant in the indictment," but he adds that "the principle laid down * * * makes them competent evidence upon the point involved even between strangers to the original proceedings, and this I am inclined to think is the true rule." In Mead v. Boston, 3 Cush. 408, SHAW, C. J., said: "The admission in a civil action of a conviction on an indictment founded on a plea of guilty is not an exception to this rule. That is received not as a judicial act, having the force and effect of a judgment, but as a solemn confession of the very matter charged in the civil action. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 537." But the record of conviction offered in this case was not founded on a plea of guilty, but Hill pleaded not guilty, and his confessions were proven, upon which he was convicted." In Brownsword v. Edwards, 2 Ves. Sr. 245, it was held that a sentence in a criminal proceeding cannot be used as evidence in a civil action. The lord chancellor said: "On the trial the sentence was offered in evidence to prove that they were not married. The whole court were of the opinion that it could not be given in evidence, because, first, it was a criminal matter, and could not be given in evidence in a civil cause; next, that it was res inter alios acta, and could not affect the issue." In Gibson v. McCarty, Hardw. Cas. Temp. 311, a judgment of conviction for forgery was offered in evidence, but it was held that such record of a conviction in a criminal matter cannot be read as evidence in a civil suit. In Rex v. Warden of the Fleet, 12 Mod. 839, it was held that a conviction of battery would not be evidence in an action for the same battery, nor vice versa, and that records of conviction or verdicts could not be given in evidence whenever the benefit would not be mutual. See, also, Patterson v. Gaines, 6 How. 586; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 537; Com. v. Lincoln, 110 Mass. 410. The real ground is a want of mutuality arising from the parties not being identical; nor are the rules of decision and the course of the proceedings the same. While it is true there does seem to be some privity between the facts offered to be established by the records of conviction and the fact in issue which would make it relevant evidence, and receivable as such, yet it has been thought better for the administration of justice to preserve the general rule which excludes verdicts and judgments between other parties than to form an exception to it because of some particular circumstances. In excluding this record we are not prepared to say that the court erred; but for the reasons already stated the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

MCLEOD V. ELLIS.

VENUE—CONVERSION OF TREES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Code Wash. § 47, provides that local actions shall be commenced in the county or district in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated; and section 48 provides that transitory actions shall be tried in the county or district where the cause of action, or some part thereof, arose. Held, that section 50, which provides that an action commenced in the wrong county may be tried therein, unless defendant, when he appears and pleads, demands that the trial be had in the proper county, applies only to the transitory actions enumerated in section 48, and not to the local actions enumerated in section 47, and that the failure of a defendant in an action involving injuries to land to demand a change of trial to the proper county does not confer jurisdiction on the district court of a county in which the land is not situated.

2. The provision in section 47, that local actions shall be tried in the "county or district" wherein the subject of the action is situated, does not extend the jurisdiction to the whole judicial district in which the subject of the action is situated, but the word "district" was intended to apply only to those cases where a county did not have the privilege of sessions of court within its limits, and was joined to another county for judicial purposes; and hence an action involving injuries to land must be tried in the county in which it is situated, and not in another county in the same judicial district.

3. A complaint alleged that defendant unlawfully cut trees on plaintiff's land, and thereby became indebted to plaintiff in the value of the trees. In another paragraph plaintiff prayed for treble damages under Code Wash. § 602, which relates to trespasses on land, and which allows treble damages where one person wrongfully cuts trees on the land of another. The action, however, was neither brought nor tried in the county in which the land was situated. Held that, to uphold the jurisdiction of the court, the paragraph relating to treble damages might be rejected as surplusage, and the action regarded as transitory in its nature, for the conversion of the trees. Horst, J., dissenting.

4. Since the action must be treated as one for the conversion of the trees, in which only single damages can be recovered, an erroneous instruction that the jury may award treble damages is not cured by a verdict awarding a certain sum as "single damages," as some of the jurors, under the charge, may well have agreed to a large verdict for "single damages" if others consented to waive "treble damages."

Appeal from superior court, Thurston county.

Action by I. C. Ellis against Alexander McLeod for the conversion of trees. There was a verdict in plaintiff's favor, and defendant brings error. Code Wash. §§ 47, 48, 50, and 602, are as follows: "Sec. 47. Actions for the following causes shall be commenced in the county or district in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated: (1) For the recovery of, for the possession of, for the partition of, for the foreclosure of a mortgage on, or for the determination of all questions affecting the title, or for any injuries to real property. (2) All questions involving the rights to the possession or title to any specific article of personal property, in which last-mentioned class of cases damages may also be awarded for the detention and for injury to such personal property. Sec. 48. Actions for the following causes shall be tried in the district or county where the cause, or some part thereof, arose: (1) For the recovery of a penalty or forfeiture imposed by statute. (2) Against a public officer, or person specially appointed to execute his duties, for an act done by him in virtue of his office, or against a person who, by his command or in his aid, shall do anything touching the duties of such officer." "Sec. 50. In all other cases the action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the time of the commencement of the action, or may be served with process, subject, however, to the power of the court to change the place of trial, as provided in this act. If the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial thereof, the action may, notwithstanding, be tried therein, unless the defendant, at the time he appears and demurs or answers, files an affidavit of merits, and demands that a trial be had in the proper county." "Sec. 602. Whenever any person shall cut down, girdle, or otherwise injure, or carry off, any tree, timber, or shrub on the land of another person, or on the street or highway in front of any person's house, village, town, or city lot, or cultivated grounds, or on the commons or public grounds of any village, town, or city, or on the street or highway in front thereof, without lawful authority, in an action by such person, village, town, or city against the person committing such trespasses, or any of them, if judgment be given for the plaintiff, it shall be given for treble the amount of damages claimed or assessed therefor, as the case may be."

Allen & Ayer, for appellant. J. W. Robinson, for appellee.

STILES, J. This action was commenced in the territorial district court held in Thurston county for triple damages upon a complaint containing the following allegations: "(1) That between January 1 and September 1, 1889, the defendant entered upon the south half and the north-east quarter of the north-east quarter of section 33, in township 21 north, range 1 west of the Willamette meridian, in the state of Washington, being situated in the county of Pierce, and owned by this plaintiff, and in his possession; and did then and there, without leave of plaintiff, cut down, remove, dispose of, and convert to his own use the proceeds thereof, about — trees, containing fourteen hundred thousand feet of lumber, of the value of four thousand two hundred dollars. (2) That by reason of said removal and conversion the said defendant became and is indebted to plaintiff in the full sum of four thousand two hundred dollars, no part of which has been paid; and defendant has refused and does now refuse to pay the same or any portion thereof. (3) That by force of section 602 of the Code of Washington defendant became and is liable to plaintiff in the full sum of twelve thousand six hundred dollars." The land upon which the acts complained of were committed was in Pierce county. The defendant's demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court for the reason that the action was not commenced in the proper county was overruled, and the cause proceeded to judgment.

The Code, both by its express terms and by inferential provisions, seeks to reduce every private wrong to a dead level, so far as pleading is concerned, so that a complaint containing a plain statement of facts serves to lay the cause of action before the court, no matter what may have theretofore been the technical form or name of the remedy. Accordingly, chapter 49 of "Waste and Trespass" was adopted in furtherance of the general plan. The injuries to land which, when committed by persons lawfully in possession thereof, had been cognisable in the technical action of waste, were assembled in section 601, while those in which a stranger to the land was the wrong-doer, and which had been cognisable in the action of trespass, were collected and provided for in sections 602 and 603. The common-law remedies remained, although there made statutory, and the nature of each action continued as before, though they are now known as actions for injuries to real property, instead of waste in the one case and trespass in the other. Therefore, unless the last clause of section 50 applies as well to the actions included in section 47 as to those included in section 48, the Thurston district court had no jurisdiction of the cause if it was one for injuries to land. Section 47 pointedly says that actions for injuries to real property shall be commenced in the "county or district" in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated. If commenced there, they must be tried there, unless removed for reasons sufficient under section 51. But appellee contends that the last clause of section 50 shows that the requirement that these actions be commenced in the particular county or district is merely directory, and that, unless the defendant moves in the manner provided therein, the trial may be had in any county or district selected by the plaintiff. It is agreed that no affidavit of merits, and no demand for a trial in Pierce county, were made. We cannot agree with this contention, however. There is a marked difference between the language of section 47 and sections 48 and 50. The former refers to a peculiar class of actions, which were always local; while the latter only includes actions which were always transitory. The first named says the actions specified must be commenced in certain counties or districts; while the others only require the trial to be in the county or district where the property is or the defendant resides, as the case may be. Coming in the connection where it is, and in view of the difference in language, we are constrained to hold that the last clause of section 50 does not apply to the actions enumerated in section 47. Still another objection is raised, however, namely, that section 47 does not absolutely require actions for injuries to real property to be commenced in the county where the subject of the action is situated, but extends the jurisdiction to the whole judicial district, which, in this instance, included both Pierce and Thurston, as well as many other counties; and, if that position is correct, the Thurston county court was fully authorized to entertain the action. But we are not satisfied that the term "district," as used in section 47, has the meaning claimed for it. The four judicial districts formerly existing under the territorial régime were merely divisions of the territory for the assignment of the judges, and for some purposes of United States jurisdiction. No jurisdiction of matters cognisable under the territorial laws merely was based upon those districts. Here, as in the states, counties were the units of jurisdiction, and to them reference was made when any action was spoken of as "local," as distinguished from one which was "transitory." But not every county had the privilege of sessions of the courts within its limits, and where two or more counties were joined for jurisdictional purposes they constituted a "district" in the sense in which the word was used in section 47, and action for injuries to real property could be commenced in the court of such a district only. The case of Wood v. Mastick, 2 Wash. T. 69, 8 Pac. Rep. 612, in a few words announced the same conclusion here expressed.

Under the construction thus adopted, were we to hold further that the action was one for injuries to the realty, the judgment would necessarily be reversed, and the action dismissed for want of jurisdiction in the court below. But the appellee contends, and, on the whole, we conclude, rightly, that his action was one for the value of his trees as personalty merely, without any claim for injury to his land. The complaint was apparently drawn under the impression in the mind of the pleader that section 602 allowed triple damages for such a conversion, and the court below seems to have taken that view. To sustain that interpretation and secure that measure of damages, the complaint, in its third paragraph, alleged the conclusion "that by force of section 602 of the Code of Washington defendant became and is liable to the plaintiff in the full sum of twelve thousand six hundred dollars," which amount was three times the alleged damage, and the prayer was accordingly. The second paragraph was entirely impertinent to a complaint for injuries to land under section 602, and so was the allegation in the first paragraph, that the trees cut contained 1,400,000 feet of lumber, of the value of $4,200, since the necessary and proper allegations of such a complaint were merely that certain trees had been cut down to plaintiff's damage. But if we allow paragraph 2 to stand, by which it was alleged "that by reason of the said removal and conversion [alluding to the trees, the quantity of lumber and the value] the said defendant became and is indebted to plaintiff in the full sum of $4,200, no part of which has been paid" etc.; and if we entirely reject paragraph 3 as surplusage, there is a faulty, but still sufficient, complaint for a wrongful conversion of the trees. We confess that in so holding, however, we have extended the liberality allowable in favor of pleadings to its furthest limit, being constrained thereto in part by the rules in favor of jurisdiction.

The judgment must be reversed, however, for the court charged the jury erroneously in two respects. In the first place, the jury were told that this was a case wherein triple damages could be awarded under section 602, unless the taking was casual or involuntary, etc.; and, secondly, that the jury could themselves assess the triple damages. Neither of these instructions was correct. We have already shown why the main charge was wrong; but, even if there had been a case for triple damage, the province of the jury, under the statute, went no further than to assess the actual damage, and find whether it was willful or excusable, leaving it to the court to triple the damage in its judgment. See section 602. The jury in this case awarded a certain amount "single damages," which, appellee claims, shows appellant not, in any event, to have been injured by the court's charge. But it will not do to presume no injury in a case where the whole charge was so clearly erroneous, based, as it was, on an altogether wrong theory of the case. Jurors, under the charge, might well have agreed to a larger verdict for "single damage," other jurors consenting to waive their view that the damages should be triple, and thus no just verdict would have been found. The cause must go back for a new trial, wherein the measure of damages will be the value of the trees at the instant when they first became severed from the real estate, without further manipulation. See 4 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 123, and cases cited. The plaintiff will have leave to amend his complaint, if he desires. Cause remanded; costs to appellant.

ANDERS, C. J., and DUNBAR and SCOTT, JJ., concur.

HOYT, J., (dissenting.) I agree with the majority of the court that the judgment should be reversed. But I cannot thus agree as to the disposition of the case. I think that the plaintiff, having specifically stated in his complaint that he brought his action on a certain section of the Code, and claimed damage thereunder, should be bound by such statement, and that therefore the cause of action stated in the complaint in this suit was one of damage to lands, and should have been brought in Pierce county, and that the court below should be directed to dismiss the action.

RIGHTS OF TENANTS—SALE BY LANDLORD.

Tenants who enter under a lease, sufficient except for lack of acknowledgment, and pay rent and erect improvements, cannot be ejected by a subsequent vendee of the landlord, who takes with knowledge of the facts; and the omission from the granting clause of the lease of the name of one of the lessors is immaterial.

SCOTT, J. The question raised in this case is in substance the same as that passed upon by us in McGlauffin v. Holman, at our May session, 1890. See 24 Pac. Rep. 439. There is an additional defect in this instrument in its not containing the name of one of the lessors in the granting clause, but this does not take it out of the principle recognized in the case cited. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded. The demurrer should be overruled, with leave to answer.

PLEADING—ORDER TO STRIKE OUT—WAIVER OF EXCEPTION.

A defendant's exception to an order to strike out his affirmative defense is not waived by his filing a substituted answer.

Judson, Sharpstein & Sullivan, for appellant. A. A. Knight, for appellee.

SCOTT, J. Appellee brought this action to obtain possession of certain land. Appellant, in his answer, denied some of the allegations of the complaint, and also set up as an affirmative defense that certain prior owners of the premises, of whom appellee subsequently purchased, agreed to lease the same to appellant for the term of two years from the 15th day of August, 1888, and that they, upon the 26th day of June in said year, executed to him an instrument, which he and they supposed to be a valid lease thereof accordingly, but that by a mutual mistake the lessors did not acknowledge the same, and the name of one of them was omitted from the granting clause therein; that appellant went into and continued in possession of the premises thereunder, made valuable improvements thereon, paid the rent stipulated, and complied with the agreement upon his part, and that appellee, when he purchased, had knowledge of appellant's rights therein. The action was brought before the term had expired. The court, upon appellee's motion, struck out the affirmative defense, to which exception was taken. Appellant then filed an amended or substituted answer, merely setting up the denials contained in the original answer. The trial resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff. Appellee claims the matters stricken constituted no defense or ground for relief, and, if otherwise, that appellant waived the same by filing his amended answer. The first point is disposed of on the authority of McGlauffin v. Holman, 24 Pac. Rep. 439, in a case just decided by us, submitted herewith, being an action brought by appellant against appellee and said lessors, wherein the same instrument was involved. Schulte v. Schering, ante, 78. As to the second point, the filing of the substituted answer did not operate as a waiver of the exception to the order of the court striking the part aforesaid of the original answer. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a retrial. The order upon the motion should be vacated, and leave to reply granted.

POLICE MAGISTRATES—COMPENSATION.

The charter of the city of S. provided that the city might designate one of the justices of the peace residing therein to act as police magistrate, and might regulate the compensation of its officers, "except when otherwise provided." Held, that the phrase, "except when otherwise provided," referred to the general statutes, and not to the ordinances of the city which fixed the compensation of the police magistrate; and that he was entitled only to the fees allowed by statute to other justices of the peace.

Appeal from superior court, Spokane county; J. M. KINNAIRD, Judge.

S. G. Allen, for appellants. Turner & Graves, for appellee.

HOYT, J. Under its charter the city of Spokane Falls was authorized to designate one of the justices of the peace residing therein as police justice of said city, and the said justice, when so designated, was authorized to try offenders for alleged violations of the ordinances of said city. There was a provision of said charter which authorized the city to establish and regulate the fees and compensation of its officers, except when otherwise provided. By virtue of these provisions, one of the defendants had been designated as such police justice, and his compensation for services rendered as such justice fixed at a salary of $150 per month, and the sole question argued by counsel, and presented for our determination, is as to the power of said city to provide this compensation for such services. If the jurisdiction to perform the acts required of such officer under said charter is derived primarily from the fact that he has been designated as police justice, there would be strong reason for holding that, under said provisions of its charter, said city might provide as compensation therefor the above-stated salary. If, on the other hand, such jurisdiction arises from the fact that he is a justice of the peace, then it would be more reasonable to hold that his compensation should be governed by the general provisions of the statute, which provide certain fees for the several acts required to be performed by such justice of the peace. Unless the contrary intention was clear, it would be presumed that the legislature intended to provide the same compensation for like acts performed by justices of the peace throughout the state. And we do not think such intention sufficiently appears in the language of the charter of said city, as every word in the charter can be given its full force as well by holding that the above-stated provision, allowing the city to fix the compensation of its officers "except as otherwise provided" meant "as otherwise provided by law," as by holding that it meant as otherwise provided in said charter. In fact, the words used would be the ordinary ones to express the former meaning, while the latter would be much more likely to be expressed by the limitation, "except as otherwise provided herein," or "in this charter." Plaintiff in error has evidently foreseen that the main contention must be as to the capacity in which said officer acted. Hence almost his entire argument has been to show that acts required of such officer were non-judicial in their character, and could therefore be conferred on other officers than those mentioned in the organic act as the only ones in whom could be vested judicial authority. With their contention in this regard we cannot agree, for, although there are some authorities to the effect that violations of the provisions of ordinances of cities can be tried by others than judicial officers, we think that under the organic act of the territory, and the legislation and practice thereunder, the proceedings had to punish for a violation of city ordinances were as purely judicial as any other proceedings before justices of the peace. The provisions of the charter in question tend strongly to establish such fact; for, if the acts required were non-judicial, why was the city required to fill such place of police justice by some one of the justices of the peace residing in said city? We think that every act of such police justice was the act of a justice of the peace, and that the only object or effect of his designation as such police justice was to provide a single officer before whom the causes under the city charter should be brought. Without such provision the business would be divided between the several justices of the peace residing in such city, which would not so well subserve the convenient and economical administration of the affairs of the city as would a single judicial officer. It follows that the compensation provided by general statute applies to the officer in question, and that the ordinance providing for a salary therefor is void, and the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed, and it will be so ordered.

REVIEW ON APPEAL—TRIAL BY COURT—FINDINGS—ADMISSIONS IN PLEADINGS.

Where the answer in an action for the unpaid price of land admits the allegations of the complaint as to the terms of sale, and there is nothing in the record to affirmatively show that the parties have actually tried issues outside of the pleadings, a finding by the court establishing different terms of sale from those alleged and admitted will be disregarded on appeal. Explaining Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 Pac. Rep. 186.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county: R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Thos. McNutta and S. W. Bouton, for appellant. W. C. Stratton, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover balance of unpaid purchase money for land sold and conveyed by plaintiff to defendant. Judgment for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll.

It is alleged in the complaint that on or about November 22, 1888, the plaintiff agreed to sell to the defendant, and the defendant agreed to purchase from the plaintiff, one undivided third part of a tract of land, described in the complaint, containing about 1,000 acres, of the value of not less than $3,300, for the consideration and upon the terms hereinafter stated. That at the date of said agreement the plaintiff was indebted to various persons in various sums, amounting to about $1,400. "That, as part of the consideration for said purchase, defendant agreed to pay off and discharge all of plaintiff's aforesaid indebtedness, amounting to about said sum of $1,400, and, for the remainder of said consideration, to pay to plaintiff, over and above said indebtedness, the sum of $1,500, and, in earnest of said agreement, said defendant then and there paid plaintiff the sum of $25, part of said $1,500, payable to plaintiff under said agreement. Plaintiff avers that he has in all respects fully performed on his part all the obligations of the agreement of purchase and sale above stated. That on or about the 25th day of January, 1889, he executed, acknowledged, and delivered to said defendant his (plaintiff's) deed, conveying the land above mentioned, in accordance with and pursuant to said agreement of sale." That said deed was a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, and was prepared, as he is informed and believes, under the direction of the defendant, and was recorded by request of defendant on the day of its date. Plaintiff avers that, notwithstanding the recital of full payment on said deed, no part of the said $1,500 due and payable by defendant to plaintiff, under the aforesaid agreement of sale and purchase, has ever been paid plaintiff, excepting the sum of $25 hereinbefore mentioned, and that the balance of said consideration, to-wit, the sum of $1,475, is still due and unpaid to plaintiff from said defendant, who has neglected and refused, and still neglects and refuses, to pay the same, or any portion thereof, although requested to pay said sum." For want of information or belief, the defendant, in his answer, denied that the value of the land was not less than $3,300. The answer then proceeds as follows: "Denies that the deed mentioned in the amended complaint herein was prepared under the direction of defendant. Denies that no part of the $1,500 due and payable by defendant has ever been paid plaintiff, except the sum of $25, and avers that he has paid to plaintiff the full amount of the purchase price of said land. Denies that the sum of $1,475, or any sum, is due or unpaid to plaintiff from defendant.

Wherefore defendant demands judgment that plaintiff take nothing by this action, and for his costs." After finding the value of the property to have been $3,800 at the time of the purchase, and at the time of the trial, as alleged in the complaint, the court made the following findings: "(2) That on or about the 25th day of January, 1889, the plaintiff agreed to sell to the defendant, and the defendant agreed to buy of the plaintiff, the plaintiff's one-third interest in said land for the sum of $1,500, and the plaintiff thereupon executed, acknowledged, and delivered to defendant a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, conveying to the defendant his said one-third interest in said land, and the consideration stated in said deed was $1,500. (3) That the defendant has fully paid to plaintiff said sum of $1,500, and there is no part thereof now due or unpaid; that said sum of $1,500 was paid in the following manner: the defendant liquidated and discharged debts due by plaintiff to various persons, amounting to $1,625, said debts being paid by consent of plaintiff. (4) That the defendant did not at any time agree to pay or give to plaintiff any consideration, other than said sum of $1,500, for his said one-third interest in said land. As a conclusion of law from the foregoing facts, the court finds that the defendant is entitled to judgment against the plaintiff that he take nothing by this action, and for his costs of suit, and it is ordered that judgment be entered accordingly."

The appellant makes the point that the findings of fact are inconsistent with, and contradictory of, the facts admitted and established by the pleadings; and this point seems to be well taken. The agreement, as stated in the complaint, is not denied or in any way qualified by the answer, nor is any other agreement set up in the answer; yet the fourth finding of fact flatly contradicts a material part of the agreement as alleged in the complaint. By the agreement established by the pleadings, the defendant was to pay debts of plaintiff amounting to $1,400, and, in addition thereto, was to pay directly to plaintiff $1,500; but the fourth finding, read in connection with the third, is that defendant never agreed to pay any other consideration for the conveyance than to pay debts of plaintiff amounting to $1,500. This contradicts the admitted allegation of the complaint that the defendant agreed to pay directly to plaintiff $1,500 in addition to the payment of $1,400 to plaintiff's creditors. So far as the second finding sets forth an agreement of a different date and consideration from that alleged in the complaint, it is entirely outside of the issues made by the pleadings. The agreement to convey for a consideration of $1,500, referred to in the second finding, seems to have been inferred from the recital of that consideration in the deed of January 25th, executed in pursuance of the agreement alleged in the complaint. But no such inference was justifiable, since it was averred in the complaint, and not denied in the answer, that the deed did not recite the full consideration. In Burnett v. Stearns, 83 Cal. 469, it is said: "The findings should be confined to the facts in issue. The province of the court in respect to facts is to determine, but not to raise, issues. It is insisted on the other side that it will be presumed the court found the fact in question from competent evidence. The answer is, it would not be presumed that evidence was introduced to contradict the admission of record." This case is emphatically affirmed in Gregory v. Nelson, 41 Cal. 279, where, among other things, it is said: "This court cannot presume that the trial court required or permitted evidence to be introduced on the trial for the purpose of establishing or rebutting allegations of the complaint not denied by the answer; nor can it be presumed that any evidence was received by the trial court except such as was pertinent to the issues made or tendered by the pleadings, and evidence tending to rebut such legitimate evidence." To the same effect are the following cases: Hicks v. Murray, 43 Cal. 515; Bradbury v. Cronise, 46 Cal. 287; Estate of McKinley, 49 Cal. 152; McDonald v. Association, 51 Cal. 210; Hill v. Den, 54 Cal. 20; Tracy v. Craig, 55 Cal. 91; Silvey v. Neary, 59 Cal. 97; Campe v. Lassen, 67 Cal. 139, 7 Pac. Rep. 430. In Re Doyle, 78 Cal. 570, 15 Pac. Rep. 128, the court, by Mr. Justice McKINSTRY, said: "When a trial is had by the court without a jury, a fact admitted by the pleadings should be treated as found. * * * If the court does find adversely to the admission, such finding should be disregarded in determining the question whether the proper conclusion of law was drawn from the facts found and admitted by the pleadings. * * * In such case the facts alleged must be assumed to exist. Any finding adverse to the admitted facts drops from the record, and any legal conclusion which is not upheld by the admitted facts is erroneous." See, also, Reinhart v. Lugo, 75 Cal. 639, 18 Pac. Rep. 112, and Gould v. Stafford, 77 Cal. 66, 18 Pac. Rep. 879.

The class of cases cited by counsel for respondent, such as White v. Railroad Co., 50 Cal. 417; Teris v. Hicks, 41 Cal. 123; Smith v. Penny, 44 Cal. 161; and Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 Pac. Rep. 186,—has no proper application to the facts of this case. In that class of cases it appears of record that the parties have actually tried issues outside of the pleadings without objection, and by tacit consent, as if the issues had been made by the pleadings, and under such circumstances that if one party had objected the other might have supplied or cured the defect by amendment of his pleading, or otherwise mitigated the effect of the objection. The principle upon which those decisions rest is that of equitable estoppel, it being held that a party who acquiesces and participates in the trial of an issue without objection, as if it arose from the pleadings, when he might have objected on the ground that the issue was not made by the pleadings in the trial court, where the objection might have been met by amendment of the pleadings or otherwise, so that it would have operated less injuriously on the other party than if first made on appeal, has thereby waived the objection and misled the other party to understand that the issue was properly made, and therefore should not be heard to make it on appeal. To justify this application of the principle of estoppel it should appear from the record on appeal, among the other elements of an estoppel, that the issue was actually and intentionally tried by the introduction of pertinent evidence, and that the party against whom the estoppel is invoked consciously participated or acquiesced in such trial, as if the issue had been made by the pleadings, and in such manner as may have induced the other party to believe that the issue had been properly made, or diverted his attention from the fact that it was not made by the pleadings.

It would seem that some of the decisions in the class of cases under consideration have gone to the verge of the province of waivers and equitable estoppels, and press to encroach upon the domain of the law of pleading and evidence, particularly sections 462, 588-590, Code Civil Proc. Section 590 provides: "An issue of fact arises: (1) Upon a material allegation in the complaint controverted by the answer;" and section 462 provides: "Every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, must, for the purposes of the action, be taken to be true." It is not within the discretionary power of any court to dispense with these provisions; yet they are not violated by a decision of the appellate court that a party, by his conduct at the trial, is estopped from asserting, on appeal, for the first time, that a fact found by the trial court was not within the issues made by the pleading, since such a decision assumes that the fact found was within the issues, and its propriety can be questioned only upon the ground that the facts of record are insufficient to create the alleged estoppel. Doubtless the facts should be of a nature and effect similar to those required to effect an estoppel in pais in other cases; but, upon a superficial view, there is a seeming conflict in the cases as to how the facts shall be made to appear. Must the conduct of the party which estops him positively appear upon the record? or, may it be presumed for the mere purpose of upholding the decision of the trial court? We have seen that the cases of Burnett v. Stearns, Gregory v. Nelson, and In re Doyle are expressly opposed to any such presumption; but, in the case of Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 Pac. Rep. 186, cited by respondent, there is a dictum, at least, in favor of such a presumption. In this last case it was conceded that the agreement pleaded and relied upon by defendant, in his cross-complaint, was void, but the court found a subsequent agreement which was not pleaded, which is fully set out in the finding, and in accordance with which judgment was rendered. This court, by Mr. Justice THORNTON, said: "It is objected that the finding is not within the issues. As the record shows nothing to the contrary, we must presume that testimony was introduced to establish the facts found by this finding. It does not appear that any objection was made by the plaintiff to the evidence that it was inadmissible under the pleadings, as not being within the issues joined. As the record stands, it appears that the cause was tried as if the agreement found was put in issue. Under such circumstances, we cannot permit the objection to be now made that this finding is of matters outside of the issues joined in the cause. It should not be permitted that the plaintiff should allow the cause to be tried as if issues are regularly joined, and, when the result is a judgment adverse to his claims, urge in this court that no such issue was made in the court below." This case was not fully reported. By referring to the original record, (Sup. Ct. Records, vol. 362, p. 198,) it will be seen that the subsequent agreement was imperfectly pleaded, and that the judgment roll contains a bill of exceptions showing that testimony sufficient to justify the finding of the subsequent agreement was introduced by the defendant without objection on the ground that the subsequent agreement was not pleaded, (pages 209, 210.) Therefore there was no occasion or room for a presumption that "testimony was introduced to establish the facts found," by the finding set out in the opinion, as to the subsequent agreement. Further on the learned justice says: "As the record stands, it appears that the cause was tried as if the agreement found was put in issue." This must be understood as referring to the evidence contained in the bill of exceptions. So understood, it shows that the learned justice did not rely upon any presumption to establish the fact that testimony was introduced, without objection, to prove the subsequent agreement on which the judgment rested. In the judgment roll of the case at bar there is no bill of exceptions nor anything to show that any evidence was introduced tending to prove a subsequent or other contract than that alleged in the complaint and not denied in the answer; or tending to show, contrary to the admission of the pleadings, that the deed of January 25, 1889, from plaintiff to defendant, correctly recited the full consideration for the conveyance. Perhaps the plea of payment, in the absence of a special demurrer, sufficiently tendered an issue as to payment; but the findings show that the only payment by defendant was $1,500, made by liquidating and discharging debts due by plaintiff to various persons, amounting to $1,625, by consent of plaintiff, thus leaving a balance of the contract price due the plaintiff of, at least, $1,375. I think the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings if they so desire.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings if they so desire.

SWASEY v. ADAIR et ux. (No. 13,178.)

APPEAL—SUPERSEDEAS—REPLEVIN.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 943, providing that if the judgment appealed from direct the delivery of personal property, the execution cannot be stayed by appeal unless appellant enters into an undertaking to obey the order of the appellate court, the fact that defendant in replevin has given the redelivery bond described by section 514 does not entitle her to a stay of execution on her appeal from a judgment for plaintiff without giving a stay-bond.

2. Other grounds for staying execution than the taking of an appeal cannot be raised for the first time on motion in the appellate court.

In bank. Application for writ of superseas to superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

John F. Burris, (N. G. Cobb, of counsel,) for applicant. C. K. Royce, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action brought under section 509 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the recovery of certain personal property, consisting of the furniture of a lodging-house. The plaintiff, at the commencement of the action, filed the necessary affidavit and undertaking, and demanded the delivery of the property to him. The defendants are husband and wife, but they appeared separately in the action, and the husband made no defense. The wife, Mrs. O. Adair, filed an answer, claiming the property as her own, and gave a bond conditioned as required by law, whereupon the property was redelivered to her. At the trial she and her husband both failed to appear, and judgment was entered against them jointly for the return of the property, or its value, $2,500, and for costs. Subsequently, upon her motion, the judgment against her was set aside, and a new trial granted to her; but, apparently, the judgment as against her husband was allowed to stand. The case was thereafter tried upon the issues made by her answer to the complaint, and a second and separate judgment rendered against her for the return of the goods, or their value, fixed at $2,000, and for costs. From this judgment, and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, she has appealed to this court, giving the ordinary undertaking for $300, but no undertaking to stay proceedings. The plaintiff and respondent has caused execution to be issued, not upon the judgment appealed from, but upon the first judgment, entered, as above stated, against the appellant and her husband, and left to stand against him when set aside as to her. Under this execution the sheriff is threatening to take the property in controversy from the possession of a Mrs. Shaeffer, who claims it as a vendee of a party to whom it was sold and delivered by the appellant after its redelivery to her. Upon a verified petition showing these facts appellant now moves this court for a writ of superseas directing the sheriff to return said execution, and commanding a stay of all proceedings on said judgment pending the determination of her appeal. The case presents some anomalous features. There are two separate judgments in favor of the plaintiff for the return of the same goods, or their value, fixed in one judgment at $2,500, and in the other at $2,000; one judgment being against C. H. Adair, the husband, and the other being against the appellant, Mrs. O. Adair, his wife. Execution is issued on the judgment against the husband, and under it the sheriff is threatening to take the goods in controversy from the vendee of the wife, to whom they were sold after redelivery to her upon her giving the statutory undertaking. Code Civil Proc. § 514. In aid of her appeal from the judgment against her, and for the protection of her vendee, appellant asks us to stay proceedings upon the judgment against her husband, from which there has been no appeal. Several questions arise upon this state of facts, but we shall confine ourselves to a discussion of those which we deem essential in the disposition of the motion before us. It seems impossible that the sheriff could rightfully take the goods from appellant's vendee under an execution issued upon a separate judgment against C. H. Adair, between whom and said vendee there is no sort of privity; but whether we can, on this appeal, interfere with the proceedings on that judgment, is a question not free from difficulty, and one which we do not care to decide unless it is clear that the appellant is entitled to a stay of proceedings on the judgment from which she has appealed. Is she, then, entitled to such a stay without having given a stay-bond? It is contended that in this respect the action of replevin differs from other actions, and that the defendant, having given the redelivery bond prescribed by section 514 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is entitled to retain the property until the final determination of the case on appeal without other security. In support of this proposition we are referred to the language of said section to section 1247 of Cobbey on Replevin, and to Bank v. Blye, 102 N. Y. 305, 7 N. E. Rep 49; but we find nothing in either of the citations to support the contention of appellant. The language of section 514 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not at all inconsistent with the proposition that a judgment for plaintiff, in an action for the recovery of personal property, is immediately enforceable by a return of the property in specie, unless the defendant gives an additional bond to stay proceedings pending his appeal. On the other hand, section 943 of the Code of Civil Procedure expressly provides that "if the judgment appealed from direct the delivery of * * * personal property, the execution of the judgment cannot be stayed by appeal unless the things directed to be delivered be placed in the custody of such officer or receiver as the court may appoint, or unless an undertaking be entered into on the part of the appellant * * * to the effect that the appellant will obey the order of the appellate court upon the appeal." For these reasons we think the appellant is not entitled to an order of this court for a stay of proceedings on the judgment from which she has appealed. In other words, we consider that we can grant such relief on the mere motion of an appellant, and as an incident of our appellate jurisdiction, in these cases only where the appeal has been so taken and perfected as to operate a stay according to the provisions of the statute. There are, of course, other grounds besides the taking of an appeal for staying execution of a judgment, and several other grounds are presented in this motion. But these, we think, should be presented in the superior court by some proper motion or proceeding there, and brought here, if at all, by appeal from the orders of the superior court. It is contended, for instance, that the redelivery bond given by the appellant extinguished plaintiff's property in the goods, and that it is a bar to a judgment for their return in specie. It is further alleged that suit has been commenced against the sureties on that bond, and that this estops the plaintiff from reclaiming the goods. It is contended that the judgment against C. H. Adair is no longer in force, being necessarily set aside by the order vacating it as to the appellant. But, whatever merit there may be in these propositions, we do not think they can be made the ground of an original motion in this court. The motion of the appellant for a writ of supersedeas is denied, and the order heretofore made for a temporary stay of proceedings is hereby vacated and annulled.

GRIMSHAW v. BELCHER et al. (No. 14,078.)

LICENSE—REVOCATION.

A license under which the licensee has constructed a levee on the licensor's land cannot be revoked, where the revocation would cause great and irreparable injury to the licensee's land; and a court of equity, on the ground of equitable estoppel, will enjoin the licensor from subsequently tearing down the levee.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

J. C. Tubbs and A. L. Hart, for appellants. C. S. Denson and C. H. Outman, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The findings of the court below show that the plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land situate on the bank of the Cosumnes river, and adjoining it is another tract, owned in common by the defendants Alice J. and Lucy E. Belcher, and the estate of J. M. Belcher, of which the defendant Sarah W. Belcher is the executrix; that to protect both of said tracts from overflow it is necessary to maintain a levee in front of both tracts; that just above the line dividing said lands, and on the land of the defendants, there is a depression, which renders it necessary that the levee there should be of greater height and strength than at other points. The plaintiff had completed her line of levee, and the defendants were engaged in the repair of their levee, the line of which connected with that of plaintiff, and, "it being feared that the floods would come and inundate the lands to be protected by said levee before the same could be finished, the plaintiff applied to the defendants for leave to enter upon their said land, and enlarge and repair that portion of the levee upon defendant's said land which extends across the said depression." The defendants consented, and gave permission to the plaintiff to repair, enlarge, and reconstruct the said section of levee at her own cost and expense. This the plaintiff did, the same being constructed mostly of earth hauled from the plaintiff's own land, and thus connected her own levee with that of the defendants, forming a continuous barrier against the waters of the river. The court further found that the defendants threatened and intended to tear down, remove, and dig away a portion of the said levee, and if they should do so it would subject the land of plaintiff to overflow, and would cause great and irreparable damage to her land. The court below gave judgment enjoining the defendants from doing the threatened acts. From this judgment, and an order denying their motion for a new trial, the defendants appeal.

The permission given plaintiff to construct the section of levee referred to in the findings was verbal. The appellants urge that the license, if ever given, is one which they have a right to revoke; that a license is always revocable when the act licensed is of such a nature that, if granted by deed, it would amount to an easement. To sustain this position the case of Potter v. Mercer, 53 Cal. 667, is cited, in which case it is said: "But the effect of an executed or partly executed license, though revoked, is to excuse the licensee from liability for acts done properly in pursuance thereof, and their consequences; but the revocation puts an end to the license, and no further act can be justified under it." This is undoubtedly true as a general rule, and was properly applied to the facts in that case. But the judgment in this case does not authorize the plaintiff to do any further act upon the land of appellants. It only restrains the appellants from removing or injuring a levee built by respondent at her own cost upon the land of appellants, and with their permission, such levee so constructed being necessary in order to protect the land of respondent from overflow and irreparable damage. Such a judgment does not, as supposed by appellants, confer upon "the respondent a permanent right in the property" of appellants. It gives her no right to enter upon the land of appellants for the purpose of repairing the levee, or to rebuild it in the event of its destruction. The distinction between the right of respondent, as fixed by this judgment, and a permanent right to maintain the levee in question, is clearly pointed out in the case of Carleton v. Redington, 21 N. H. 307. It is there said: "The authorities would seem to show that a license to erect a dam will give no right to repair and restore the dam when it has become ruinous and decayed. * * * But if it be holden that a license to erect a dam implies also a license to repair the same at pleasure, it would seem, from many authorities, that the license cannot be sustained." As to the right of the respondent to maintain this action upon the facts found by the court, there is a conflict in the decisions in the different states, many courts holding to the contrary. There are cases, however, which hold that such an action is maintainable, and we think these state the rule which is most in consonance with principles of equity. In Veghte v. Water-Power Co., 19 N. J. Eq. 142, the court say that "in cases where the revocation would be a fraud, courts of equity give a remedy, either by restraining the revocation, or by construing the license as an agreement to give the right, and compelling specific performance by deed, as of a contract in part executed." In the case of Clark v. Glidden, 60 Vt. 702, 15 Atl. Rep. 358, it is held that "a license to lay an aqueduct to a spring of water on one's land is irrevocable during the existence of the aqueduct; and a court of equity, on the ground of equitable estoppel, will protect the licensee in the use of the aqueduct, and will grant and continue an injunction restraining the owner of the spring from interfering with the aqueduct until its decay; for a revocation of the license would operate as a fraud." And this same principle has been affirmed in the case of Lee v. McLeod, 12 Nev. 284. Appellants further insist that the findings are not sustained by the evidence, but we cannot say from the record that the court committed any error in this respect. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment, but I base my concurrence upon the particular facts of this case. A rule which applies to two coterminal owners of land, who unite in a continuous line of levee for the protection of both, would not apply to many other instances of parol license.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the judgment.

WILSON v. MORIARITY. (No. 13,921.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—REFORMATION OF LEASE—MISTAKE—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by the lessor to reform a lease for 10 years the evidence showed that plaintiff was unable to read or write, while defendant was a shrewd business man, on terms of friendship with plaintiff and her husband; that defendant drew the lease himself, but did not read it to plaintiff, though it was read to her by the notary before acknowledgment. Several witnesses testified that defendant has sent them to plaintiff to negotiate the lease, but she refused to make it for more than five years. Defendant testified, but was contradicted by plaintiff's husband, that he drew the lease under an agreement with him, and that he promised to notify plaintiff. Plaintiff testified that she intended to make a lease for five years only, and had refused to make it for a longer time. Held, that the lease should be reformed so as to run for five years.

3. Though the complaint alleged the weakness of plaintiff's mind, and inadequacy of consideration, it was only necessary to show the mistake of plaintiff, and that defendant knew of it, since

Civil Code Cal. § 3399, provides for reformation of a contract made through the mistake of one party, which the other party at the time of execution knew or suspected.

8. Under such section a suit to reform a contract cannot be defended on the ground that the mistaken party was negligent in not reading the contract, if it appears that the other party at the time of its execution knew of the mistake.

4. In an action by a landlord to reform a lease, the court's action, after reforming the lease, in dismissing the complaint in so far as it asked additional rent on account of improvements under an agreement subsequent to the lease, is not reversible error.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Stephen M. White and R. H. F. Variol, for appellant. Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson and Smith, Winder & Smith, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action to rescind a written lease by plaintiff to defendant of a house and lot thereon in the city of Los Angeles, on the ground of alleged fraud on the part of the defendant in procuring the lease; or, if a rescission thereof cannot be had, that the lease be reformed on the ground of alleged mistakes of the plaintiff, which the defendant knew at the time the lease was executed. The court denied a rescission of the lease, but reformed it. From the judgment reforming the lease, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant brings this appeal.

The lease, as executed, was for the term of 10 years, at a rental of $150 per month, with the privilege of a renewal for another term of 10 years at the same rent. As reformed, the lease is for the term of only five years, and without the privilege of renewal for any term. The ultimate facts upon which the revision of the lease was based are expressed in the sixth finding of the court, as follows: "That, when plaintiff executed said lease, she did not understand said lease to be a lease for ten years, with the privilege of ten years more, but she understood said lease to be for a single term of five years. And the defendant then and there, at the time of the execution of said lease by plaintiff, well knew that the plaintiff did not understand the same to be for ten years, with privilege of renewal, and well knew that she understood the same to be for a single term of five years; and the defendant fraudulently induced the plaintiff to so understand said instrument, and to execute the same under such misunderstanding." These facts, if justified by the evidence, undoubtedly support the judgment. Section 3399 of the Civil Code provides that "when, through * * * a mistake of one party, which the other, at the time, knew or suspected, a written contract does not truly express the intention of the parties, it may be revised on the application of a party aggrieved, so as to express that intention, so far as it can be done, without prejudice to rights acquired by third persons in good faith and for value." But counsel for appellant contend that the finding of the facts above quoted is not justified by the evidence.

The court found as evidentiary facts, which are not disputed, that the plaintiff is unable to read or write; that the defendant is a shrewd merchant and business man of plausible manners, and was on terms of friendship with the plaintiff and her husband, John Wilson; that the defendant drew the lease; and that the lease was not read to or by the husband, or read to the plaintiff, except by the notary at the time she acknowledged it. The testimony of the plaintiff and her husband was to the effect that during three or four months before the execution of the lease the defendant had been importuning them for a lease of the property for a term of five years. That plaintiff was unwilling to lease the property for a longer term than two years. That the defendant finally persuaded the husband to advise the plaintiff to execute a lease for the term of five years, which he did, on the ground that the defendant would be a good tenant, with whom they would have no trouble in collecting rent. Thereupon the plaintiff consented to the term of five years. That after the defendant drew up the lease he met the plaintiff on the street near her husband's blacksmith shop, and requested her to go with him to the notary's office and acknowledge it, and her husband then told her to do so, but did not accompany them. When they arrived at the notary's office the defendant offered to read the lease to her, saying it was in his handwriting; but the notary said the law made it his duty to read the instrument to her, as she was a married woman, and he did then read it to her; but, believing that the defendant had drawn the lease according to the agreement, and that she already knew that it was a lease for the term of five years only, she did not give sufficient attention to the reading by the notary to discover, and did not discover that it was a lease for ten years, or that it differed from the lease theretofore agreed upon; and that, when she acknowledged the execution, she understood and believed it to be a lease for the term of only five years, without any privilege of renewal. Thomas Leahy testified that about two years before the trial the defendant requested him to go to John Wilson and try to get a lease of the property to defendant for the term of five years; that witness went to Wilson, and tried to persuade him to give the lease for five years, but Wilson said: "No, I will not give it for five years; I will give it for three." Witness reported Wilson's answer to defendant. Michael Leahy testified that he "went, at Moriarity's request, to Mr. Wilson, to see if he could get a lease for ten years, and Mr. Wilson said he would not give it for so long. I took that answer back to him." H. Boettcher testified that in March, 1887, the rental value of the property, as leased to defendant, was $250 per month. G. F. Conant testified that he had been a collector of rents for about six years, and knew the rental value of the property, and that the rental value of the building in March, 1887, "would be something like $350. After the building was remodeled and put in shape as it is now, the store-room would have brought about $200 per month at least. I don't know how many rooms there are in the two upper floors, but they would have brought from $8 to $10 a room, taken as a whole." (It is stipulated that there are 21 rooms on the two upper floors.) There is no other evidence as to the rental value of the property than that of these two witnesses. This testimony as to the rental value of the property is cited and considered relevant for no other purpose than so far as it may tend to show defendant's motive for desiring a long term at the rent reserved in the lease. The defendant testified that he had never represented to plaintiff or to her husband that the lease drawn by him was for the term of five years, but that he drew the lease according to an understanding or agreement had with the husband, which the husband was to advise the plaintiff to accept; but he does not testify that the plaintiff ever agreed to a term of ten years, or that she was ever informed that the lease drawn by him was for a term of ten years, unless she understood the reading thereof by the notary. Nor does he testify that the husband ever read or saw the lease drawn by him, or that he ever informed the husband that it was for a term of ten years, but merely that he drew the lease according to a previous agreement with the husband, which agreement the husband, in his testimony, denies. Under the settled rule of this court as to conflicting evidence in cases of this kind, I think the finding as to plaintiff's mistake should not be disturbed. The mistake being established, I think the circumstances tend to prove that the defendant "knew or suspected" it; and that the finding to this effect should also be sustained. The alleged fact that the defendant knew or suspected the plaintiff's mistake was not susceptible of direct proof, except by the testimony of the defendant; and it may be of some significance that defendant failed to testify, on his own behalf, that he did not know or suspect the alleged mistake at the time of the execution of the lease.

2. Counsel for appellant contend that it is essential to the support of the judgment that the averments of the complaint to the effect that the plaintiff was of weak mind, that the consideration was inadequate, and that the defendant fraudulently concealed from the plaintiff a material part of the contents of the lease, or prevented her from understanding it, should have been proved and found. The only fraud necessary to sustain the judgment is such as may be inferred from the failure of the defendant to correct the mistake of the plaintiff known to or suspected by the former at the time of the execution of the lease. This is all that is required by section 3399 of the Civil Code. Higgins v. Parsons, 65 Cal. 280, 3 Pac. Rep. 881; Cleghorn v. Zumwalt, 83 Cal. 156, 23 Pac. Rep. 294. There is nothing inconsistent with this in the law of the case as laid down on the former appeal. 77 Cal. 596, 20 Pac. Rep. 134. That appeal was from a judgment for defendant on demurrer to the original complaint, which prayed for only a rescission of the lease; and it was merely decided that the complaint was sufficient. After the cause was remitted the plaintiff amended her prayer by asking the alternative relief of revision of the lease, in case a rescission should be denied. The complaint contains several averments not essential to this alternative relief, and, among them, inadequacy of consideration, and weak-mindedness of the plaintiff. If plaintiff only intended to lease her property for a term of 5 years, instead of 20 years, and the defendant knew or suspected her true intention, it is quite immaterial, for the purpose of merely reforming the lease on the ground of mistake, that the plaintiff was not weak-minded, and that the monthly rent reserved was an adequate consideration for a lease of 20 years. Higgins v. Parsons and Cleghorn v. Zumwalt, supra. For the purpose of testing the sufficiency of the findings the case should be regarded simply as a case to reform the lease under section 3399 of the Civil Code, on the ground of a mistake of the plaintiff, known or suspected by defendant. In this view of it, all the objections on the ground of insufficiency of the findings not heretofore considered appear to be irrelevant.

3. Appellant's counsel contend that "the Code provision (section 3399, Civil Code) was not framed to benefit the indifferent, or those who are grossly careless, and must be construed as requiring the exercise of at least ordinary care;" and, therefore, that relief should be denied the plaintiff on the ground of her neglect to give such ordinary attention to the reading of the lease by the notary as would have enabled her to understand its contents. In support of this point the cases of Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 558, and Association v. Esche, 75 Cal. 513, 17 Pac. Rep. 675, are cited. Neither of these cases is in point. The former was an action to avoid a written contract on the ground that the plaintiff was induced to sign it by false representations of the defendants that "it was like the verbal agreement" which preceded it, and which it was intended to replace, the defendants knowing that the written contract was not like the verbal agreement; and the plaintiff, believing such representation of defendants to be true, signed the written contract without reading it, although he had full opportunity to do so. The lower court sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and this was affirmed on appeal. The complaint made neither a case of mutual mistake, nor a case of mistake of one party which the other knew or suspected. The defendants were not mistaken, and it was not alleged that they knew or suspected any mistake on the part of the plaintiff. The object of the action was to annul a contract simply on the ground of such actual fraud as induced a mistake on the part of the plaintiff, which the defendants were not alleged to have known or suspected. So, in the latter case, when the defendants by cross-complaint sought to reform the bond on which the suit was brought, on the ground of mutual mistake of the parties, it was found that there was no mistake on the part of the plaintiff; neither was there any averment, finding, or pretense that the plaintiff knew or suspect-

4. As another distinct cause of action the plaintiff alleged that some time after the execution of the written lease, and while she was still ignorant that it was a lease for ten years, instead of five years, she was induced by defendant to add an additional story to the leased house, and to make other improvements, at a cost of $13,200, in addition to the improvements required by the lease; that defendant verbally promised to pay a reasonable rent for such improvements, in addition to rent reserved by the lease; and that, when these improvements were completed, on or about January 5, 1888, the plaintiff endeavored to agree with defendant as to the increase of rent on account of said improvements, but defendant refused to agree upon or to pay any additional rent for said improvements, although the rental value of the property was thereby increased $150 per month. The prayer as to this cause of action is that the lease "be so amended and reformed as to carry out the subsequent agreement with reference to the additional improvements put upon the premises, and to provide that the amount of monthly rental shall be increased so as to include a reasonable rental on account of said improvements, to-wit, the sum of $150 per month." The defendant denied that he induced the plaintiff to make these additional improvements, or that he promised to pay any additional rent therefor. The court expressly declined to find upon the issues of fact as to these improvements, "for the reason that this court considers and adjudges the same to be immaterial, and not proper matter for adjudication in this case;" and, as a conclusion of law, further said: "The court does not decide whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant any additional rental for additional improvements made upon said premises by the plaintiff after the execution of said lease described in the complaint, and the court decides this case without prejudice to the rights of either plaintiff or defendant in the matter of said additional improvements." Counsel for appellant insist that the court erred in thus disposing of that branch of the case relating to the additional improvements. It will be observed that this branch of the case has no connection with the lease, or with the cause of action to reform the lease, as it is founded upon an alleged subsequent verbal agreement to pay reasonable rent for improvements additional to those required by the written lease, and not upon any agreement or promise to reform or alter the written lease. Nor does the judgment reforming the written lease in any degree depend upon the alleged subsequent agreement as to additional improvements and rent therefor, nor upon any fact alleged or denied in relation thereto. Therefore it would not be necessary or proper to reverse the judgment reforming the written lease for any error (conceding there was error) in disposing of the distinct cause of action resting solely upon the alleged subsequent agreement. It would seem that the effect of the action of the court was a dismissal of the alleged cause of action based on the subsequent agreement, without prejudice to the rights of either party, for the reason that the court considered "the same to be immaterial, and not proper matter for adjudication in this case." It is not quite clear why the court so considered it. It may have been because it was thought to be improperly joined with the other cause of action, or, possibly, because the facts stated did not constitute a cause of action. If so, the court should have sustained defendants' demurrer on one of these grounds. But no point is made here on the overruling of the demurrer. If the plaintiff was entitled to any relief upon the alleged subsequent contract, it is clear that she was not entitled to the specific relief prayed for, viz., that the written lease "be so amended and reformed as to carry out the subsequent agreement with reference to the additional improvements;" for surely the lease could not have been amended or reformed by incorporating into it a distinct subsequent agreement. But, whatever may have been the ground upon which the court based its action in substantially dismissing this branch of the case without prejudice to the parties, and whether or not it erred in so doing, I think that it appears that the defendant was not thereby injured. I therefore think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

FIRE INSURANCE—ACTIONS ON POLICY—PROOF OF LOSS—WAIVER.

1. In an action on an insurance policy, where there is an allegation that plaintiffs performed all the conditions of the contract, defendant cannot object that the complaint does not allege that there was a notice of loss as required by the policy.

2. Where an insurance company accepts the premium after notice of loss, it cannot, in an action on the policy, complain that plaintiffs did not give them the notice of the loss required by the policy.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

T. C. Van Ness, for appellant. Gray & Haven, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs against the defendant, for the sum of $2,000, and legal interest thereon from December 8, 1885, and costs. The appeal is upon the judgment roll alone. The contention of the appellant is that the judgment should be reversed, upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it appears therefrom that notice of the loss sustained by plaintiffs was not given forthwith, as required by the terms of the policy of insurance upon which plaintiffs seek to recover. The complaint alleges that the building insured was destroyed by fire on July 25, 1885, and that upon October 8, 1885, the plaintiff gave to defendant due notice and proof of such fire and loss. The appellant insists that, as the notice was not given forthwith, the defendant is not liable; but there is also an allegation in the complaint "that the plaintiffs duly performed all the conditions of the said contract of insurance on their part," and in giving notice of the fire and loss forthwith was a condition of said policy to be performed by plaintiffs, then the complaint, in this general statement, alleges the due and timely performance of this condition. Ferrer v. Insurance Co., 47 Cal. 416. If the other allegation, as to the exact date when such notice was given, is inconsistent with the general statement just quoted, then the most that can be said is that the complaint in that respect might be considered as ambiguous; but no such objection was pointed out in the demurrer which the appellant filed. But a conclusive answer to the position assumed by appellant is this: The complaint alleges that the appellant did have notice of the loss within five days after it occurred, and with full knowledge of said fire demanded and received from respondents the premium of $50 due upon the policy sued upon, a credit therefor having been previously given by the appellant. Under these circumstances the appellant cannot be heard to say that the contract of insurance was not in full force on that day, and as it then knew of the fire and the loss of respondents nothing further was required of respondents in the way of giving notice, except to furnish, within a reasonable time thereafter, the preliminary proofs as to the particulars of the loss, and the complaint shows that this was done, even if not furnished before October 25, 1885. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. TRAVERS. (No. 20,750.)

HOMICIDE—GRAND JURY—CHALLENGES—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

1. A discharged grand jury cannot be summoned into court on trial of an indictment, and challenged and examined on their voir dire, on the ground that defendant was not called to answer before them when the indictment was found, and given an opportunity to challenge them.

2. In such case defendant has a remedy under Pen. Code Cal. § 995, which provides that an indictment may be set aside, when defendant was not called to answer when it was found, "on any ground which would have been good ground for challenge;" but the fact that he had ground for challenge must be shown either by examination of the jurors as witnesses or by other competent evidence.

3. On indictment for murder it is error to charge that the jury must not consider the fact that innocent men have been convicted of crime in determining the guilt or innocence of defendants. GAROUTTE, J., dissenting.

4. On indictment for murder the court charged the jury: "During the argument your attention has been called to cases in which it was claimed that juries had improperly convicted the defendants. While it is true that innocent persons have been convicted in the past, there is no proof in this case of any such fact, and you are not justified in considering such matters. * * * The guilt or innocence of this defendant must be determined from the evidence admitted in the case, and not from sympathy or prejudice. If all criminals must go free because there is a possibility of jurors making mistakes, society might as well disband." Held, that the instruction was objectionable because of its apparent hostility to defendant, and because it usurped the functions of the jury as the sole judges of the weight of the evidence. GAROUTTE, J., dissenting.

5. On indictment for murder the burden of showing insanity, relied on as a defense, is on defendant.

6. To constitute insanity caused by intoxication a defense to an indictment for murder it must be settled insanity, and not a mere temporary mental condition.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Thos. S. Ford, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The appellant was convicted of murder, and appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll and a short bill of exceptions, which shows certain proceedings had on a motion to set aside the indictment.

1. Appellant, upon his arraignment, moved to set aside the indictment upon the ground that he had not been held to answer when the grand jury which indicted him was in session, and that the grand jurors were prejudiced against him, and had unqualified opinions that he was guilty. He introduced on the motion an affidavit made by the county clerk, and one made by himself, which showed that he had not been held to answer when he was indicted, and had no opportunity to challenge the grand jury. No other evidence was introduced. The bill of exceptions states that "defendant then offered to leave the challenge to the said grand jurors who indicted him to prove the challenge good, and moved the court for reasonable time and opportunity to examine each juror on his voir dire in support of said challenge. The court overruled said motion and challenge, and defendant excepted." The first part of the language above quoted is obscure. It probably was intended to state that defendant moved for leave to challenge the grand jurors, and thus "prove the challenge good." At all events, the idea of appellant seems to have been that he had the right to have the discharged grand jurors reassembled in court, and to proceed to challenge them formally, and to examine them on their voir dire, just as he might have done before the indictment was found. But this is evidently a mistaken notion of the law. A challenge to a grand juror is a preliminary objection to the qualification of the juror, and its purpose is to prohibit the juror from sitting and inquiring into the charge against the party interposing the challenge; and, if the challenge be allowed, the juror "cannot be present or take part in the consideration of the charge against the defendant who interposed the challenge, or the deliberation of the grand jury thereon." Pen. Code, § 900. It is clear that, after a grand jury has completed its work and been discharged, the conditions which make a challenge possible no longer exist. But a defendant who has been indicted without an opportunity to challenge the grand jury is not without remedy. Section 995 of the Penal Code provides that an indictment may be set aside, "when the defendant has not been held to answer before the finding of the indictment, on any ground which would have been good ground for challenge, either to the panel or to any individual grand juror." This language clearly contemplates that the time for challenges has passed, and provides that a defendant may still prove any fact which "would have been good ground for challenge" if he had had an opportunity to interpose it at a time when a challenge was possible. But the fact which would have been good ground for challenge must be proved in the ordinary way in which other facts are proven,—by the introduction of evidence,—either by the examination of the jurors, or by other competent evidence. For this purpose, of course, defendant is entitled to the process of subpoena to compel the attendance of his witnesses; but there is no process by which discharged grand jurors can be reassembled in their official character, and subjected to the original process of challenging. For the purpose of producing his evidence a defendant would, no doubt, upon a proper showing, be entitled to a continuance; but in the case at bar there is no such showing. The appellant did not make any affidavit of merits or diligence; nor did he, by affidavit or otherwise, show that he could produce a single item of evidence tending to show the disqualification of any grand juror. Indeed, he did not make a regular motion for continuance, but seemed to rely upon the supposed right to have the court reassemble the jury. In People v. Beatty, 14 Cal. 567, relied on by appellant on this point, the only question was whether a grand jury could indict at all for a crime committed during their session, and after they had been impaneled; and the remark of the justice who delivered the opinion about the right of challenge upon arraignment was evidently mere dictum used in the progress of his reasoning, and was not intended as the grave determination of a question not before him. There is nothing in the other two cases cited (People v. Turner, 30 Cal. 376; and People v. Geiger, 49 Cal. 650) which determines anything adversely to the views above stated. We therefore think that the court below did not commit any error in the matter of the motion to set aside the indictment.

2. The other points made by appellant relate to instructions to the jury, and the first one objected to is as follows: "(4) During the argument of this case your attention has been called to a number of cases in which it was claimed that juries had improperly convicted the defendants. While it is true that innocent persons have been convicted in the past, there is no proof in this case of any such fact; and you are not justified in considering such matters in determining the guilt or innocence of this defendant. The guilt or innocence of this defendant must be determined from the evidence admitted in the case, and not from sympathy or prejudice. If all criminals must go free because there is a possibility of jurors making mistakes, society might as well disband." This instruction was clearly erroneous. In the first place, it is objectionable—although, perhaps, not fatally so—on account of its apparent hostility to the defendant. The jury would be very apt to get the impression from it that the court considered the defendant as one of the "criminals" alluded to, and feared that the jury would fail to convict him on account of "sympathy or prejudice." In the second place, it is objectionable as an argument in favor of the prosecution on the weight of evidence, and thus was an invasion of the province of the jury; for "to weigh the evidence and find the facts is in this state the exclusive province of the jury, and with the performance of that duty the judge cannot interfere without a palpable violation of the organic law." People v. Dick, 34 Cal. 666; People v. Fong Ching, 78 Cal. 173, 20 Pac. Rep. 396. In the third place, if it can be considered as a direction about law, and not an argument about facts, it is still clearly erroneous. It was probably founded on People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 191; but the instruction which was approved in that case, although itself somewhat extreme, was far different from the one given in the case at bar. In the Cronin case the court, in its instruction on this point, after stating the fact that counsel for defendant had—as in the case at bar—alluded to cases where, upon circumstantial evidence, innocent men had been convicted, told the jury, among other things, that "the quotation of such cases is proper in order to make the jury careful in arriving at a proper conclusion from such (circumstantial) evidence." But in the case at bar the court told the jury, "You are not justified in considering such matters." But the jury had the right to consider that innocent men had been convicted; for the difference in the weight of evidence required in civil and criminal cases, and the doctrine of reasonable doubt itself, are founded upon the danger of destroying life or liberty upon evidence that does not produce thorough conviction, and that danger is based, in great part, upon human experience. The court seemed to think that the fact of former unjust convictions could not be considered because "there is no proof in this case of any such fact;" but that such cases have occurred is a matter of common knowledge, which the court itself admitted when it said, "It is true that innocent persons have been convicted in the past." If the court had simply told the jury that, if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, by the evidence before them, that the defendant was guilty, they should not be deterred from so finding merely because there had been some innocent man convicted, the instruction might not have been objectionable; but to tell them that in coming to their conclusion they should not consider the danger of convicting an innocent man was clearly erroneous. And it certainly does not appear that the whole instruction was not prejudicial to appellant. We think, therefore, that for the giving of this instruction the judgment should be reversed. (It may be remarked that the propriety of counsel reading to a jury from law books is not here involved. It does not appear whether that was done, or whether counsel merely alluded to the subject orally; but if there was such reading it occurred without objection.) As the case must be retried it is necessary to notice one or two other matters.

3. In the instructions given upon the subject of insanity there was no error prejudicial to appellant. They are somewhat voluminous; but the main proposition contained in them was that a person is presumed to be sane until the contrary is shown, and that the burden is on a defendant of showing insanity by a preponderance of evidence. This rule has been established in this state by a long line of authorities. People v. Meyers, 20 Cal. 518; People v. Coffman, 24 Cal. 237; People v. McDonell, 47 Cal. 134; People v. Wilson, 49 Cal. 13; People v. Messersmith, 61 Cal. 246; People v. Hamilton, 62 Cal. 377; People v. Kernaghan, 72 Cal. 609, 14 Pac. Rep. 566; People v. Eubanks, (Cal.) 24 Pac. Rep. 1014. And this long line of decisions cannot be held to have been overruled by People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. Rep. 127, 549, where the defense was accident; and People v. Elliott, 80 Cal. 296, 22 Pac. Rep. 207, where the defense was self-defense. In those cases the court was dealing entirely with those "circumstances" referred to in section 1105 of the Penal Code, which mitigate or justify or excuse an act done by a sane man who might commit a crime; and its attention was not called in any way to that unusual and peculiar mental condition called "insanity," which renders a man utterly incapable of committing crime at all. In the opinion of the court in People v. Bushton reference is made to People v. Smith, 59 Cal. 607, and People v. Flanagan, 60 Cal. 3, in which the very doctrine of the Bushton case was stated; but in those cases—where the defenses were self-defense and defense of property—the court certainly did not intend to overthrow the settled rule of the court on the subject of insanity. We are clear, therefore, that the undisturbed law of this state still is that the burden of showing insanity is upon a defendant who seeks shelter under it as a defense. In an instruction asked by defendant and given, there occur these words: "Or, if you have a reasonable doubt as to his sanity, you cannot convict him of any degree of crime, but should acquit him." This, of course, is conflicting with the other instructions on the subject of insanity; but, as it was favorable to defendant, the conflict would not, of itself, be good for reversal. At another trial this conflict can be avoided.

4. We see no error in the instructions given on the subject of intoxication. As to the instructions asked by appellant on the subject of delirium tremens, etc., it is sufficient to say that settled insanity produced by a long-continued intoxication, affects responsibility in the same way as insanity produced by any other cause. But it must be "settled insanity," and not merely a temporary mental condition produced by recent use of intoxicating liquor. And an instruction to that effect should be given on another trial, if asked, provided there be evidence to which such an instruction would apply. There are no other points necessary to be noticed. It may be remarked, in conclusion, that in nearly every instance where this court has solved a doubtful proposition in favor of the affirmance of the judgment, the decision has been made the basis and pretext for further excursions in the same direction into the realm of unquestionable error. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; DE HAVEN, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; HARRISON, J.

GAROUTTE, J., (dissenting.) The practical administration of justice should not be defeated by a too rigid adherence to a close and technical analysis of the instructions of the court; and, conceding this instruction to be obnoxious to criticism, (of which fact I have some doubt) yet its weaknesses form too slight a basis for a reversal of the judgment in this case. I do not believe that the fact of innocent men having been convicted in the past was a matter to be considered by the jury in making up their minds as to the guilt or innocence of this defendant. Such fact could not add or take away one jot from the weight to be given every piece of evidence in the case. It was the duty of the jury to be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt from all the evidence in the case of the guilt of the defendant before they could convict, and the fact of innocent men having been convicted in the past should not and could not have impregnated itself into the question of reasonable doubt in any way. The jurors in this case, under their oaths, were bound to try this defendant in the same manner, under the same rules of law, and give him the full benefit of all the shields with which the law surrounds every defendant, whether as a matter of fact no innocent man ever had been convicted in the past, or whether such convictions by our courts of justice were an ordinary occurrence. I see nothing in the instruction to indicate hostility towards the defendant. The words "sympathy" and "prejudice," as used, applied equally as strongly in his favor as against him. If all "defendants" must go free I consider a more appropriate expression than if all "criminals" must go free; yet I do not think a jury would get the impression, and am sure that it ought not to get the impression, that by the use of the word "criminals," as used in the instruction, the court intended to refer to the defendant as one of that class. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

DEAN v. PARKER et al. (No. 13,338.)

COMMUNITY PROPERTY—ESTOPPEL—DEEDS—DELIVERY—EVIDENCE.

1. The statement by the husband in his petition for letters of administration on his deceased wife's estate, that certain land was her separate estate, does not estop the grantee of the husband from claiming that it was community property, in an action against the purchaser thereof as part of the wife's estate.

2. Delivery of a deed cannot be disproved by the testimony of a third person, with whom the grantor left it, that if he had afterwards called for it he would have given it to him, since it does not tend to show the grantor's intention.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; E. M. Gibson, Judge.

F. B. Ogden, for appellant. C. G. Dodge and J. A. Johnson, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. Action to determine conflicting claims to certain real property. In the court below the judgment was in favor of defendants, and from this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appeals. The findings of the court show that the land in controversy was originally conveyed to the mother of the plaintiff,—that is, she was named as grantee in the deed conveying it,—but that the property was paid for with the community funds and property of the mother and her husband, who was the father of plaintiff. The mother, Mary Dean, died January 26, 1877, leaving surviving her her said husband and three children. On October 3d following the father died, but prior to his death, he, on the 5th day of February, 1877, filed in the proper probate court a petition signed by him, praying for letters of administration on the estate of his deceased wife, in which it was stated that the land in controversy was her separate property. The findings further show that this same property was afterwards, in 1882, in the matter of the estate of said Mary Dean, sold to one Thomas O'Donnel, which sale was confirmed by the court, and said O'Donnel conveyed to defendants. The court also found: "That before the death of said John Dean, he, (the said John Dean,) on the 14th day of May, 1877, made and executed a deed of said property described in the complaint to James P. Dean, the plaintiff herein, for a consideration of one dollar, but that said deed was never delivered, no consideration was ever paid by the grantee therein named, the said deed was never recorded, and the defendants herein never were aware of or had any notice of the existence of said deed until after their purchase of the property in dispute in this action; nor did the said John Dean have or own any interest in said property at the time he executed said deed, or at any time thereafter, by reason of said action in filing said petition." As a conclusion of law the court found "that the said act of John Dean in filing said petition, setting forth therein that the said property was his wife's separate property, and causing the same to be sold thereunder, forever estopped said John Dean, his heirs or successors, from claiming the same, and has the effect (even if it were community property) of making it the separate property of Mary Dean; that plaintiff neither has nor owns any right, title, or interest of any nature whatsoever in or to said property, but that the absolute title in fee thereto, and ownership thereof, is in the defendants."

1. If the latter part of what is termed the "conclusions of law" should be considered rather as the finding of an ultimate fact, the sufficiency of the evidence to justify it cannot be considered on this appeal, as there is no exception to it for this cause, or specification wherein the evidence fails to sustain it. But we think that, looking at the entire findings, this should be regarded simply as a conclusion, which the learned judge of the court below drew as one of law, from the specific findings of fact which preceded it, and that therefore we may review it, and if in law the conclusion is not properly drawn from such preceding facts, the error may be corrected.

2. It is apparent that the court, in its sixth finding, above set out, does not use the word "executed" in its strict legal sense, and the proper construction of that finding is that the deed referred to therein was signed, but not, in fact, delivered.

3. The facts found by the court do not support the judgment. The court finds in effect that the property in controversy was community property of the husband, John Dean, and his wife, Mary Dean, and that the husband survived the wife. This being so, upon the death of the wife the property belonged to the surviving husband, without administration, (Civil Code, § 1401,) and the estate of Mary Dean never had any title to or interest in this property to convey to any persons; and the facts alleged in the answer of defendants as matter of estoppel, and found by the court, are not such as to estop the plaintiff here from showing that the property in controversy was never the separate property of the said Mary Dean, under whom the defendants claim. The facts necessary to be shown, in order to call into exercise the principle of equitable estoppel, are stated by FIELD, C. J., in Biddle Bogge v. Mining Co., 14 Cal. 367, as follows: "First, that the party making the admission by his declarations or conduct was apprised of the true state of his own title; second, that he made the admission with the express intention to deceive, or with such carelessness or culpable negligence as to amount to constructive fraud; third, that the other party was not only destitute of all knowledge of the true state of the title, but of the means of acquiring such knowledge; and, fourth, that he relied directly upon such admission, and will be injured by allowing its truth to be disproved." In referring to this quotation the court in Smith v. Penny, 44 Cal. 166, says: "This specification of the facts which are essential to the operation of the estoppel was approved in Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 23, and in many other cases in this court, except that in some of the cases the third specification was modified in one particular, it not being deemed requisite that the other party should be shown to be destitute of all possible means of knowledge of the true state of the title, but only of convenient or ready means to that end." See, also, Bigelow, Estop. p. 437.

4. One of the questions to be determined was whether a certain deed, signed by the father of plaintiff and purporting to convey to plaintiff the land in controversy, was ever delivered, the evidence showing that it had been placed by the father in the custody of one Daniel O'Keefe, who was a witness upon the trial. While giving his testimony, the defendants put to O'Keefe this question: "Supposing the father had come in a year after he left the deed with you, or two or three weeks afterwards, and asked you for the deed again, would you have given it to him?" This question was objected to upon the grounds that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent. The objection was overruled, the plaintiff excepting to such ruling, and the witness answered, "Yes, sir." The objection to this question should have been sustained, as the evidence sought by it was clearly irrelevant. The matter to be determined was, what was the intention of plaintiff's father in leaving this deed with the witness? and for the purpose of arriving at this intention evidence of any declarations made or conversations had in relation to that subject by the said John Dean, at that or any subsequent time, would have been competent; but what the witness would have done if the deed had been afterwards called for can have no tendency to show whether the father did or did not intend in what he did to make a delivery of the deed for the benefit of his son.

5. The cause must be remanded for a new trial, and, as we cannot know that the evidence upon another trial, in relation to the delivery of the deed referred to, will be in all respects the same as appears in this record, we do not deem it proper to pass upon the question whether the sixth finding of the court is supported by the evidence. Whether there was a delivery for the benefit of the plaintiff is a question of fact to be determined by ascertaining the intention of the father in what he did, in signing it and leaving it with the witness O'Keefe. Any declaration made by him at the time of the alleged delivery, or at any subsequent time, as to his intention, is relevant to this inquiry. The evidence in this record, as to what he said during his last sickness in giving a reason for not making a will, is relevant. Judgment and order reversed.

Plaintiff, who had no fixed home, with his family went to an hotel, expecting to remain there as long as his wife's health permitted, and in consideration of the probable length of his stay he was furnished board and lodging at a large reduction from the regular rates. He did not put any of his valuables in charge of the hotel-keeper. Soon afterwards a fire occurred, without any negligence on the part of the hotel-keeper or his employee, in which plaintiff's personalty was destroyed, and he sued the hotel-keeper therefor. Held, that plaintiff and his family were boarders, as to whose property defendant is not liable as an innkeeper and an insurer, and hence plaintiff cannot recover.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county, W. H. CLARK, Judge.

This was an action against the Long Beach Development Company, as an innkeeper, to recover damages for property of H. Edwin Moore and his family destroyed by a fire in defendant's hotel. The fire was shown to have occurred without any negligence on defendant's part, and the court found that plaintiff and his family were not guests as to whom defendant occupied the relation of innkeeper, but that they were boarders of whose goods defendant was not an insurer. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

FOOTE, C. The respondent contends that the statement upon motion for a new trial, which appears in the transcript, cannot be looked into, for the reason that it is not identified as having been used upon the hearing of the motion. There is but one notice of appeal, and that is both as to the judgment and the order denying a new trial. The stipulation at the end of the transcript is to this effect: "It is hereby agreed that the foregoing transcript contains a full, true, and correct copy of all papers necessary and proper to be used on this appeal; that the appeal herein was duly perfected, and the requisite deposit in lieu of an undertaking was given within the time prescribed by law; that the foregoing is a full, true, and correct transcript of the record on appeal; and that the appeal herein may be heard thereon." If the word "appeal," as used in the stipulation, was intended to apply to both the order denying a new trial and the judgment, then it covers the statement of the case which appears in the transcript, which is in due form, and appears to have been settled by the judge, and filed on February 3, 1890. The order denying a new trial was made on the 17th of February, 1890. It is plain that the appeal was taken from both order and judgment, and the stipulation evidently refers to them both where the word "appeal" is used. Since the stipulation states that the "appeal herein may be heard" upon the record on appeal in the transcript, it is proper that the statement here, under all the facts appearing in the record, should be held as being one that can be looked into on the appeal from the order denying a new trial. The main argument for the reversal of the judgment and order, by the appellant, seems to be that the evidence is insufficient to show that the plaintiff was a boarder and not a guest of the innkeeper who was sued, and the former contends that, if a guest, he is entitled to recover, but not as a boarder. The case, as stated in the complaint, is that of an individual who goes to an inn, as a guest or transient traveler, and while he is there the inn burns down and he loses his baggage, containing wearing apparel, jewels, and other personal valuables, occasioned by the negligence of the defendant and his servants, and seeks to make the innkeeper responsible for the loss. The fire appears to have been purely accidental, and there is nothing to show that the goods lost were not under the control of the owner, kept in his rooms, or that they were ever in the manual possession of the innkeeper. Nor is it proved or found that the fire or loss occurred by any negligence of the defendant, its servants or agents. But the plaintiff contends that an innkeeper is an insurer of the goods of his guests placed in the inn, even as against loss by fire, as well as robbery and theft, and that, if they are lost or injured while there, by any of these agencies, that the innkeeper must make good the loss. It does not seem that any case as to such a loss by fire has been adjudicated by the appellate court of this state. But in Mateer v. Brown, 1 Cal. 221, and in Pinkerton v. Woodward, 33 Cal. 600, cases where the loss to the guest seems to have been occasioned by robbery, it was held that the innkeeper was an insurer of the property committed to his care against everything but the act of God or the public enemy, or the neglect or fraud of the owner of the property.

Conceding, therefore, without deciding, that the view urged by the appellant is the law of this state upon the matter in hand, the real question for determination here is whether the evidence shows the plaintiff to have been a guest or a boarder. Each case, as to this point, turns upon its special state of facts. There is no doubt in our minds, upon the facts here, that the plaintiff and his family were boarders whose time of remaining at their place of sojourn depended upon their own volition. They went to the inn to ascertain if it was a place where the health of the wife of the plaintiff would be benefited, with the determination to remain there indefinitely, perhaps for a very long time, if such should be the case; but with a view, if her health did not improve, to leave at any time. It was also shown that the plaintiff, before going there with his family, had made an arrangement for terms of entertainment at a great deal less than those for a transient traveler, and by the month, and they went prepared to stay, if they desired, for a considerable time, and to enjoy all the gayeties that might take place. They had no other place of residence, and for the time being this inn was to be such, subject, as to time of stay, to their volition, but at reduced rates of board by the month. It was evidently the hope and the expectation of the plaintiff and wife that her health would he benefited at this inn, which was a pleasure resort, its principal business season being that of the summer. And it is fair to presume that they thought it would benefit her, and went prepared to stay as permanent boarders, rather than transient travelers. These facts were known to the defendant, and with this idea in the minds of both the contracting parties, together with the fact that the plaintiff had just been boarding at another inn at another place and had left there some of his goods, such as he did not expect to need at the defendant's inn, and had no fixed home, and that he got reduced terms of board, and did not place his valuables in the care of the innkeeper, are very persuasive that it was the intention of all the parties that he should be a boarder, and not a mere transient traveler or guest, and for the time being a resident in the place where he was intending to board. Under these facts and others appearing in the record, we cannot say that the findings of the court below are not sufficiently supported by the evidence. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

FOREMAN et al. v. BOYLE et al. (No. 18,764.)

JOINDER OF ACTIONS—INJURIES TO WATER-RIGHTS.

The proprietors of two different tracts of land, who each own a separate irrigating ditch by means of which the waters of a creek, in different amounts, are conveyed to their land, cannot unite in an action for damages against one who, at a point above their lands, has wrongfully diverted the waters of the stream, as they have no common interest in the damages, and there is no legal basis on which they can be apportioned between them.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; P. O. HUNDLEY, Judge.

Gray & Sexton, for appellants. Lewis Freer and Jo. D. Sproul, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action for damages for diverting the waters of plaintiffs, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from the further diversion thereof. Among other things, the complaint in effect alleges that the West Branch of Canon creek and Canon creek were natural water-courses; the waters of the former flowing into the latter. That the plaintiff Foreman owns a tract of land situated upon the west branch of Canon creek, and also 15 inches of the waters of said creek for the purpose of irrigating her said tract of land. That the plaintiff Rogers owns a tract of land situated upon Canon creek, and also 35 inches of the waters of said creek, for the purpose of irrigating his said tract of land. That plaintiffs, by means of ditches erected by them, respectively, carried said waters from the aforesaid creeks over and upon their said tracts of land. That the defendants, at a point above the lands of plaintiffs, diverted the said waters from their natural channel, depriving said owners thereof; and by such diversion plaintiffs suffered damages in the sum of $1,000. A demurrer to the complaint was filed upon the ground that there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff and a misjoinder of causes of action. The demurrer was overruled, issue was joined, and upon the trial the findings of the court were in consonance with plaintiffs' complaint, except as to the allegation of damages, and as to that allegation the court found that the plaintiffs had suffered damages in the sum of five dollars. The case comes before us upon the judgment roll.

It will be observed that the plaintiff Foreman owns a tract of land, 15 inches of water, and the ditch which carries the water from West Canon creek upon her land. Her co-plaintiff, Rogers, has no interest whatever in the land, the water, or the ditch. Likewise plaintiff Rogers owns a tract of land, (some distance from Foreman's land,) 35 inches of water, and the ditch which carries the water from Canon creek upon his land; and his co-plaintiff has no interest in such land, water, or ditch. These plaintiffs claimed in their complaint, and obtained by decree of the court, a joint judgment for damages against the defendants. It is impossible to see how the plaintiffs have any joint or common interest in the damages recovered, or upon what legal basis such damages could be apportioned between them. Respondents' counsel suggest that the plaintiffs are tenants in common, and the damages should be apportioned in proportion to the inches of water each owns. This cannot be the true rule, for it readily can be seen that for many reasons the diversion of the waters by defendants may have caused plaintiff owning 15 inches of water far greater damage than would be entailed upon plaintiff owning 35 inches of water. Tenancy in common in ditches and water-rights is no unusual estate, but the cases relied upon by respondents to establish a tenancy in common between the plaintiffs in this action in the waters of a natural channel, under the surrounding circumstances as depicted by the record in this case, are not in point, for the facts are essentially dissimilar. It seems to us that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained upon both of the grounds stated. There was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff; the plaintiffs seek a joint recovery of damages in which they have no joint interest. "Two or more owners of mills propelled by water are interested in preventing an obstruction above that shall interfere with the down flow of the water, and may unite in its restraint or abate it as a nuisance, but they cannot hence unite in an action for damages, for as to the injury suffered there is no community of interest." Bliss, Code Pl. § 76. There is a misjoinder of causes of action, and it is so held in Barham v. Hostetter, 67 Cal. 274, 7 Pac. Rep. 639. This question is carefully considered in Blaisdell v. Stephens, 14 Nev. 17, and in the case of Miller v. Ditch Co., (Cal.) 25 Pac. Rep. 550. But, conceding the judgment for damages to be erroneous, the amount is merely nominal, and too trifling to justify the reversal of the entire judgment. Let the judgment be modified by striking out the damages, without costs to appellant, and in all other respects let the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; DE HAVEN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

PEOPLE v. WHEATLEY. (No. 20,708.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 25, 1891.)

BURGLARY—PRIOR CONVICTION—TRIAL—PLEADING—JURY—JUDGMENT.

1. An information charging burglary and prior conviction was assigned by the presiding judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to department 6 for trial, where defendant was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty. The record, without showing objection by defendant, simply shows that the cause was transferred to department 12, where, on arraignment, a plea of guilty of the prior conviction was entered. Afterwards a trial was had in department 12, resulting in a verdict of guilty of burglary. Held, that it will be presumed that the cause was properly transferred by the presiding judge.

2. In such case defendant will be considered as having pleaded not guilty in department 6 to both the burglary and prior convictions, and, on transfer to department 12, of having withdrawn his former plea as to the former convictions, and pleaded guilty thereto.

3. Where the oral charge of the court appears in full in the transcript of the record, it will be presumed that it was taken down by the shorthand reporter.

4. On trial for burglary, the fact that a juror left the others and went to the water-closet for a few minutes in company with the bailiff is no ground for a new trial if it appears that he conversed with no one, and heard nothing about the case, and that there was no discussion about the case in his absence.

5. A judgment of conviction of burglary and prior conviction, which recites that defendant, when called for sentence, was informed by the court of the information charging him with the crime of burglary and prior conviction of burglary, of his arraignment and pleas of not guilty as charged in the information, and guilty of the prior conviction, of the trial, and verdict of guilty of burglary, and that he was then asked if he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced, is sufficient under Pen. Code Cal. § 1200, requiring that defendant, before judgment, must be informed of the nature of the charge, and of his plea, and the verdict, and must be asked whether he has any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him; and section 1207, requiring the clerk to enter the judgment on the minutes, stating briefly the offense for which the conviction was had, and the fact of prior conviction, etc.

6. On appeal in a criminal case it will be presumed that before proceeding with the trial the clerk read the information, unless the contrary appears from the record.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Section 1200 provides: "When the defendant appears for judgment he must be informed by the court, or by the clerk under its direction, of the nature of the charge against him, and of his plea, and the verdict, if any thereon, and must be asked whether he has any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him." Section 1207 provides: "When judgment upon a conviction is rendered the clerk must enter the same in the minutes, stating briefly the offense for which the conviction was had, and the fact of a prior conviction, (if one,) and must within five days annex together and file the following papers, which will constitute a record of the action: (1) The indictment or information, and a copy of the minutes of the plea or demurrer; (2) a copy of the minutes of the trial; (3) the charges given or refused, and the indorsements thereon; and (4) a copy of the judgment."

Carroll Cook, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the People.

BELCHER, C. The defendant was charged with the crime of burglary, and with having suffered prior convictions of burglary and petit larceny. The information was filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on September 19, 1889, and on the same day the presiding judge of the court assigned the case for trial to Hon. W. T. WALLACE, judge of department No. 6. The defendant was arraigned in department No. 6, on September 27th, and "pleaded not guilty of the crime charged in the information." The record then shows the following "[Title of court and cause.] Oct. 3, 1889. Cause transferred to department No. 12." "[Title of court and cause.] Department No. 12, October 9, 1889. Present, Hon. D. J. MURPHY, Judge. The defendant, having heretofore been arraigned and pleaded not guilty, came into court, and having been called upon and arraigned upon the prior convictions herein, now pleads guilty thereto." Subsequently, as the record states, the cause came on regularly for trial in department No. 12, the defendant and his counsel being present in court, and at the conclusion of the trial a verdict was returned by the jury, finding the defendant guilty of burglary in the second degree. Judgment was then entered that he be punished by imprisonment in the state-prison for the term of eight years. From this judgment and the order denying him a new trial he appeals.

1. The first point made for a reversal of the judgment is that the case was not properly tried in department No. 12. It is claimed that, inasmuch as the minutes of the court show that the cause was assigned to Judge WALLACE for trial, Judge MURPHY had no authority to try it, in the absence of a showing in the record of a re-assignment by the presiding judge, and of consent on the part of Judges WALLACE and MURPHY that it be reassigned. But the minutes of the court do state that the cause was transferred to department No. 12; and they do not state that any objection was made by the defendant to the transfer or the place of trial. Under these circumstances it must be presumed, nothing appearing to the contrary, that the transfer was properly made by the presiding judge.

2. It is contended that when the defendant was arraigned in department No. 6, and pleaded "not guilty," his plea put in issue the prior convictions, and that, having once pleaded, no other plea could be made or have place in the record, until the first was withdrawn or set aside. And it is said that the first plea was not withdrawn, and hence, as there was no verdict as to the prior convictions, the punishment imposed was greater than the law authorized. There can be no doubt at this time that one may be charged in an indictment or information with some particular offense, and with having suffered previous convictions of other offenses, and may be arraigned thereon under section 988 of the Penal Code. He may plead simply not guilty, and thus put in issue every material allegation of the indictment or information, (Pen. Code, § 1019,) or he may plead not guilty of the principal offense charged, and confess the previous convictions, (People v. Lewis, 64 Cal. 401, 1 Pac. Rep. 490; People v. Brooks, 65 Cal. 295, 4 Pac. Rep. 7; Ex parte Young Ah Gow, 73 Cal. 438, 15 Pac. Rep. 76.) If he confesses the previous convictions, then the clerk, in reading the indictment or information to the jury, must omit therefrom all that relates to such previous convictions, and no testimony in regard to them can be offered, or reference to them be made, during the trial. Pen. Code, § 1093, subd. 1; People v. Meyer, 73 Cal. 548, 15 Pac. Rep. 95; People v. Sansome, 84 Cal. 449, 24 Pac. Rep. 143. And there can also be no question that, when one is charged with a prior conviction, and has pleaded simply not guilty, he may be permitted afterwards, in the discretion of the court, to withdraw his plea as to that charge, and enter a plea of guilty thereof. In People v. Lewis, supra, the defendant was indicted for grand larceny, and charged with a previous conviction of a like offense. He was arraigned, and pleaded not guilty of the offense charged. On the trial he offered to plead guilty to the charge of previous conviction, and the court denied the offer. Speaking of this ruling, this court, by Mr. Justice THORNTON, said: "Having then regularly pleaded, the court was not bound afterwards on the trial to accept the plea of guilty of the previous conviction. It may be in its discretion to do so or not; not a discretion, however, to be arbitrarily exercised, but one in accordance with law and its analogies. If the court abuses its discretion in so ruling, a reversal would follow; but we cannot see that it went beyond what the law permitted." Here the record shows that the defendant, after pleading not guilty, came again into court, and pleaded guilty of the prior convictions. He had a right to do this, with the court's consent; and his action, so far as we can see, was voluntary, the object, doubtless, being to keep from the jury on the trial all knowledge of the prior convictions, and thus secure a better chance for an acquittal of the main charge. The case of People v. King, 64 Cal. 338, cited by appellant, cannot aid him. That case was decided upon the theory that, since the repeal of sections 969 and 1025 of the Penal Code, when a person is charged with a criminal offense and a previous conviction, his admission of the previous conviction is not sufficient, but he must plead to both charges, and both must be proved on the trial and passed upon by the jury. That theory has not since been accepted by the court, and, in effect, the case has been overruled. See cases above cited.

3. It is said that the record shows affirmatively that the court charged the jury orally, and fails to show that the charge was taken down by the phonographic reporter. This is assigned as error, and urged as cause for a reversal of the judgment. But the presumption is that the reporter performed his duty, and took down the charge in shorthand; and that he must have done so very clearly appears from the fact that the full charge is brought here in the transcript, covering 10 printed pages.

4. It is claimed that defendant's motion for a new trial should have been granted, because the jury, after retiring to deliberate upon their verdict, separated without leave of the court. It appears from the affidavits read on the hearing of the motion for a new trial that when the jury left the jury-box and started for the jury-room, eleven of them went into the room, and one went into a water-closet adjacent to the court-room, accompanied by the bailiff. He was gone about five minutes, and, while absent from the other jurors, held no conversation with any person, and nothing was said about the case in his hearing. During his absence no discussion upon the case was had among the other jurors, and no ballot was taken. On his return he participated in all the deliberations of the jury and in finding the verdict. Upon this showing we see no error in the refusal of the court to grant the defendant's motion. People v. Symonds, 22 Cal. 349. But it is urged that the court could not consider the counter-affidavits read and filed on behalf of the people, because the deputy-clerk, before whom they were worn to, did not sign his principal's name to the jurat. It was not necessary for him to do this. Touchard v. Crow, 20 Cal. 150; Muller v. Boggs, 25 Cal. 175.

5. It is contended that the court had no right to pronounce judgment of imprisonment for eight years, because "there is not a word said in the judgment about any prior convictions, nor does the verdict say aught concerning the same." But the judgment recites that, when the defendant was called up to be sentenced, he was duly informed by the court of the information, charging him "with the crime of burglary and prior conviction of burglary in the first degree; of his arraignment and plea of not guilty as charged in said information, and guilty of said prior conviction; of his trial, and the verdict of the jury, on the 17th day of October, 1889, 'guilty' of burglary in the second degree. The defendant was then asked if he had any legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced against him." This was sufficient to meet the requirements of sections 1200 and 1207 of the Penal Code; and imprisonment for the term of eight years was authorized. Pen. Code, §§ 461, 666. It is also objected that the judgment is insufficient in form, because it orders and adjudgeth that the defendant be punished by imprisonment in the state-prison, etc. In our opinion the judgment was sufficient in this regard, and the objection is without merit.

6. The point is made that it was error to proceed with the trial without the reading of the information by the clerk. But there is nothing in the record to show that the information was not read by the clerk to the jury, and we must therefore presume that it was.

7. It is earnestly contended that a new trial should have been granted the defendant on the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and to the evidence. It must be admitted that the evidence, as brought up in the record, does not seem to us to be very strong and convincing; and yet the jury, under proper instructions, which were very full and clear upon every point involved, found the defendant guilty. And the learned judge of the court, who saw the witnesses, and heard them testify, denied defendant's motion. Under the circumstances, we do not feel at liberty to say that the evidence was so insufficient as to justify a reversal on this ground.

8. In one part of its charge the court told the jury that under the allegations of the information, and under the proofs in the case, they must be satisfied of two things in order to warrant them in convicting the defendant, viz., entry into the building, and intent to commit larceny. It is claimed that another fact, viz., the ownership of the building as alleged, was equally necessary, and that the instruction as given was therefore misleading. But the court afterwards fully instructed the jury on this point, telling them that, of course, they must find the ownership of the building to be as set forth in the information. This was certainly sufficient, and it takes away appellant's last ground of complaint. It results that the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIFF, C.

PEOPLE v. MCGREGGOR. (No. 20,775.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 28, 1891.)

BURGLARY—FORMER CONVICTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—VENUE.

1. On the arraignment of one informed against for burglary it is not error for the court to ask him whether he had suffered the prior convictions charged against him in the information.

2. Where defendant has confessed the former convictions the presumption is that the clerk, on reading the information to the jury, omitted that part relating to the prior convictions, as he is required to do by Pen. Code Cal. § 1093; and this presumption is not overcome by a statement in the record that the information charging defendant with the "crime" (not crimes) was read, and "plea" (not pleas) of not guilty stated to the jury.

3. The presumption is that the oral charge of the court was taken down by the short-hand reporter, as required by Pen. Code, § 1093, unless the record affirmatively shows the contrary.

4. Where the undisputed evidence shows that defendant committed the burglary in the nighttime, a remark by the judge in charging the jury that the testimony showed the crime to have been committed at 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning could not have prejudiced defendant; and hence the supreme court will not determine whether this language was the mere exercise of the constitutional power of the judge to "state the testimony," or a violation of the mandate that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact." Const. Cal. art. 6, § 19.

5. On a trial for burglary, alleged in the information to have been committed in the city and county of San Francisco, evidence that the crime was committed in a house on "Grant avenue," which is in fact one of the principal streets of said city, is sufficient proof of the venue, without direct testimony that the avenue is in the city of San Francisco.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. MCM. SHAFTER, Judge.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. W. H. Harr, Atty. Gen., for the People.

MCFARLAND, J. The defendant was convicted of an attempt to commit burglary in the first degree, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. Several points are relied on for a reversal of the judgment.

1. It was not error for the court to ask the defendant, upon his arraignment, whether he had suffered the prior convictions charged against him in the information. People v. Wheatley, ante, 95, (No. 20,708,) filed February 25, 1891, and cases there cited.

2. It does not appear that the clerk read to the jury that part of the indictment which charged defendant with prior convictions. As the defendant had confessed the former convictions, the presumption is that the clerk performed his duty as prescribed in section 1093 of the Penal Code, and omitted that part of the indictment which related thereto; and this presumption is not overcome by anything in the record, which merely states that "the information charging the defendant with the above crime [not crimes] was read, and plea [not pleas] of not guilty stated to the jury." No objection was made at the time; and it is quite clear that there is no affirmative showing of error on this point.

3. The sentence—10 years—does not exceed the maximum term of imprisonment, for the record shows that the defendant had suffered former convictions.

4. Assuming that the record must show a recital of the matters referred to in section 1200 of the Penal Code, and that the section is not merely directory, still it appears from the record in this case that the directions of said section were quite fully complied with.

5. It does not appear that the oral charge of the court was not taken down by the reporter; and where the contrary does not appear it will be presumed that the law¹ was obeyed.

6. The jury having first returned a verdict of "guilty as charged," the court informed them that it would be necessary to find the degree of the crime, and that, if the attempt was made in the nighttime, it would be an attempt to commit burglary in the first degree; and, in that connection the court told the jury that "the testimony was it was 3 or 4 o'clock in the morning." It is contended that this language last quoted was erroneous. It is not necessary to determine whether the use of this language was the mere exercise of the constitutional power of a judge to "state the testimony," or a violation of the mandate that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact," (Const. art. 6, § 19,) for the only evidence upon which defendant could have been convicted at all showed without conflict that the attempt was made in the nighttime. Defendant, therefore, could not have been prejudiced by the remark of the court.

7. The gravest point made by appellant is the one based upon the alleged failure to prove the venue. Of course, there must be sufficient proof of the venue in every criminal case, and experienced prosecuting attorneys are generally careful to make such proof at an early stage of the trial. In the case at bar the prosecution seem to have entirely overlooked the necessity of asking any questions on that subject. But notwithstanding that oversight there was, we think, sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in finding that the crime charged was committed in the city and county of San Francisco, there being no evidence tending to show the contrary. The information was entitled in the superior court of said city and county, and charged that the crime was committed "at the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California," at a certain house on "Grant avenue." The jurors were citizens and residents of San Francisco, and the court-house in which they sat while defendant was being tried was near the center of the city. The principal witness for the prosecution testified that on the night of the alleged crime he was a police officer "on regular force;" that on said night he was on duty "on Grant avenue, from Market to Bush," and that territory was his "regular beat;" and that when he first saw defendant that night he was in an alley called "Stockton Place," "off Grant avenue, between Post and Sutter." And it was shown that the crime, if committed at all, was committed on said Grant avenue, at a certain house adjacent to said Stockton place. Thus a half dozen of the principal and best known streets of the city of San Francisco were named, between or upon which the crime was committed; and although, from a failure to ask them, the witnesses did not testify directly that these streets were in the prominent city of San Francisco in which the court was sitting, still we think that the evidence, taken in connection with the surrounding circumstances, was sufficient to justify the jury in finding as jurors what they well know as men, that the streets named by the witnesses meant the well-known streets so named in San Francisco. In Brady v. Page, 59 Cal. 52, and Whiting v. Quackenbush, 54 Cal. 306, this court seems to have held that judicial notice would be taken of the streets of San Francisco, although there may be some points of distinction between those cases and the one at bar. In People v. Manning, 48 Cal. 335, the court says: "Another point made is that the venue was not proved. No witness testified in so many words that the killing occurred in the city and county of San Francisco; but the whole testimony, taken together, left no room for a reasonable doubt on this point. We think the venue sufficiently proved." In that case the killing was shown to have been done on Clay street, without any direct evidence that Clay street was in San Francisco; but it may be claimed that Clay street could have been located by reference to other named streets which were shown to be in the city. In State v. Burns, 48 Mo. 438, the witness spoke of the murder as taking place on Mullanphy street, but it was not expressly stated anywhere that Mullanphy street was in the county or city of St. Louis; and the supreme court of Missouri say: "If there was evidence to reasonably satisfy the jury that the crime was committed in the city, that was sufficient." * * * The question of venue or jurisdiction is always a question of fact, and may be proved like any other fact. If the evidence raises a violent presumption that the offense for which the person is indicted was committed in the county where he was tried, it is sufficient. 1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 601." In State v. Ruth, 14 Mo. App. 226, it was testified that the stolen property was taken from a boarding-house, No. 1203 Washington avenue, and that defendant was seen with it in a shop on Christy avenue, and the court say: "It is true that no witness says, in so many words, that the offense was committed in the city of St. Louis. But this is not necessary. It is enough if the testimony was such as to satisfy the trier of the fact that the place of the offense was that laid in the information." And, speaking of certain cases referred to, the court continues as follows: "In neither case could there be any doubt in the minds of the triers of the fact, or of the judges of the appellate court, that the streets spoken of by the witnesses were St. Louis streets. We will not take judicial notice of all the streets of the city in which this court holds its sessions. But we need have no difficulty in judicially recognizing the fact that Washington avenue, Morgan street, and Christy avenue, are old, established, and well-known streets of St. Louis,—the city in which we sit as a court,—and that this knowledge prevails generally throughout the city, and must have been possessed by the trier of fact in the present case." Bland v. People, 3 Scam. 364, Beavers v. State, 58 Ind. 530, and Com. v. Costley, 118 Mass. 3, are all to the point that inferential evidence is sufficient to establish venue. The foregoing cases are authorities which fortify the conclusion on this point which we have above stated. The question here is not a strict question of judicial knowledge. The question is whether, under all the circumstances of the case, there was sufficient evidence to warrant the jury in concluding that the crime was committed in San Francisco, and, as before said, we think that it was sufficient.

8. We do not think that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict upon the merits; nor do we think that the court abused its discretion in refusing to grant a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PREBLE et al. v. ABRAHAMS. (No. 13,710.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—CONTRACTS—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—EVIDENCE.

1. A contract, signed by both parties, reciting that the vendor agrees to sell land, is also an agreement by the vendee to purchase.

2. Plaintiffs sued for specific performance of a written contract to purchase "40 acres of the 80-acre tract at Biggs," and offered evidence that defendant agreed to purchase the east half of the tract if plaintiffs would agree to sell the west half to one B., and that the west half had been sold to B. under a contract made at the same time as defendant's. Held, that the evidence was admissible, and showed an agreement by defendant to purchase the east half of the tract.

3. In such case defendant cannot object to a decree of specific performance on the ground that the land is incumbered, where the decree only authorizes a judgment against him on deposit by plaintiffs with the clerk of a deed free of incumbrance.

Appeal from superior court, Butte county; P. O. HUNDLEY, Judge.

R. H. Lindsay and Gray & Sexton, for appellants. John Gale, for respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The plaintiffs in their complaint allege that on the 13th day of January, 1888, they and the defendant entered into an agreement of which the following is a copy: "Biggs, January 13, 1888. This agreement, made and entered into by C. S. Preble and C. S. Young, of Reno, Nevada, and A. Abrahams of the same place. Said Preble & Young agree to sell to A. Abrahams of Reno, for one hundred and twenty-five dollars per acre, for forty acres of the eighty-acre tract at Biggs, and upon the payment of the said sum said parties of the first part shall make, execute, and acknowledge, and deliver unto the said party of the second part a good and sufficient deed, vesting the title of said property in party of second part. PREBLE & YOUNG. A. ABRAHAMS. Witness: M. Biggs, Jr." Plaintiffs further allege that, when said agreement was written, it was understood between all the parties thereto that the same should contain a clause obliging said defendant to buy said land at said price of $125 per acre, and the omission of said clause therefrom was wholly accidental and unintentional; that between the words, "said Preble and Young agree to sell to Abrahams of Reno," and the words, "for one hundred and twenty-five dollars per acre for forty acres of the eighty-acre tract at Biggs," in said contract, there should have been inserted the words, "and said Abrahams agrees to purchase;" that the omission was the result of a mutual mistake etc. Plaintiffs further allege that they have kept and performed all the terms, covenants, and conditions on their part to be performed, and that defendant refuses to keep or perform any of the terms, covenants, or conditions of said contract on his part, and refuses to purchase said land or pay plaintiffs therefor. Wherefore plaintiffs pray to have said contract reformed so as to make it obligatory upon defendant to purchase said land at the price agreed upon, and that, as so reformed, it be construed and enforced. In his answer the defendant denies all the material allegations of the complaint, except the making of the memorandum in writing, a copy of which is contained in the complaint. Evidence was introduced by the plaintiffs tending to prove the alleged mistake in the memorandum in writing of the agreement between the parties, and by the defendant tending to prove that there was no mistake. Upon all the material issues the court found in favor of the plaintiffs, and decreed the reformation of the contract, and a specific performance of it as prayed in the complaint. Defendant moved for a new trial upon a statement. The motion was denied, and from the judgment, and from the order denying the motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Everything relating to the reformation of the contract may be eliminated from the case, because the contract, as reformed, means just what it did before it was reformed. Without any reformation, it obligated the defendant as strongly to buy and pay the price specified for the land as it did the plaintiffs to sell it for that price. Appellant contends that the agreement which it is sought to have specifically performed is "an agreement, the terms of which are not sufficiently certain to make the precise act which is to be done clearly ascertainable," and therefore cannot be specifically performed. Civil Code, § 3390.

The contention is that the agreement to sell "forty acres of the eighty-acre tract at Biggs" is not sufficiently certain to make the precise act which is to be done clearly ascertainable. This is the only agreement in writing between the parties for the sale or purchase of any real estate; and an agreement not in writing, for the sale or purchase of real estate, is void. And the description of the property in the written agreement is so entirely uncertain as to render the instrument inoperative and void, unless we can go beyond the face of it to ascertain its meaning. Parol evidence is always admissible to explain the surrounding circumstances and situations and relation of the parties, at and immediately before the execution of the contract, in order to connect the description with the thing intended, and thereby to identify the subject-matter, and to explain all technical terms and phrases used in a local or special sense. Pom. Cont. § 152. It appears by the written agreement that the parties intended a sale and purchase of land, and that it was "forty acres of the eighty-acre tract at Biggs." If the vendors owned an 80-acre tract at Biggs we would assume that they intended to sell 40 acres of the 80-acre tract owned by them at Biggs. Evidence was introduced which tended to prove the location and description of the 80-acre tract at Biggs, and in what part of the tract the 40 acres which the plaintiffs agreed to sell to defendant were situated. The court, in effect, found that, at the date of said agreement, one Mrs. Biggs was desirous of purchasing one-half of said 80-acre tract, i. e., the western half, upon which there were valuable improvements. She offered to pay for that half $5,000. Plaintiffs would not accept her offer, but offered to sell the entire 80-acre tract for $10,000. Thereupon defendant agreed with plaintiffs that, if they would sell to Mrs. Biggs the western half of said 80-acre tract for $125 per acre, he, the defendant, would purchase the other half of said 80-acre tract, and pay $125 per acre therefor. The finding is justified by the evidence, and there is no specification of the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to justify that finding. The contracts to sell to Mrs. Biggs one-half of said 80-acre tract, and to the defendant the other half thereof, were made at the same time and place. We think the evidence makes the subject-matter sufficiently certain, and that is all that is necessary. Prof. Pomeroy says: "It is not strictly accurate to say that the subject-matter must be absolutely certain from the writing itself, or by reference to some other writing. The true rule is that the situation of the parties and the surrounding circumstances, when the contract was made, can be shown by parol evidence, so that the court may be placed in the position of the parties themselves; and if then the subject-matter is identified, and the terms appear reasonably certain, it is enough." Pom. Cont. p. 227. This is in consonance with the maxim, certum est quod certum reddi potest. The evidence clearly shows that the parties perfectly understood that the sale and purchase was not of an undivided interest of 40 acres in a tract of 80 acres, but of 40 acres in severalty. The defendant does not claim in his answer, nor in his evidence, that he intended to purchase an undivided interest in the 80-acre tract. He denies that he intended or agreed to purchase any interest whatever. Nothing is made more clear by the evidence than that Mrs. Biggs, with the full knowledge of all the parties, purchased the 40 acres of said 80-acre tract upon which the improvements were located. This is clearly specified in the written agreement between her and the plaintiffs. They agreed to sell her 40 acres, including the buildings and orchards on the 40 acres, to be taken by her where the houses and barns and orchards were at that time, and the same place on which M. Biggs, Jr., and his family were residing. This, and the agreement to sell to the defendant, were contemporaneous. The defendant, if he agreed to purchase anything, agreed to purchase the 40 acres remaining after the 40 acres purchased by Mrs. Biggs had been segregated from said 80-acre tract.

By the judgment of the court below the plaintiffs are required "to execute, duly acknowledge, and deliver to said defendant a good and sufficient deed of conveyance in fee, and free and clear of all incumbrances, the form of the same to be settled and approved by the judge of said superior court, if the parties differ respecting it, of the following described premises, to-wit: Forty acres of land, being the eastern half of said eighty-acre tract described in said complaint, and the part thereof not heretofore conveyed to M. Biggs, Jr., said eighty-acre tract being one of the tracts into which the ranch known as 'Biggs' Upper Ranch' is divided, and upon the western half of which the dwelling-house and buildings used in connection with said ranch are situated, all being situated near Biggs, in Butte county." And it is further adjudged that, if said defendant refuse to receive said deed, the plaintiffs file the same with the clerk of the court, and that upon such delivery or filing of said conveyance the defendant pay to the plaintiffs, or their attorney, the sum of $5,000, the purchase price named in said agreement. It is urged on behalf of defendant that said premises are incumbered, and therefore he ought not to be compelled to accept a conveyance of them. He is not compelled to accept a conveyance which does not vest in him the fee free of all incumbrances. He was once tendered a conveyance, which he did not refuse to accept on the ground that it did not convey the premises free of all incumbrances, but on the ground that he had never agreed to purchase the premises. He is amply protected by the judgment against any incumbrances, and, until he is tendered a conveyance free of all incumbrances, he is not compelled to accept it, or to pay anything to the plaintiffs. The errors of law specified are such as could not have affected the substantial rights of the parties, and therefore must be disregarded. Judgment and order affirmed.

PUBLIC LANDS—"SWAMP AND OVERFLOWED"—APPLICATION TO PURCHASE.

Pol. Code Cal. § 8441, prohibits the surveyor general from approving applications, for swamp and overflowed lands, until six months after they have been segregated. Section 8443 provides that a person desiring to purchase such lands must file his affidavit that there are no settlers on the land, or, if there are, that the same have been segregated for six months. Held, that an application to purchase "swamp and overflowed" land is void, if made before the lands have been segregated to the state as such.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Pol. Code Cal. § 8441, provides: "The surveyor general of the state must not approve any application, nor must the register issue evidence of title, for swamp and overflowed land, until six months after the same has been segregated by authority of the United States." Section 3443 provides: "Any person desiring to purchase swamp and overflowed or tide lands above low tide must make an affidavit * * * that he does not know of any valid claim to the same, other than his own, and, if the land is swamped and overflowed, that he knows the land applied for, and the exterior bounds thereof, and knows of his own knowledge that there are no settlers thereon; or, if there are, that the land has been segregated more than six months by authority of the United States. * * * Section 3445 provides: "Any person desiring to purchase lands as provided in section thirty-four hundred and forty-three of this Code, which have been segregated by authority of the United States, but which have not been sectionized by the same authority, must apply to the surveyor of the county in which the land is situated to have the land which he desires to purchase surveyed. * * *"

Justine Jacobs, for appellants. W. B. Wallace, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. When this cause was pending in department an opinion was prepared by Commissioner BELCHER. After hearing in bank, and due consideration of the case, we are satisfied with that opinion, and with the conclusion therein reached. The opinion is as follows:

"This action was brought to determine a contest as to the right to purchase from the state a certain half-section of swamp and overflowed land, situate in Tulare county. The trial court gave judgment for the plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying him a new trial, the defendant Hyde appeals. The material facts of the case are as follows: On the 2d day of July, 1879, the defendant Mangan filed in the state surveyor general's office his application to purchase a section of land under the law providing for the sale of swamp and overflowed lands. At that time the township, in which the section applied for was situated, had not been surveyed, and the section had not been segregated as swamp and overflowed land by authority of the United States. In 1880 the township was surveyed in the field, and on the 9th day of February, 1881, the township plat was approved by the United States surveyor general, and filed in his office. On this plat the section was marked and designated as swamp and overflowed. At the time of filing his application Mangan was qualified to purchase swamp land from the state, and the application was verified, and stated all the facts required by law for that purpose. It also had attached to it a certificate of the county surveyor that he had surveyed the section, and a certificate of the register of the United States land-office of the district in which the land was situated that there was no pre-emption, homestead, or other filing of record in his office on the said section. The application remained unacted upon until the 22d day of September, 1883, when it was approved by the surveyor general, and thereafter, on the 24th of November following, a certificate of purchase for the land was issued to Mangan. Afterwards, by mesne conveyances and assignments, defendant Hyde became the successor in interest of Mangan in the land and certificate. In February, 1888, the plaintiff settled on the north half of the section, applied for by Mangan, and on the 17th day of March following he filed in the state surveyor general's office his application to purchase the half section so settled upon. The application was properly verified, and stated, among other things, that the land applied for was suitable for cultivation, and that there were no settlers thereon other than the applicant, and that he was an actual settler thereon. Plaintiff also filed at the same time his verified protest against the issuance of any further evidence of title to the said half-section to Mangan or his successor in interest, on the grounds that the said land was not segregated by authority of the United States until the year 1881, and that the same was suitable for cultivation, and neither Mangan nor his successor in interest had ever been a settler thereon. The contest thus raised was referred for determination to the superior court of Tulare county, and this action was thereafter commenced in proper time. As conclusions of law from the facts, the court below found, as to the plaintiff, that he was entitled to purchase the land applied for by him, and to have his application approved by the surveyor general; and as to the defendants, that the application of Mangan, and the certificate of purchase issued thereon, in so far as they relate to the lands in controversy, were illegal, null, and void, and that neither of the defendants had any right to purchase the said land, or any right, title, interest, or estate therein.

"1. The first point made for a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings, that the land in controversy, and each legal subdivision thereof, was suitable for cultivation, and that the plaintiff was an actual settler thereon when he filed his application. This point cannot be sustained. It is unnecessary to recite the testimony, but, in our opinion, it was amply sufficient to establish both propositions.

"2. The only other point presented is that one seeking to purchase swamp land may make his application to purchase the same before the land is segregated to the state as swamp and overflowed by authority of the United States, and that Mangan's application was therefore not prematurely filed. But in Garfield v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 178, 15 Pac. Rep. 626, this court held otherwise. In that case it was said that 'since 1874 no application to purchase swamp land has been authorized until after the land has been segregated as such, by authority of the United States;' citing sections 3441, 3443, 3445, Pol. Code. That decision, if correct, and we think it is, is decisive of the question. See, also, Tubbs v. Willhoit, 73 Cal. 61, 14 Pac. Rep. 361."

For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

CONTEMPT—APPEAL.

By the provision of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1222, that "the judgment and orders of the court or judge, made in cases of contempt, are final and conclusive," no appeal lies from a judgment of the superior court imposing a fine of more than $300 for contempt. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This appeal is from a judgment in a case of contempt, and the respondent moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that an appeal does not lie in such case, because it is provided by the Code of Civil Procedure that "the judgment and orders of the court or judge, made in cases of contempt, are final and conclusive." In Tyler v. Connolly, 65 Cal. 30, 2 Pac. Rep. 414, the question is carefully considered, and the conclusion reached that no appeal lies from a judgment imposing a fine of more than $300 for a contempt of court, expressly overruling People v. O'Neill, 47 Cal. 109. Tyler v. Connolly was followed in Sanchez v. Newman, 70 Cal. 210, 11 Pac. Rep. 645. We see no grounds for disturbing the rule laid down in Tyler v. Connolly, supra. Appeal dismissed.

BURKE v. BOURS et al. (No. 13,912.)¹

PURCHASE OF PRINCIPAL'S LAND BY AGENT—CONCEALMENT—ESTOPPEL.

1. An agent, having charge of certain property for an absent firm, was directed to sell it for about $5,000, and, wishing to purchase for himself, reported his acceptance, subject to approval of an offer of $4,500 net, and sent a deed of the property with the grantee's name omitted. The owner executed the deed, and, returning it to the agent through the firm, accepted the agent's check for $4,500, which was the full value of the land. The agent did not understand himself to be in the owner's employ, nor that a selling agent's name could not be written in a deed as grantee without the grantor's consent, but, intending no fraud, entered into possession. Held, that the heirs of the grantor could not set up fraudulent concealment as a ground for ejectment.

2. In any event, the grantee's possession could not be attacked without tendering back the purchase money.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. SWINNERTON, Judge.

George D. Collins, for appellant. Jas. H. Budd, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action in ejectment was instituted to recover certain real property in the city of Stockton. The cause has been here before, (67 Cal. 447, 8 Pac. Rep. 49,) and it was then decided, among other things, that a certain deed made by one Arguello (whose wife's administrator is now the plaintiff here) to Bours, the defendant, was void and of no effect to convey title from Arguello, because at the time it was executed and acknowledged the name of Bours, the intending purchaser, was not inserted in the deed, and that instrument was a blank as to any grantee. The defendant in possession set up, in defense to the apparent legal title of the plaintiff, facts which were claimed to constitute a perfect equitable title in the former. The court below, by its findings and decision, coincided with the defendant, and rendered judgment that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that the defendant recover costs. From that judgment this appeal is taken upon the judgment roll, and a bill of exceptions showing such of the evidence as is necessary, upon which is based the findings and decision which are attacked. It seems to be conceded by all the contestants that the property in dispute was owned and held by Jose Arguello at the time he signed the deed. The respondents claim, however, that on the 14th day of September, 1876, Arguello agreed to, and did afterwards, sell and convey the property to defendant Bours, on the 15th day of September, 1876. The appellant takes the position that no sale or conveyance ever took place; that the deed made in blank, as to the grantee therein, by Arguello, was void; and that there was no agreement or contract on the part of Arguello to sell to the defendant Bours, and that he never did sell to him.

The basis on which the appellant argues his theory of the case is that Bours was the agent of Arguello to find a purchaser for the property in dispute; that he informed Arguello that he had found a purchaser at the price Arguello was willing to take for the property, but that he did not inform Arguello that he, the agent, was the purchaser, and therefore both the deed and the attempted purchase of Bours was void; that the court below was in error in finding, against the evidence, that Bours was not the agent of Arguello, as also in other findings respecting the "material facts of agency and notice to the principal." The facts, as disclosed by the letters in evidence, appear to be about these: Arguello was the owner of this property on the 19th of August, 1876. Bours never knew him at all, but Falkner, Bell & Co., of San Francisco, seem to have been the agents for Arguello in the collection of rents and general management of the property here involved. Upon that day they wrote to Bours, who lived at Stockton, in which place the property, as we have seen, was situated, that Arguello thought of selling his real estate in that town, and had requested them to ascertain the price it would probably realize. At that time, according to the evidence of Bours, which is not contradicted, he was looking after the property at the instance and request and as the agent of Falkner, Bell & Co., "and for nobody else," as he had been doing before Arguello purchased it for one Mazes, the seller to Arguello. After Bours took charge of the property for Mazes he was instructed by him to make his returns to Falkner, Bell & Co. After Mazes sold to Arguello, Falkner, Bell & Co. sent the deed, showing that sale, to Bours, that it might be recorded and returned to them. After that he looked after the property for Falkner, Bell & Co., who instructed him to take charge of it, pay the taxes, and make returns to them. But he never received any instructions from Arguello respecting the property, or had any communication by word or letter with him. In this state of affairs, Bours replied by letter to this inquiry of Falkner, Bell & Co., that he did not think the property would sell for over $5,000; that the tenant of it was dissatisfied with the present rents, which he, however, declined reducing. Falkner, Bell & Co. sent this letter of Bours to Arguello, at Santa Clara. Several days after that the latter wrote to Falkner, Bell & Co. that he agreed with Bours in his opinion of the property, and requested them "to communicate with Mr. Bours, and try to sell the property at a price as near as possible to $5,000." This letter was sent to Bours by Falkner, Bell & Co., stating that it authorized the sale of Arguello's property "at or about your figures, namely, $5,000." Bours replied to Falkner, Bell & Co.'s letter, stating that he had ordered an abstract of title to the property to be prepared, and had "placed the same in the hands of a competent broker," and hoped soon to report a sale of it. Bours testified in this connection that Mr. Cutting, the broker in whose hands he had placed the property, had been in the real estate business for about 25 years, etc. Cutting testified that he tried for several weeks to sell the property, but could not. The purport of the letter of Bours just mentioned was communicated by letter to Arguello by Falkner, Bell & Co. At or about this time Bours wrote to Falkner, Bell & Co. that the only offer he had received for the property, free of broker's commissions or costs of deed, was $4,500, "which offer I have accepted, subject to the approval of the owner." He inclosed in that letter a deed for signature, with name of purchaser and amount blank. The letter of Bours was sent to Arguello by Falkner, Bell & Co., with the deed for Arguello's signature, should he approve of the terms mentioned. Falkner, Bell & Co. declined to advise as to the matter, because they knew nothing of the value of the real estate, but stated that they considered Bours a competent and reliable man. Closing, they wrote: "It remains for you to decide as to the price." Falkner, Bell & Co., after receiving the deed signed and acknowledged by Arguello, with the blank filled in by him as to the amount of the purchase price, $4,500, but the name of the grantee omitted, sent the instrument to Bours, with a letter requesting, "Please advise us when the matter is settled." After that Bours sent to Falkner, Bell & Co. a check for the amount of balance due for rents, etc., and also a check for the $4,500, "proceeds of the sale of the property, but did not state who was the purchaser of the property." Falkner, Bell & Co. acknowledged the receipt of the checks, and stated that they had placed them to the account of Arguello. They informed Arguello of these facts by letter also. Arguello acknowledged receipt of this letter, and appeared to approve of their acts in receiving the money and putting it to his credit. About two months after this it seems that Arguello died, and about two years and eleven months after that this action was brought.

gnello was closed, and the estate distributed, but the money paid by Bours to Falkner, Bell & Co. placed to the credit of Arguello, and known and approved by him to have been received and placed there, has never been returned, or offered to be returned, to Bours. He went into possession as soon as he got the deed, and paid his money. The evidence shows that he paid all the property was worth; that he had no intention of committing any fraud whatever. The most that can be said is that he did not understand that the law would not authorize him, as he did, to have his name inserted by one Inglis, a clerk, in the blank deed, and that he did not understand if he was really the agent of Arguello; that he could not be agent and purchaser without Arguello knowing it, or unless afterwards, when informed of the real facts, Arguello made no objection. It is plain that what Arguello wanted was to obtain his price for the property, and that he would not have objected to Bours as a purchaser at a fair price. It is manifest from the letters, and from the acts of Arguello in signing, acknowledging, and filling in the deed with the purchase price, and the acceptance of the money after it was sent by Bours to Falkner, Bell & Co., and placed to Arguello's credit, that the latter agreed to sell this property for $4,500 to any one who would pay that amount of money for it. It further appears from the evidence that this amount of money was the full and fair value of the property; and that the agreement made by Arguello to sell this property for the sum of $4,500, to any one who would pay that amount for it, was partially performed by Bours paying the money therefor, and entering into possession thereof. Conceding that Bours was Arguello's agent, and had no right to sell to himself, the evidence tends to show that Arguello knew, after he received the money by the check of Bours, that the purchaser who had gone into possession was Bours, and that Arguello did not object, but ratified his agreement to sell after the disclosure of the name of the intended purchaser, who was Bours, his agent. This being the case, and the sum paid having been the full and fair price for the land, the contract is not open to objection on the ground of fraudulent concealment. Certainly it could not be avoided by Arguello or his heirs, unless they return or offer to return the money paid, which they have not done. We therefore advise the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNE, C.; BELCHER, C.

INSURANCE—APPLICATION—PROOF OF LOSS.

1. In an application for insurance, covenanting that the representations therein were true so far as "known to the applicant and material," plaintiff represented her building as 90 feet from the next nearest, without knowing the exact distance to be 72 feet. Held, that such statement was not a warranty, although the policy provides that the application shall be considered a part thereof, "and a warranty by the assured."

2. Where the nearest notary was in the employ of the company, and refused to furnish a certificate of actual loss without fraud, as required by the policy, and the certificate was furnished by another notary, Civil Code Cal. § 2687, providing that the insured should "furnish reasonable evidence to the insurer that such refusal was not induced by any just grounds of disbelief in the facts necessary to be certified," did not require plaintiff to send, to the company, evidence that the nearest notary was in their employ.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge. T. C. Van Ness, for appellant. R. M. Fitzgerald, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This was an action upon a policy of insurance. The plaintiff had a verdict and judgment for $3,717.50, and the defendant appeals from such judgment, and from an order denying its motion for new trial. The grounds which are relied upon for a reversal are the following:

1. It is argued that there was a breach of warranty in relation to the distance of neighboring buildings from that which was covered by the insurance. The policy contained the following provisions: "Fourth. The application and survey upon which the issuance of a policy is predicated shall be considered a part of it, and a warranty by the assured. If the assured, by a written or verbal application for insurance, or by survey, plan, or description or otherwise, makes any erroneous representations, or omits to make known any fact material to the risk, * * * then, and in every such case, this policy shall be void." The application upon which the policy was issued stated that the building insured was 90 feet from other buildings, but, after answering the various questions, contained the following: "And the applicant hereby covenants that the foregoing is a just, full, and true exposition of all the facts and circumstances in regard to the condition, situation, value, and risk of the property to be insured, so far as the same are known to the applicant and material to the risk." The evidence showed very clearly that the building insured was not 90 feet from other buildings, but was somewhat under 80 feet therefrom. And in relation to this the judge instructed the jury as follows: "The defendant in this action seeks to avoid its liability under this policy upon the ground, among others, that in the application originally made the applicant stated that the building nearest to the one destroyed was ninety feet away, whereas defendant now claims that it was but seventy-two feet distant, and that there was another building only seventy-four feet away. It is for you to determine from the evidence whether the distance was or was not ninety feet. If you find it was not, it is for you to determine whether such misrepresentation was or was not material, and upon this point you must consider all the evidence relating to the materiality of the statement. If you find that the nearest building was not ninety feet away and that this was a material statement, it rendered the policy void, and the plaintiff could not recover unless the defendant waived its right to declare the policy void." If the provisions of the policy and application taken together amounted to a warranty that the building insured was 90 feet away from other buildings, the above instruction was both erroneous and injurious to the appellant. But in our opinion, although at first view there is some want of harmony between such provisions, they do not show that there was any such warranty as is contended for by the appellant. The application first states that the building insured was 90 feet from other buildings, but concludes with a covenant or agreement that the statements therein contained are true, "so far as the same are known to the applicant." The different provisions must be read together; and, when so read, we think it clear that there was no warranty that the building insured was 90 feet from other buildings. The case of National Bank v. Insurance Co., 95 U. S. 678, is precisely like this case, except that the statement which was claimed to be untrue was as to the value of the property. It is true, as claimed by the appellant, that value depends a good deal upon opinion and probability, and is not, like distance, a matter which can be accurately ascertained. But the court expressly stated that its opinion did not proceed upon such a construction of the policy. It said: "We rest the conclusion already indicated upon the broad ground that when a policy of insurance contains contradictory provisions, or has been so framed as to leave room for construction, rendering it doubtful whether the parties intended the exact truth of the applicant's statements to be a condition precedent to any binding contract, the court should lean against that construction which imposes upon the assured the obligations of a warranty." If there was no such warranty as is claimed by the appellant, the charge was more favorable than it had a right to expect, and it could not have been injured thereby. There is nothing in the evidence tending to show that the plaintiff knew exactly what the distance was. The difference between 90 feet and 74 or 72 feet is not one which the plaintiff would be apt to know; and what evidence there is on the subject tends to show that she did not know it.

2. The policy provided that the loss, if any, was "to be paid within sixty days (if this company shall so elect) after due notice and proof thereof made by the assured, and received at the office in accordance with the terms of this policy herein-after mentioned." It also contained a provision that in case of loss the assured should forthwith give notice of such loss, "and shall also produce a certificate under the hand and seal of a magistrate or notary public, (nearest to the place, not concerned in the loss as a creditor or otherwise, nor related to the assured,) stating that he has examined the circumstances attending the loss, knows the character and circumstances of the assured, and verily believes that the assured has, without fraud, sustained loss on the property insured to the amount which such magistrate or notary public shall certify." In this connection it may be stated that the Civil Code has the following provision, viz.: Section 2637: "If a policy requires, by way of preliminary proof of loss, the certificate or testimony of a person other than the insured, it is sufficient for the insured to use reasonable diligence to procure it, and, in case of the refusal of such person to give it, then to furnish reasonable evidence to the insurer that such refusal was not induced by any just grounds of disbelief in the facts necessary to be certified." The plaintiff produced to the company the certificate of one Ramage to the facts required to be stated. But it is conceded that he was not the nearest magistrate or notary, and that the person who was such (one Turner) had been applied to, and had refused to give the certificate. In connection with this refusal the plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that her attorney had informed the company's adjuster that "the reason why the certificate was not signed by Mr. Turner was that he had been engaged by the companies or had been employed by the companies to take some affidavits for them, and for that reason, as I had been informed by Mrs. Noone, he had refused to sign them." There was also evidence tending to show that a few days after the fire Turner had given instructions to have measurements taken of the distance of the building insured from other buildings. And we do not see why he should have done so, unless he was acting in the interest of the company. The inference that he was so acting is not rebutted by any evidence; and, if he was employed by the company, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to produce evidence to the company of such fact. In relation to the foregoing, the court charged the jury as follows: "Evidence has been offered to show that at the time plaintiff furnished proofs of loss to the company the attorney for plaintiff stated that the reason why the certificate attached to the proofs was not made before the nearest notary was because Mr. Turner, the nearest notary, had refused to sign it, stating to the plaintiff that he had been engaged for the company, and could not do it. It is the duty of the court to determine whether by so doing the plaintiff furnished to the company reasonable evidence that the refusal of Mr. Turner was not induced by any just grounds of disbelief in the facts necessary to be certified. If you believe this evidence, the court instructs you that the reason given to the company for not producing the certificate of Mr. Turner, the nearest notary, was sufficient, and that the certificate furnished was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the policy as modified by the law." There may have been a slight inaccuracy in the statement of the testimony in this instruction. But, as above stated, if Turner was employed by the company to take measurements, etc., as is to be inferred from the evidence, we think that of itself was a reason why the plaintiff was relieved of the necessity of getting his certificate to the justice of her claim, and that it was not necessary to inform the defendant of the fact. In this view there was nothing to be waived, and all that part of the case relating to waiver may be regarded as surplusage. We do not see any conflict in the instructions, or any material error in relation thereto or in the record. Our opinion is that the judgment and order denying a new trial should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNE, C.

CALIFORNIA SOUTHERN HOTEL CO. v. RUSSELL. (No. 12,837.)

CORPORATIONS—ORGANIZATION—LIABILITY FOR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Defendant and others agreed to organize a hotel company, with a capital of $100,000, divided into shares of $100 each, and that a meeting of stockholders should be called to organize the corporation and elect directors whenever $70,000 should be subscribed, the owners of a majority of the stock to constitute a quorum. One of a firm of general agents of a railroad and steam-boat company subscribed in the company's name, without authority, "for the amount of freight on furniture and material" shipped from certain ports, $10,000. He also subscribed in his own name a certain block "for a site for a hotel, if accepted and used for that purpose, $7,500, and in that case, cash $5,000." When $77,200 was subscribed, a meeting was had, and the agent voted those shares. Held, that since the agent's personal subscription was conditional, and the other unauthorized, the shares were illegally voted, and an independent subscriber, who did not take part in the organization, was not liable for his subscription, though the railroad and steam-ship company afterwards ratified the agent's subscriptions.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellant. Venable & Goodchild & Graves and Turner & Graves, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The facts of this case are as follows: Prior to August 17, 1887, the defendant and others signed a paper by which they agreed to and with each other that they would organize and form a corporation for the purpose of erecting and owning a hotel building in the city of San Luis Obispo, and of purchasing all real and personal property necessary to be used in connection with the said building; that the capital stock of the said corporation should be $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares, of the par value of $100 each; that they respectively subscribed for each number of shares of the stock of the corporation as were set after their respective names, and would pay for the same, up to the par value thereof, at such times and in such manner as might be determined by the board of directors of the corporation to be thereafter chosen. The paper then contains the following clause: "And we further agree that, whenever seventy thousand ($70,000) dollars of said capital stock has been subscribed for, a meeting shall be called for the purpose of electing a board of directors, and taking such steps as are required by law to form the said corporation, and that at such meeting the owners of a majority of said subscribed stock shall constitute a quorum; and are authorized to elect said board of directors, and transact any business necessary to fully complete the organization of said corporation." The defendant subscribed for 10 shares of the stock, and the paper showed subscriptions in the aggregate for 772 shares. The second and third subscriptions in the list were as follows: "Pacific Coast Steam-Ship Company, for itself and Pacific Coast Railway Company, for amount of freight on furniture and material shipped from ports south of Mendocino and north of San Diego, both inclusive. (This subscription is in place of and is a substitute for any and all other subscriptions made by or for or on account of the Pacific Coast Steam-Ship Company, or the Pacific Coast Railway Company, for stock of or in any proposed hotel company since the burning of 'The Andrews,' about April, 1886. Good all, Perkins & Company, General Agents.) Estimated about —; No. shares, 100.—Amount, $10,000." "Edwin Goodall,—the block of land bounded by Higuera, Johnson, Marsh, and Essex streets for a site for a hotel, if accepted and used for that purpose, $7,500; and in that case cash $5,000.—No. shares, 125.—Amount, $12,500." Subsequently Edwin Goodall, for himself and the Pacific Coast Steam-Ship Company, united with others in calling a meeting of the subscribers. The meeting was held, and Goodall was present and voted the full amount of stock subscribed for by himself and the steam-ship company, viz., 225 shares. The result was that on August 17, 1887, a corporation was organized in the name of the plaintiff with a capital stock of $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares, of $100 each. The defendant was not present at the preliminary meeting, and did not acquiesce in or agree that the corporation should be formed on the subscriptions which had been made, and he never at any time recognized the validity of the corporation. The articles of incorporation included the names of the Pacific Coast Steam-Ship Company for 100 shares of stock, and of Edwin Goodall for 125 shares, without conditions, and they left out the names of 5 of the subscribers, whose aggregate subscriptions were for 50 shares. The corporation proceeded to erect a hotel building, and has since opened and conducted the same as a hotel. The board of directors of the corporation made calls for the payment of the full amount of the subscriptions, in installments of 20 per cent. each. The defendant refused to pay the amount subscribed by him, or any part thereof, and this action was brought to recover the same. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and, among other things, the court found that the "subscription of the Pacific Coast Steam-Ship Company and Pacific Coast Railway Company was made by Edwin Goodall, a member of the firm of Goodall, Perkins & Co., general agents for said companies, and was not authorized by said companies." Judgment was then entered that the plaintiff take nothing by its action. From that judgment the plaintiff appealed, and has brought the case here on the judgment roll.

It is claimed for appellant that judgment should have been entered in its favor on the findings. We do not think so. Under the agreement the subscription of $70,000 was a condition precedent to the calling of a meeting and forming a corporation. And until that condition was complied with the defendant incurred no obligation to pay his subscription. Railroad Co. v. Schwartz, 53 Cal. 106. See, also, Amer. Law Reg., No. 7, and cases cited. But it very clearly appears that the condition was not complied with for two reasons: First. The second subscription for $10,000, having been made without authority, was invalid, and could not be counted in making up the $70,000. And, if the unauthorized act was afterwards ratified, still the rights of the defendant were not thereby affected, and could not be, without his consent. Civil Code, § 2313. Second. The second and third subscriptions, amounting to $22,500, were both conditional and not absolute. Under these circumstances, we think that the proper judgment was entered, and we advise that it be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

LOGAN et al. v. ROSE et al. (No. 13,922.) (Supreme Court of California. March 7, 1891.)

DEDICATION OF STREETS—ACCEPTANCE BY USER.

1. The owner of a tract of land platted it and conveyed the lots with reference to the plat. The plat showed that the streets were 80 feet wide, except C. street, which occupied a space 150 feet wide. A part of C. street, comprising a strip 80 feet wide, had been used as a public street for 11 years, when the owner conveyed a portion of said strip. Held, that there had been such an acceptance of the dedication as to the part so used, that it could not be revoked by such conveyance.

2. Where one holds lands by a deed absolute, and sells part thereof with reference to a recorded plat with streets marked upon it, parol evidence that he took the land subject to a trust, but not showing the nature thereof, is insufficient to rebut the presumption that he had authority to thus dedicate the streets to the public.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; PHIL W. KRYSER, Judge.

A. F. Jones, for appellants. Lewis Freer, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was for damages against Rose, as road-master, and the other defendants as his employers, advisers, etc., for the removal of embankments or approaches to the plaintiffs' warehouses. At the trial, on the conclusion of the plaintiffs' case, it appeared that neither Gray, Streeter, nor Smith, three of the defendants, had anything to do with the matter, so that a nonsuit was granted to them. After the argument and submission of the case, the court, sitting without a jury, gave judgment in favor of the defendant Rose for costs, and dismissed the plaintiffs' complaint on its merits. From the judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiffs appeal. They claimed the right to use and possess the land in controversy under a lease from the Central Pacific Railroad Company, who had derived its title by deed from Charles Crocker, and he by deed from the Contract & Finance Company. The defendants claimed that the land was dedicated to the use of the public as a street in the town of Biggs, in Butte county, before the plaintiffs obtained their lease.

The main question at issue here is whether the tenth finding of fact in reference to that dedication is sustained by the evidence. The plaintiffs claim that the street was dedicated only to the extent of 60 feet in width, but admit that if the dedicated width was of as much as 80 feet, then the judgment and order should be affirmed. The theory of the case as presented by the appellants seems to be that Charles Crocker (in whom the legal title was vested by the Contract & Finance Company on October 26, 1875) by his deed of April 28, 1886, conveying to the Central Pacific Railroad Company a strip of land 90 feet wide, which was a part of the land he acquired by his deed from the Contract & Finance Company, revoked any offer of dedication of the land in controversy as a street which had been before made, and that this revocation took place prior to any acceptance by the public of the street. There was evidence which tended to show that as early as 1870-71, there was a map made of the town of West Biggs, by the then owner of the land, upon which there were laid out blocks and streets, which last were all indicated to be 80 feet wide, except the one in controversy, here called "California Street." Between the east line of the blocks of land, as laid out, and the track of the Central Pacific Railroad, that map shows a space of 150 feet wide, in which is written the words "California Street." While the Contract & Finance Company owned land in Biggs, they made deeds to V. Bunnell, J. R. Buffington, M. Rosenberg, T. R. Fleming, of certain portions of it described as being in certain "blocks" as laid down on that map. When Crocker became the owner he made deeds of other lands so described, with reference to that map, to T. R. Fleming, Benjamin McVay, Sylvanus Shurtleff, S. Stockwell, William Bolt, and Barney Mushholt. The maps as originally made contained the words, between the front of blocks on the west side of the railroad track, "California Street." A line in pencil running along the space between the front row of blocks on the west side and the railroad track, and running through the written words "California Street," indicated the street as 60 feet wide. This line was run in pencil just before the deed of Charles Crocker to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, which deed was not made until April 28, 1886, many years after the map was made, and the deeds to the various parties to whom Mr. Crocker and the Contract & Finance Company had sold blocks or parts of blocks of land with reference to the map; the first deed of the latter having been made as early as August 18, 1873, and the earliest of the former having been May 15, 1878, the last of these deeds to individuals having been made by Mr. Crocker on October 11, 1884. The evidence introduced by the defendant tended to show that the public had used this strip marked "California Street" as a highway or street for about 15 years before the commencement of this action, to the extent of 80 feet wide, and that the encroachments removed by the defendant were upon the line of the street, taking it at 80 feet. It is apparently claimed by the plaintiffs that even if a dedication of the street at 80 feet wide had been offered by the making of the map and the sale of the land with reference thereto, when Charles Crocker, in 1886, deeded the 90-foot wide strip to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, this was a revocation of the offer, and up to that time the public had never accepted the dedication by user. It was said in People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 79, 22 Pac. Rep. 474: "Conceding that a platting of property and sale of lots constitutes a dedication, as between the owner and purchasers under him, of the streets delineated on the map, in order to constitute a dedication which can be taken advantage of by the public authorities of a city the offer of dedication must have been accepted by such authorities, either by user or some formal act of acceptance." And at page 80, 81 Cal., and page 477, 22 Pac. Rep., it is said: "Such acceptance must be within a reasonable time after such offer of dedication, and, if not accepted, the owner may resume the possession of the property, and thereby revoke his offer." Tested by these rules, (which seem to have been approved in City of Eureka v. Croghan, 81 Cal. 527,¹ and City of Eureka v. Armstrong, 83 Cal. 623, 22 Pac. Rep. 928 and 23 Pac. Rep. 1085,) it appears to us that in this case there existed a sufficient offer of dedication by the making of the map and the sale of lands with reference thereto. The user by the public for a long time prior to what is claimed to have been a revocation by the deed of Charles Crocker to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, under whom the plaintiffs claim by lease of the premises, is a sufficient acceptance of such offered dedication to make it complete before the attempted revocation, at least to the extent of a street 80 feet in width, which is enough for the purposes of this matter.

The further point is made that Charles Crocker, as trustee of the Central Pacific Company, had no authority to dedicate the land for a street. It does not appear distinctly from the record whether the Contract & Finance Company, or Mr. Crocker, first made the map, but they both sold land with reference to it, and the land was accepted by the public in using it as a street and highway as against both of them. But, in addition to this, there is nothing in the record to show any trust expressed in the deed from the Contract & Finance Company to Crocker. On the face of the deed, it must be presumed that he took the fee-simple title to the land. Code Civil Proc. § 1105; Mabury v. Ruiz, 58 Cal. 11-15. There is nothing in the evidence sufficient to rebut this proposition, or to show any kind of a trust capacity which Crocker bore inconsistent with the right to dedicate the land. At the most, the parol evidence was a declaration or opinion of the witness that Crocker held the land in a trust capacity; but as to the character of that trust no evidence whatever is given. We think the evidence sufficient to sustain the finding, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

I concur: VANCLIFF, C.

HAYNE, C. I concur in the conclusion.

TOWNSEND V. BRIGGS. (No. 13,727.)

NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION OF COURT—INADEQUATE DAMAGES.

In an action for personal injuries, where plaintiff recovered a verdict for $500, it was not an abuse of discretion to grant a new trial, where he was wrongfully assaulted by defendant, was then 46 years old, and in good health, and able to earn $60 per month, and the injury inflicted resulted in the loss of his arm, and the verdict was wholly inadequate to compensate him for the damage sustained.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. F. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Brousseau & Hatch, (Blackstock & Shepherd, of counsel,) for appellant Burnes & Selby and H. L. Poplin, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages in the sum of $20,000 for personal injuries alleged to have been wrongfully, wantonly, and maliciously caused by the defendant. The case was tried by a jury and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff for $500, on which judgment was entered. In due time the plaintiff served notice of his intention to move for a new trial upon the following grounds: "(1) Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; (2) that the verdict is against law; (3) errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the plaintiff." The notice stated that the motion would be made upon a bill of exceptions to be thereafter settled, and such a bill was thereafter settled and fled. The court granted the motion, but upon what ground does not appear, and the defendant appeals from the order. It is claimed for appellant that the bill of exceptions shows no errors in law committed at the trial, and contains no sufficient specification of the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to justify the verdict, and hence that the new trial was improperly granted. The bill of exceptions states that the plaintiff excepted to the verdict of the jury upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify it, and it contains specifications to the effect that, as shown by the evidence, plaintiff was wrongfully assaulted and beaten by the defendant; that he was then 46 years of age, and up to that time in good health, and able to earn $60 per month; that the injuries so inflicted resulted in the loss of his left arm, causing him great physical and mental pain, and in rendering him unable to earn his support; that "the verdict of five hundred dollars returned will not compensate plaintiff for the detriment proximately caused by said injury, and is not equivalent to the amount plaintiff will lose in one year as wages in earning capacity alone;" and that "the amount of the verdict, five hundred dollars, is wholly inadequate and insignificant as compensation for the damage sustained from said injury." We think the specification sufficient. Du Brutz v. Jessup, 54 Cal. 118; Bennett v. Hobro, 72 Cal. 178, 13 Pac. Rep. 473. The evidence showed very clearly that, without any sufficient cause, defendant struck plaintiff on the head with a mallet several times; that plaintiff was knocked down, and fell on a cutting-machine; that his left elbow joint was badly cut, and the principal arteries, veins, and nerves of the arm severed; that he had one scalp wound, an inch and a half long, cut through to the bone; that to save his life it was necessary to amputate his arm above the elbow, and that he suffered great pain both before and after the amputation. Under such a showing of the facts, the court may well have thought that $500 was a grossly inadequate sum to compensate the plaintiff for the injuries received, and may have granted the motion on that ground. And the rule is well settled that an order granting a new trial will not be reversed on appeal, if it can be justified on any of the grounds upon which the motion was made. Nally v. McDonald, 77 Cal. 284, 19 Pac. Rep. 418; Harnett v. Railroad Co., 78 Cal. 31, 20 Pac. Rep. 154; Curtiss v. Starr, 85 Cal. 376, 24 Pac. Rep. 806. We are unable to see that the court abused its discretion in granting the new trial, and we therefore advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNE, C.

ADAMS V. ANDROSS. (No. 13,006.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 10, 1891.)

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. F. VAN REYNES, Judge.

Whittemore & Sears, for appellant. Roger Johnson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This cause was submitted without argument, and there are no briefs on file. We do not know, therefore, upon what points appellant relies for a reversal. The ruling of the court below in sustaining the demurrer appears to be right. The judgment is affirmed.

MOORE v. MOODY. (No. 13,618.)*(Supreme Court of California. March 7, 1891.)REVIEW ON APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Joshua B. Webster and L. W. Elliott, for appellant. Davis & Hill, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover the sum of $450.80, balance of account, for goods alleged to have been sold and delivered by C. E. Williams & Co., plaintiff's assignors, to defendant. The answer denied all of the material averments of the complaint. The court below found upon all the issues against the plaintiff, and gave judgment for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. It is claimed for appellant that the findings of fact were not justified by the evidence, and that the judgment should therefore be reversed. No brief has been filed on behalf of respondent. The seventh finding reads as follows: "The said C. E. Williams & Co. did not sell to the defendant any of said merchandise, and defendant did not purchase the same, and the defendant was not at the time of the commencement of this action and is not indebted to the plaintiff in any sum." This finding, if justified, is conclusive of the case; and, after carefully reviewing the testimony brought up in the record, we think it is justified, and must be sustained. No useful purpose would be accomplished by stating the probative facts at length, and we therefore omit to do so. We advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

ELLEN v. LEWISON et al. (No. 13,601.)*(Supreme Court of California. March 6, 1891.)GIFTS—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by the guardian of a person claimed to have been non compos mentis to recover a gift, an amendment of the complaint to allow evidence of undue influence is not a surprise entitling defendants to a continuance, if it reasonably appeared from the complaint that undue influence was relied on.

2. An objection that the court required an amendment to the answer to be filed at once is without merit, where it appears that it was easily made.

3. Where defendant in such case seeks to show that the gift was made by her father because her brother-in-law had previously stolen a large sum of money from him, evidence that a large sum was carried to her father's house is inadmissible without proof of the time it was taken there.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Fred. Searls and H. L. Gear, for appellants. Thos. S. Ford, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants as the administrators of the estate of Emma J. Regli, deceased. The plaintiff obtained a verdict and judgment against the defendants in their representative capacity as prayed for, and from that judgment this appeal is taken, on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

The facts set up in the complaint were, in brief, that Elle Ellen, an incompetent person, who sues by his guardian, had been induced by his daughter, Mrs. Regli, to make her a gift of $15,850, which gift, "by reason of the premises, is utterly void, and the conversion of the said money was wrongful, and without consideration." The grounds which the plaintiff claims that he relied on to sustain his contention are that the gift was made by an incompetent person while being unduly influenced. Upon the trial, when evidence was sought to be introduced as to the fraud and undue influence claimed to have been exercised by Mrs. Regli, in her life-time, and to have induced the gift, the defendants objected that such evidence was inadmissible under the pleadings; that no such issue was tendered by the complaint; and that the only issue tendered was "that of mental incompetency to make the alleged gift." The court agreed with the defendants, and allowed the plaintiffs at once to amend the complaint, which was done in a few lines. Counsel for defendants insisted on being allowed 10 days in which to answer, but did not ask for any less number of days. The court ruled them to an immediate answer, which was made at once, and briefly, though sufficiently; and, as appears to us, this was easily done, and without any inconvenience. Whereupon they moved for a continuance on an affidavit alleging surprise, and that they must now adopt a different line of defense by reason of the amendment, and stated that they expected to be able to obtain proof upon "all of said new issues now tendered which is not now at their command," and that they needed further time, etc. The court refused to grant the continuance, and the trial proceeded, against the objection of the defendants. It is claimed that the court below was guilty of an abuse of discretion in not allowing time to file the amendment to the answer, and in refusing to grant a continuance. As to the first matter, it is plain that the amendment was easily made and filed as requested, and there certainly was no abuse of discretion in requiring this to be done. As to the other point, it is clear to us, from an inspection of the complaint, that it was the intention of the pleader to charge both that the gift was made when Elle Ellen was incompetent to make it, and also that he was induced to make it by the fraudulent acts and undue influence of Mrs. Regli. It is true that the pleading is not to be commended as a model in this respect, but we think it was sufficient. Out of abundant caution, apparently, the trial judge had the complaint amended and answered; but he was evidently of the opinion that there was no surprise sprung upon the defendants, and we agree with him.

It is further assigned for error that the court erred in refusing to allow the witness Schaffer to testify that Ellen, since the year 1868, and before his stroke of paralysis, was in the habit of keeping large sums of money in his house, and that the witness helped Ellen to carry $15,000 there. The purpose of this, we suppose, was to show that when Mrs. Regli, as testified to by Graham, had in the fall of 1886 upbraided her father with having willed his property to her sister, and that her sister's husband had come up to the father's place, after his attack of paralysis in the spring of that year, opened his safe, and carried "down his papers and money, and they had stolen $21,000," that she was speaking the truth, and that Joseph Sanders, the husband of her sister, had in his account of the matter sworn falsely. The evidence on this head sought to be elicited, just alluded to, as well as that the witness had helped "Mr. Ellen to carry $15,000 over to his house in gold coin," was not admissible, for the reason, if no other, that it does not appear at what definite time it would be shown that such money was kept or carried to Ellen's house. It might have been, for all that the evidence would have shown to the contrary, many years before the time when Sanders had gone to Ellen's house and taken away the money, as he is claimed to have done. It might have been in the year 1869, and Sanders took what money he carried to San Francisco in 1886. It is further objected that the witness was not allowed to state in contradiction of Sanders' statement (that he had taken away only about $5,080.50 in gold coin from Ellen's safe in 1886, and that he had the money in a hand-satchel, and the books and papers in a large satchel) "that Sanders was weighed down by two large satchels, which appeared to weigh 75 pounds each." The witness had just stated, without objection, that "when Sanders went to San Francisco he had two big valises, about 18 inches in length, and a foot in diameter, and they appeared to be very heavy." This was substantially what it was proposed he should again testify to, with a guess as to the weight of the satchels added. We do not think the action of the court resulted in prejudicial error. It was proposed, with a view to lay a foundation for Sanders' impeachment, to ask him whether, in the month of July, 1887, in the presence of various parties, Mr. Ellen had not used language to him indicating that Ellen believed Sanders and his wife had taken the money of the former. We suppose that if the witnesses had declared, as was evidently expected, that such had not been the case, the defendants would have introduced evidence to show that Ellen was angry with Sanders and wife, and that the cause of this anger was his belief that they had stolen his money. Admitting that the question had been answered by Sanders in the affirmative, or that, if he had not so answered, the defendants could have shown, as they proposed, that Ellen was angry at Sanders and wife, and because he believed that they had stolen from him, still the evidence could not have aided the defendants. There was nothing in it or the record which tended to show that Ellen had any belief as against the honesty of Sanders and wife, or anger at them on that account, except as derived from the statement of Mrs. Regli to him that they had stolen money from him. It was already proved that he was angry with them on that account, and further proof of the existence of such anger or bias would not have helped the defendants unless there was something to show that it had proceeded from some cause independent of Mrs. Regli's statements to him. So that, if the evidence was admissible, it was immaterial.

Admitting that the question put to Kruger was objectionable, yet the answers of the witness in reference to that and other questions on that line did not tend to support, but rather to negative, the counsel's theory of the plaintiff's mental incompetency, and no harm was done, nor do we think there was any misleading of the jury by the court allowing the question to be put.

McGlashan, a witness for defendants, who had testified to the check given by Ellen to Mrs. Regli, was asked this question: "Did he deliver that as his own voluntary act?" and an objection by plaintiff was sustained. Defendants then offered to prove by the witness that the check was signed and delivered voluntarily, and an objection to the offer was sustained. These rulings are assigned as reversible error. The objections were that the witness was attorney for Ellen at the time, and for that reason should not be allowed to testify; and that the testimony sought was mere expression of opinion about a matter which was for the determination of the jury, and was irrelevant, immaterial, etc. We doubt whether the question was admissible as a strict question of law. Certainly neither People v. Sanford, 43 Cal. 29, nor People v. Montelth, 73 Cal. 7, 14 Pac. Rep. 373, (relied on by appellants,) is closely in point. In the former case it was merely held proper for a witness to testify to the condition of the mind of a person at the time he made a dying declaration,—that is, "whether it was clear or confused;" and in the latter case, where there was a question as to the intoxication of the defendant, it was merely held proper for a witness to testify "what appeared to be his condition as to sobriety." But in the case at bar it was sought to prove by the opinion of the witness what the motive was which induced the third party to do a certain act, that is, whether he did the act "voluntarily." Such evidence might be admissible under peculiar circumstances, but we doubt if it was admissible in the case at bar. But if it be admitted that the court erred on this point, the error was not of sufficient importance to work a reversal of the judgment. When a case like this one has been upon the whole fairly submitted to a jury, a mere abstract error doing no injury will be disregarded. The witness McGlashan had testified very fully to the condition of Ellen's mind at the time the check was given. He had said "that his mental condition was as sound as he ever knew him to be, as he had every opportunity of testing it; that he talked very intelligently on business matters; that he was present when the check was given to Emma Regli, about the 25th of March; that Ellen signed the check in his presence, and stated his reasons for making the gift, and he saw the check delivered to Mrs. Regli by Mr. Ellen; that others were present at the time; and that he himself drew the body of the check at Mr. Ellen's request; and [testified] to all the circumstances that occurred at the time." Now, this testimony was just as clearly to the point—and must have been so understood by the jury—that, in the opinion of the witness, the check was signed and delivered voluntarily, as if the word "voluntary" or "voluntarily," had been expressly used by the witness; and it would be an unjust thing to reverse the case because the witness was not allowed afterwards to add the word "voluntary." It is quite clear that no substantial injury was done by the ruling of the court on this point. The judgment is affirmed.

CORPORATIONS—STOCKHOLDERS—FRAUDS OF MAJORITY—RIGHTS OF MINORITY—PLEADING.

1. A purchase of lands from a corporation by one of the directors, at one-tenth of its real value, raises a presumption of fraud against him, and he must show affirmatively that the transaction was perfectly fair.

2. The owners of a majority of the stock of a corporation, who persuade their "implements and representatives" on the board of directors to convey to them the property of the corporation for a grossly inadequate consideration, in fraud of the minority stockholders, must be held to have participated in the fraud of the directors.

3. A complaint which alleges that plaintiffs and defendants are stockholders in a corporation; that the directors are the "implements and representatives" of defendants, who own a majority of the stock; and that the directors conveyed to defendants land of the corporation at one-tenth of its real value, in fraud of the other stockholders,—states facts constituting actual fraud, and is sufficient on demurrer.

4. Defendants acquired a large tract of land, agreeing to pay the deferred purchase money in annual installments, but reserving to themselves the right to pay the whole of it "at any time before maturity." They then organized a corporation, conveyed the land to it, received stock in exchange, and agreed with the corporation to pay the unpaid purchase price of the land "at maturity." To secure the performance of this agreement, 10,000 shares of the stock issued to defendants were placed in escrow, but subsequently the corporation permitted such stock to be delivered to defendants, on condition that it should be sold by them at a specified rate, and that the proceeds, "as received," should be applied by them to the extinguishment of the debt. Held, that a complaint which alleges that defendants applied the cash proceeds to their own use, in violation of the conditions on which the stock was delivered to them, is not demurrable for its failure to allege that the deferred purchase price of the land had become due, as defendants had it in their power to pay at any time before maturity, and the conditions on which the stock was delivered to them made it their duty to so apply the proceeds "as received" by them.

5. The allegation in the complaint that defendants applied the cash proceeds of the stock to their own use, and did not pay the debt, is a sufficient showing of the non-performance of their contract, as the court will not presume that some third person paid the debt, or that the corporation was substituted as the debtor on the transfer of the land to it.

6. The fact that defendants, on the sale of the stock, received only part of the purchase price in cash, and that the complaint contains no allegation that they converted to their own use the notes given for the balance, does not give rise to the presumption that they turned such notes over to the corporation in satisfaction of the agreement, as such agreement provides that the proceeds shall be applied by defendants in extinguishment of the debt to the original owners of the land, and not that they shall be turned over to the corporation.

7. The complaint is not rendered defective by its failure to allege that the corporation has paid out any money or sustained any damage by defendant's failure to perform their agreement to pay the deferred purchase price of the land, as such payment is essential to the protection of the corporation's right to the property.

8. After selling the stock, and converting the cash proceeds to their own use, defendants induced the corporation, without consideration, to assume the debt for the deferred purchase money of the land. They then purchased back the stock, which had greatly depreciated in value, and by means of their control over the corporation sold to it the stock at a price greatly exceeding its market value. Held, that the approval of such sale at a stockholders' meeting will not affect the rights of the minority stockholders, who did not consent thereto.

9. The right of the minority stockholders to attack these various transactions between defendants and the corporation is not affected by the fact that they are completely "executed," as such transactions were not merely beyond the powers of the corporation, but procured by the fraud of defendants, who controlled it; nor need the minority stockholders offer to place defendants in statu quo.

10. The fact that the stock transferred by defendants to the corporation had originally been regarded as sufficient security for the performance of defendants' agreement to pay the deferred purchase price of the land is no defense to an action for their fraudulent sale of it to the corporation, where it is shown that such stock had greatly depreciated in value in the mean time.

11. Since the directors of the corporation were only defendants' "implements and representatives," and since it was not shown that they received or had any interest in the fruits of defendants' transactions, it was not necessary to join them as defendants.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Wicks & Ward, for appellants. Wilson & Lamme, M. T. Allen, and Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. This was a suit in equity by three stockholders of the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company for relief against certain transactions of the company with the defendants, F. C. Howes, George H. Bonebrake, and Samuel Merrill. The trial court gave final judgment for the defendants upon demurrer to the complaint, and the plaintiffs appeal. The complaint consists of 75 printed pages, and is exceedingly prolix and involved. It contains three causes of action separately stated. The demurrer was to the whole complaint and to each separate cause of action.

1. The substance of the material facts alleged in the first division of the complaint is as follows: At the period in question two of the plaintiffs and the defendants, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, were stockholders of the corporation. The third plaintiff acquired his stock somewhat later than the others, but this is not material, in the view we have taken. The defendant Howes was a director of the company, and it is alleged that the other members of the board "were only nominal directors thereof for the purpose of carrying out the plans and subverting the individual interests of the defendants, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and had no interest in the management and conduct of its affairs, except as the implements and representatives of the interests and wills of defendants, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill." In this condition of affairs the "said board of directors, disregarding the interests and rights of all stockholders of said company other than said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and for the purpose of defrauding such stockholders, and through the connivance of said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and for the purpose of subverting the individual interests of said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill," sold to them for the price of $30 per acre certain specifically described lands, which "carried with them, as incident or appurtenant thereto, their pro rata proportion of all the waters owned by the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company." At the time of this transaction the land sold was worth the sum of $300 per acre, which was known to all the parties. Subsequently the three defendants named became directors of the company, and were so at the commencement of the suit. The plaintiffs demanded that a suit be commenced in the name of the corporation; but, this demand not having been complied with, the plaintiffs brought the present suit on behalf of themselves and the other stockholders, joining the corporation as a defendant.

In addition to the foregoing facts much unnecessary matter is alleged, as, for example, the representations which the defendants made to the plaintiffs at the time the latter acquired their stock. The suit is not for relief against the contract under which they acquired said stock, and hence the representations referred to are immaterial. So, too, it is immaterial to the case stated in this division of the complaint how the corporation acquired its rights to the property, though it may be permissible to state such facts to show that the three causes of action grew out of the same set of transactions. In support of their demurrer to this part of the complaint the defendants make the following points:

(a) It is said that a main foundation of this part of the case is inadequacy of price, and that "inadequacy of price does not even raise a presumption of fraud." This may be true as to persons who do not stand in a fiduciary relation towards each other; but it is not true as to persons whose relations are fiduciary. A trustee is not ordinarily allowed to make money out of his cestui que trust. If he does, the presumption is against him, and he must show affirmatively that the transaction was perfectly fair. Inadequacy of consideration in such a case is one of the facts constituting the fraud. Golson v. Dunlap, 73 Cal. 157, 14 Pac. Rep. 576. And it is hardly necessary to say that the relation which a director sustains to his corporation is fiduciary within the meaning of the rule. In the present case it is not necessary to consider whether the inadequacy of consideration alleged is sufficient to make a case of constructive fraud, because, as will be shown below, there are other allegations, which, in connection with the one mentioned, make a case of actual fraud.

(b) It is urged at this time Howes only was a director, that the other four constituted a majority of the board, that it is not shown that Howes took any part as director in the act complained of, and that the mere fact that the three defendants persuaded the disinterested majority of the board to do the act complained of does not amount to fraud. "Persuasion," say the learned counsel, "is never fraudulent." In one sense it may be true that persuasion is not fraudulent. In the same sense it may be said that persuasion is not theft. Yet if a man persuades his "implements and representatives" to steal, and knowingly shares the booty, he is certainly guilty of theft; and so, if he persuades his implements and representatives to commit a fraud, and knowingly takes the fruits thereof, he is guilty of fraud. In the case before us it is admitted for the purposes of the demurrer that the directors were the implements and representatives of Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and acted with their "connivance," for the purpose of defrauding the other stockholders in the interest of said defendants. Such conduct was clearly fraudulent on the part of the directors; and, as said defendants connived at such fraud, and received the fruits thereof, they must be held to have participated therein.

(c) It is contended that the charges of fraud are too general. All that is necessary for the pleader to do in this regard, however, is to set forth the facts constituting the fraud in ordinary and concise language. Now, what are the facts constituting the fraud? In the first place, there is the fact of the relation of the parties, viz., that the plaintiffs and defendants were stockholders of the corporation, and that the directors were the implements and representatives of Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill. This is set forth with sufficient particularity. It was not necessary to state the means by which said defendants induced the directors to act as their implements and representatives. It is sufficient to the case made by the complaint that they did so act. In the second place, there is the fact that the land was worth $300 per acre, and was sold to said defendants for $30 per acre. It was surely sufficient to allege this in terms; and the criticism made upon it does not seem to be that the fact is not stated with sufficient particularity, but that it is not true. "An allegation," say the learned counsel, "may be so absurd that not even a demurrer will admit it, and in this case the court is presumed by the counsel for the appellants to assume that this property had increased in value from April to August, 1887, something like two thousand per cent. There are some things that even courts are presumed to know, one of which is that unimproved property in such vast tracts does not increase in value from four to five thousand per cent. per annum." The basis of this position is stated by counsel to be that the land was purchased from Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill at $15 per acre in April, 1887. The allegation of the complaint, however, is that it was purchased for 29,995 shares of stock of the par value of $100 per share. It does not appear what the actual value of the stock was at said time, nor even what was the price agreed to be paid to the original owners of the property. Nor does this division of the complaint show what was the size of the tract. But, aside from all this, the value of the land at the time of the sale complained of is alleged to have been $300 per acre. This is the allegation of a fact, and, being such, was admitted by the demurrer; and after having been so admitted its truth cannot be questioned for the purposes of the demurrer. Finally, the complaint alleges that this transfer to Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill for one-tenth of the value of the property was made knowingly, and for the purposes of defrauding the other stockholders. In Moss v. Riddle, 5 Cranch, 357, Chief Justice MARSHALL says: "Fraud consists in intention, and that intention is a fact which ought to be averred, for it is the gist of the plea, and would have been traversable." The fraudulent intent or purpose, therefore, is one of the facts constituting actual fraud; and we think that an allegation of such fact in terms is sufficient. No amount of circumlocution or amplification can convey the meaning better than to say that a transfer by the directors of a corporation for one-tenth of the value of the property was for the purpose or with the intent of defrauding the stockholders. It may be necessary to add other facts. But, so far as this fact is concerned, the mode of statement is sufficient. All that the Code requires is to state the facts in ordinary and concise language.

The foregoing facts, taken together, constituted actual fraud, and were sufficiently alleged. It may be added that it was not necessary to specify the particular water-rights which were attached to the land conveyed. The several tracts were sufficiently described. And it was not material to the case to specify what rights were "carried with them as incident or appurtenant thereto."

2. The second cause of action begins by stating in detail how the corporation acquired its rights to the property, and shows, in substance, the following facts: Before the corporation was organized, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill had a contract of purchase from one Henry Pierce and associates for 28,414.63 acres of land for the sum of $426,219.45. This contract was executed on October 15, 1886, and $50,000 was paid thereon in cash. The remainder of the price was to be paid in annual installments of $50,000 each, bearing interest at 5 per cent. per annum. But it was provided by said contract that "said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill might pay the whole or any part of the purchase money at any time before maturity." It is not expressly stated when the conveyance was to be made, but the presumption from what is stated is that it was not to be made until the price was fully paid. The said defendants also acquired a smaller tract, known as the "Morse Place." But it is not necessary to dwell upon that. In February, 1887, the defendants, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, caused the Semi-Tropic Land & Water Company to be incorporated, and on April 16, 1887, they conveyed to it "the properties" above referred to, and agreed to "pay off and satisfy at maturity the debts then existing against the property, * * * such debts being then owing by Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill upon the above-described land and water-rights purchased from Pierce and associates, and from Morse, on account of the unpaid purchase price of said properties." In consideration of the foregoing transfer and agreement the corporation transferred 29,995 shares of its stock; but only 19,995 were transferred directly to Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill. The remaining 10,000 shares were transferred to one S. B. Hunt, to be held as security for the performance by said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill of their agreement to pay off said unpaid purchase money. After this the plaintiffs acquired their stock, and it is alleged that certain representations were made to them by defendants; but we do not consider such representations material in the case. This division of the complaint goes on to allege that "the directors of said corporation other than said Howes owned only one share of the stock of said company, and were only nominal directors thereof, and had no interest in the management and conduct of its affairs, except as the implements and representatives of the interests and wills of defendants, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill." In this condition of affairs it is alleged that said defendants effected an arrangement with the directors whereby the 10,000 shares held by the trustee as security for the performance by said defendants of the agreement to pay off the unpaid purchase money above mentioned was allowed to be withdrawn by them upon condition that the same should be sold at not less than $40 per share, and the proceeds (less 5 per cent. commission) applied "as received" to the extinguishment of the debts affecting the property. The statement of this agreement or condition is somewhat loose; but the counsel for the defendants have not made any criticism upon it, but have assumed that it is a sufficient statement of the condition or agreement upon which the stock was given up to said defendants; and, following the lead of counsel, we have so assumed for the purposes of this opinion. This arrangement was made on August 27, 1887. Previously to that date Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill had negotiated a sale of said stock at $42.50 per share, and it was finally sold at that price, making an aggregate of $425,000 for the 10,000 shares. Of this sum said defendants received $125,000 in cash on October 15, 1887. The remainder was to be paid in installments, drawing interest at 8 per cent. per annum. It does not appear whether these installments were ever paid, or what was done with the evidences of the indebtedness. Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill did not comply with the condition upon which they obtained said stock. Prior to the receipt by them of the $125,000 they had made the following payments on account of the purchase money of the property transferred to the company, viz., $50,000 on the execution of the contract of purchase from Pierce and associates, $42,000 on August 31, 1887, and $34,800 on September 19, 1887. On the day of the receipt of the $125,000 they made a further payment of $29,189.48. Now, as the first three payments were made before the $125,000 was received, it is manifest that they could not have come out of that sum. And it is expressly alleged that "all of said $125,000 received by said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, saving and excepting the said $29,189.48, or thereabouts, has been appropriated and used by said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill for their own individual use and benefit, in violation of the rights of said corporation and the stockholders thereof." And it is further alleged that "no other or further sums of money than those above mentioned have ever been paid by said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, or either of them, to said Pierce and associates on account of the purchase price of said premises." The plaintiffs further allege the refusal of the corporation to sue, etc., and that the suit is commenced by them on behalf of all the stockholders.

In support of their demurrer to this division of the complaint, the defendants make the following points:

(a) It is said that the sums which are admitted to have been paid on account of the purchase money on the property were sufficient to pay the first two annual installments thereof; that it is not alleged that the other installments were due at the time of the commencement of the action; and that the court will not compel the defendants to pay them before maturity. But the defendants had the privilege of paying all of such installments "at any time before maturity," and the condition on which they received the stock was that they would apply the proceeds in the way mentioned, "as received."

(b) It is said that the plaintiffs have not alleged that any installment of the purchase money remains unpaid; and that, under the rule that pleadings are to be construed against the pleader, it must be presumed that such installments have been paid, or satisfied in some collateral way. It is to be observed that it does not appear that the corporation was legally bound to pay the unpaid purchase money, although its rights would be impaired by non-payment; and it is to be further observed that Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill were not guarantying to pay the debt of another. They were the persons—and the only persons—who were bound to pay said purchase money. They agreed with the corporation, in the first instance, that they would pay their own debt; and in the second, that they would apply the proceeds of the stock to such payment. They did not so apply said proceeds, but converted them to their own use; and it is alleged that they did not pay the debt. This is sufficient showing of non-performance of their obligation. The court will not presume that some benevolent third person has paid the debt. And if, on the failure of the defendants to apply the proceeds of the stock to the debt, as agreed, the corporation paid it, that would not relieve said defendants from liability. Nor will the court presume that there has been any novation or accord and satisfaction by which the debt to the original owners of the property has been satisfied. If any such arrangement has been had it is matter to be set up by way of defense. The presumption against the pleader applies in certain cases; as, for example, where the pleading is silent as to an essential fact which must have occurred one way or the other, or where the language used is fairly susceptible of two constructions. But it is not carried to such an extent as to require the pleader to anticipate matters of defense, or to negative the existence of all other facts whatever. Even at common law that was not required; and much less is it required under a system where pleadings are required to be liberally construed with a view to substantial justice. Code Civil Proc. § 452.

(c) It is said that it does not appear what was done with the evidence of debt representing the balance of the proceeds of the sale of the 10,000 shares of stock; and that it must be presumed either that they were turned over to the persons to whom the debt was due, (which is sufficiently answered by what we have just said,) or that they were turned over to the corporation itself, and received by it in satisfaction of the agreement of the defendants. But such agreement was not that the proceeds of the stock were to be turned over to the corporation. They were to be applied to the extinguishment of the debt to the original owners; and the court will hardly presume that some entirely new arrangement was made.

(d) It is said that it is not shown that the corporation has paid any money on account of said debts, or that it has sustained any damage by reason of the alleged non-performance by said defendants of their agreement. But the payment of the purchase money on the original contracts of purchase is essential to the protection of the corporation's right to the property, and if said defendants have not paid said money as they agreed to do, and have converted the cash proceeds of the stock to their own use, the corporation (or a stockholder, in a proper case) has the right to come into equity to compel the defendants to perform their agreement with the corporation.

3. The third division of the complaint contains the substance of the second division, and in addition thereto shows the following facts: Of the sum due to the original owners of the property the defendants, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, paid no more than $155,989.48. But prior to the transaction to be mentioned they had induced the board of directors to pay on account of said debt the sum of $25,000, which, it is alleged, "was paid on account of defendants, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and at their instance and request," which, if true, entitles the corporation to recover it back. These payments left due to the original owners of the property the sum of $272,441.63, for which said defendants were personally liable. In order to get rid of such liability, it is alleged that they induced their creatures in the board of directors to have the corporation assume the debt without consideration. The allegations in this regard are as follows: That the directors, "for the purpose of defrauding the other stockholders of said company other than said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and for the purpose of incumbering the property of said corporation with debt, without any consideration moving in favor of said corporation, or in favor of any other of the stockholders of said corporation other than said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and with the intent of relieving and releasing Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill from their obligation to pay off and discharge the debts upon the lands and waters of said corporation, did, by connivance and collusion with said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and with their consent, and at their request and instigation," issue notes of the company to the original owners of the property in an aggregate sum of $272,441.63, bearing interest at 7 per cent. per annum, and mortgaged the property of the corporation to secure the payment of such notes, and that "such notes were given without any consideration in favor of said corporation, or of any of the stockholders thereof other than Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and solely for the benefit of Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and with the intent to relieve said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill from their obligations to pay off and satisfy at maturity the indebtedness upon the lands and waters of said corporation, for which debts said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill were bound and obligated." It is further alleged that in and about the above transaction the directors unlawfully paid an attorney's fee of $5,000, which sum "was paid for the sole benefit of defendants Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill." The complaint goes on to allege that prior to September 20, 1888, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill bought up the 10,000 shares of stock which they had sold about a year previously, (the proceeds of which sale they had converted to their own use,) and sold the same to the corporation at a grossly exorbitant price,—the consideration being a credit of the $272,444 assumed by the corporation as above set forth, the conveyance by it of $50,000 worth of land, and the issuance of its promissory notes for the remainder of the price. In relation to this transaction it is alleged that about four months after the assumption by the corporation of the debt above mentioned it was proposed by Merrill, at a stockholders' meeting held September 20, 1888, that the corporation should buy said stock at $37 per share, payment to be made in the manner above stated, viz., that a credit of $272,444 should be allowed the company for having assumed the debt of Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill; that the company should assume a debt of $14,440, due from said defendants on the Morse property, and another debt of $850; that "the sum of $50,000 be paid in lands of the company, to be deeded to three trustees representing the parties to whom the 10,000 shares of stock had been formerly sold," and that "the balance of said purchase price of $370,000 be paid in notes of the company;" that this proposal was accepted at said stockholders' meeting, and that a resolution to that effect was passed, said defendants and others voting in favor thereof; and that immediately thereafter the arrangement was carried out by the directors. It is further alleged that "such 10,000 shares of stock were then and there, at the time of such stockholders' and directors' meeting, the property of said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, having been obtained by them from the former purchasers thereof," and that "at the time such stockholders' and directors' meeting was held, and such 10,000 shares of stock purchased by said corporation, the said stock was not worth in the open market, and could not have been sold for, more than $25 per share, all of which facts were well known to said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill;" that all of the acts in relation to the transaction above mentioned "were done while said Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill were the owners of a majority of the corporate stock of said corporation," and while said Bonebrake and Merrill were directors of said corporation, and "at the actual instance, request, and instigation of defendants, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill, and for their own personal interest and benefit," and that at said stockholders' meeting "1,910 shares of the capital stock of said corporation were not represented either in person or by proxy; that the stock of plaintiffs herein named was not represented or voted at such meeting, and that plaintiffs did not appear or ratify such action of such stockholders' meeting." It is further alleged that the corporation has paid the sum of $17,150 as interest upon the debt assumed by it as above mentioned, and that subsequent to the transactions above set forth it has borrowed the sum of $250,000 from a third person, and mortgaged its property to secure the payment thereof, and with the moneys so raised, and its note for $50,000, it has paid off the debt to the original owners of the property, assumed by it as above stated. In support of their demurrer to this portion of the complaint the defendants make the following points:

(a) They renew the points as to the presumption of payment or satisfaction in some other way, made in relation to the second cause of action. These have been sufficiently considered.

(b) They urge that the corporation had power to purchase its own capital stock, and that the resolution at the stockholders' meeting was sufficient warrant for the terms of the purchase. It is not necessary to decide upon this appeal whether the corporation had power to purchase its own stock. Such a power even would not excuse the fraud of the defendants. That they were guilty of fraud is plain, if the allegations of the complaint are true. They were personally liable for the debt to the original owners of the property, and agreed with the corporation that they would pay such debt. They obtained the stock put up as security for their performance of said agreement, upon condition that they would apply the proceeds of such stock "as received" to the extinguishment of said debt. Instead of so doing they converted the cash proceeds to their own use, leaving the debt unpaid, and induced their creatures in the board to have the corporation assume the debt without consideration. This action on the part of the board was in the interest of said defendants, "and for the purpose of defrauding the other stockholders." Such conduct on the part of the directors was unquestionably fraudulent, and the persons who instigated such fraud and reaped the fruits thereof must be held to have participated therein. In order to cover up this fraud it is alleged that they committed another. About four months after the assumption of the debt by the corporation as above set forth, they bought up the 10,000 shares of stock which they had sold a year previously at $42.50 per share, (the cash proceeds of which they had converted to their own use,) and by means of their control over the corporation sold said stock to it at $37 per share,—it then being worth only $25 per share. At this time Bonebrake and Merrill were in the board, and the other directors were the mere creatures of the three defendants. We do not think that any argument is required to show that this transaction was fraudulent. It certainly does not help the fraud first mentioned. Nor is the resolution at the stockholders' meeting of any consequence; for, since the defendants held a majority of the stock and voted at the meeting, they controlled the meeting, and the resolution was in effect but their formal consent to their own fraud. It cannot affect the rights of the stockholders who did not consent.

(c) It is urged that the transaction was "executed," and therefore cannot be disturbed. But, whatever color of force this might have, if the objection was merely that the transaction was ultra vires, it has no application to a case where there is fraud.

(d) It is objected that there was no offer to place Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill in statu quo. But the suit is not for a rescission of the contract whereby the plaintiffs acquired their stock, and therefore no such action on their part was required. So far as the 10,000 shares sold to the corporation are concerned, it is sufficient to say that, aside from any other reason, the three defendants constitute a majority of the board, and must be presumed to have control of such stock. So far as concerns the $300,000 evidences of debt (the balance of the proceeds of the first sale of the 10,000 shares of stock) which the counsel say "have vanished from view," it is sufficient to say that, aside from any other reason, such evidences of debt are not shown to have ever come to the possession of the corporation. If they did, it must be under the control of the defendants.

(e) It is argued that, if the theory of the plaintiffs be correct, the result is that the original contract of Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill is still in force, and that it must be presumed that they will perform it; that is to say, it must be presumed that they will pay off the debts to the original owners of the property. As the corporation has mortgaged its property to raise money to pay off such debts, and has actually paid them off, this position is somewhat singular.

(f) It is said that "the whole effect of the transaction mentioned has been that the corporation is vested with a perfect title to the identical stock which it originally regarded as sufficient collateral, and taken by the corporation at a sum far less than the amount of the indebtedness to which it was originally regarded as a sufficient security. There is no damage shown, and there could be no action without damage." That is to say, that because the corporation originally regarded the 10,000 shares of stock as sufficient security for the performance of the defendants' agreement, they could sell the stock at $42.50 per share, and convert the cash proceeds to their own use in direct violation of their agreement to apply it to the debt affecting the corporation's property, and about a year afterwards buy up the same stock, and by fraudulent means induce the corporation to purchase it at $37 per share when it was only worth $25 per share in the market, and then say to the other stockholders: "Well, the corporation has the stock, which it originally regarded as sufficient collateral. How is it injured?"

(g) It is said that "all the parties have permitted the transaction to rest for more than a year, and that to permit a rescission would be to do violence to every principle of law and equity." But we do not think that the doctrine of laches applies.

4. The demurrer takes the ground that there is a defect of parties defendant, a misjoinder of parties, and a misjoinder of causes of action. The first ground is the only one which is argued. It is said that the other members of the board of directors should have been joined as defendants. So far as the corporation's interests are concerned, it is itself a defendant. As to the rest, Howes, Bonebrake, and Merrill are the only persons interested in the transactions complained of. The other directors were only their "implements and representatives," and are not shown to have received or to have any interest in the fruits of said transactions. It was not necessary to join them as defendants. The other grounds mentioned have not been argued. The fact that there was a demurrer on these grounds is mentioned in the statement of facts; but there is not a word of argument in either of the briefs for respondents in relation to the grounds, or anything to give rise to the inference that they are relied upon. Under these circumstances, the grounds mentioned should be considered as waived.

5. We do not think that it is necessary for the court to determine at this stage of the case the precise measure of equitable relief to be awarded. A court of equity molds its relief according to the particular circumstances of the case. Heinlen v. Martin, 53 Cal. 342, 343. And it is better to reserve the question mentioned until all the circumstances shall have been disclosed by the evidence. It is sufficient for the disposition of the demurrer to say that in our opinion each division of the complaint states a cause of action, and requires an answer to the charges made. We therefore advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer, with leave to the defendants to answer.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to overrule the demurrer, with leave to the defendants to answer.

WOODY et al. v. BENNETT et al. (No. 14,070.)

SALES—BREACH OF WARRANTY—DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

1 Defendants sold plaintiffs a horse, and agreed to exchange him for any other horse they might have, if certain blemishes, which they guaranteed would disappear on the use of proper remedies, did not do so. Held that, in an action for breach of the contract in that the blemishes did not disappear, evidence of the expenses of plaintiffs in treating them is admissible to show their good faith.

2. In such case, evidence of the amount paid for the horse is admissible on the question of damages.

3. It is competent on the question of damages to show how the blemishes affected the value of the horse.

4. Where defendants told plaintiffs to use any ordinary simple remedies, they cannot show by a witness that the blemishes could have been removed by use of a remedy known only to himself.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

J. M. Damron and Charles G. Lambertson, for appellants. Davis & Allen, for respondents.

HAYNE, C. The defendants sold and delivered to the plaintiffs a stallion called "Lord Roxbury," for the sum of $3,000, and gave to them the following contract: "Tulare, Cal., Feb. 7, 1887. This is to certify that we, E. Bennett & Son, have this day sold Lord Roxbury (1) to J. H. Woody, James Twaddle, I. N. Wright & Irwin Brothers, and we guaranty that the two small thicknesses on the hocks shall go off if said parties use proper applications and rubbing, and, in the case said bunches do not disappear, we will exchange with said parties for any horse of the same price we may have. E. BENNETT & SON." The plaintiffs gave evidence tending to show that they used the applications recommended by the defendants, but that the bunches were hereditary and irremovable. On these points the evidence is conflicting. But there is no dispute about the fact that the bunches did not disappear. And after a time the plaintiffs requested that an exchange be made for another horse, as provided by the contract. The defendants at first expressed a willingness to make the exchange, and the plaintiffs thereupon selected a horse called Lord Roxbury, Second, then in Kansas. But, after some correspondence on the subject, the defendants annexed a condition to the right of exchange, which will be considered below. The plaintiffs thereupon brought the present action. The jury found a verdict in their favor for $1,500, and the defendants appealed.

We are somewhat inclined to think that the contract contains two separate and distinct undertakings, viz.: (1) That the blemishes should disappear if proper treatment was used, and (2) that if they did not disappear the defendants would exchange the horse for another of the same price; and that, since the undertakings were separate, it was not necessary to an action on the first to show that plaintiffs had offered to exchange, and not necessary to an action on the second to show that proper treatment was used. But we shall assume in favor of the defendants that it was necessary to any recovery by plaintiffs that they should show both that they had used proper treatment, and that they had made a proper offer to exchange.

1. There was evidence tending to show that the defendants told the plaintiffs "to use on these bunches any ordinary simple remedies that is usually used for that purpose," and that the plaintiffs used remedies which were ordinarily used for such purpose, and afterwards employed a veterinary. There was evidence contradicting the foregoing. But at this stage of the case the evidence in support of the verdict must be presumed to be true, and if true it was sufficient. It must be taken to be the fact, therefore, that the plaintiffs used proper treatment.

2. It is argued that in their letter announcing their selection of another horse (then in Kansas) the plaintiffs made it a condition that he "should arrive all right" at Tulare, and that they had no right to impose such a condition. It might, perhaps, be suggested in this connection that the defendants' senior partner admitted on the stand that it was his understanding that the exchange should be made at Tulare. But it is not necessary to express an opinion upon the merit of the above contention, for the reason that after some correspondence the defendants refused to consent to any exchange, except upon a condition which was entirely unwarranted. In a letter to the attorney in whose hands the plaintiffs had placed their claim, the defendants' senior partner says: "We are ready and willing to change, but those parties must take the imported English coach mare that we imported expressly for them, on their order, at $2,000. That was the price I told them she would cost them delivered at Tulare, and they ordered us to bring her at that price. We are ready and willing to live up to our contract on the horse, and they must do the same on the mare; or, if they do not want to take the mare, they must relieve us from the contract to exchange the horse." And in his final letter on the subject he says: "We will most willingly exchange, but remember we will send the mare with the horse." Now, even if it were assumed that the defendants could make the performance by plaintiffs of a separate and distinct contract a condition of the right of exchange, the fact was that there was no contract on the part of the plaintiffs in reference to a mare, and this was admitted at the trial. This conduct on the part of the defendants amounted to a refusal to comply with their contract, and supersedes any question as to the place of delivery of the new horse.

3. The evidence justifies the amount of damages awarded. There was evidence tending to show that the plaintiffs purchased the stallion for breeding purposes, and that the defendants knew this; that without the blemishes mentioned he was worth the sum paid for him, viz., $3,000; but that the blemishes were hereditary, and injured his value for breeding purposes, and that with them he was worth under $500. A foundation was laid for this evidence in the complaint, and we think that it was admissible, and sufficient to justify the verdict.

4. There are several other matters which may be briefly disposed of:

(a) It was not error to admit evidence of the expenses incurred by the plaintiffs in treating the horse's legs. It was expressly stated by the court that such evidence was not admitted for the purpose of increasing the damages, but only for the purpose of showing an effort in good faith to remove the blemishes.

(b) There was no attempt to alter or add to the written contract by parol. The conversations proven bore upon the condition and value of the horse at the time he was sold.

(c) The evidence as to what plaintiffs paid for the horse was admissible upon the question of damages.

(d) It was proper to prove that the blemishes affected the horse's success for breeding purposes.

(e) Evidence as to the nature of the blemishes, their cause and probable duration, had relation to his value, and consequently was admissible on the question of damages.

(f) The defendants having told the plaintiffs to use any ordinary, simple remedies, and the plaintiffs having done so, it was immaterial whether the witness Dickenson thought he could have removed the blemishes by some remedies known only to himself.

(g) The evidence of the witness Edwards was more favorable to the defendants than otherwise.

(h) The instruction as to the propriety of the remedies recommended by the defendants was proper. (See first head of this opinion.)

(i) Evidence of readiness to make the exchange in Kansas was irrelevant, for the reasons stated in the second head of this opinion. We therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

CONTEMPT—WHAT CONSTITUTES—ADVICE OF ATTORNEY.

1. A defendant who interferes with the possession of plaintiff's tenant by driving his cattle from the land, and offering to lease to another, when a decree prohibits him or his attorneys from entering upon the land, or interfering with plaintiffs or their tenants in the possession, control, or ownership thereof, is guilty of contempt of court.

2. In such case, defendant's attorney is guilty of contempt in advising such interference.

In bank. Applications for habeas corpus. C. H. Clement, for petitioners. A. L. Rhodes and Geo. Lesinsky, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. These two proceedings were heard on Monday, March 9, 1891, on returns of the sheriff of Sacramento county to the writs of habeas corpus. The conclusions of this court, remanding the petitioners to the custody of said sheriff, were on the same day announced; but through some inadvertence the proper orders were not delivered to the clerk, and were therefore not entered by him. The petitioners are in custody by virtue of an order of the superior court of Sacramento county.—Judge A. P. CATLIN, presiding,—punishing them for contempt, which consisted in violating a decree rendered in said court—ex-Judge J. W. ARMSTRONG then presiding—in a certain action in that court entitled "James C. Pennie, Administrator, et al. vs. Sebastian Fisher et al." The petitioner, Vance, was a party defendant in that action, and the decree enjoined and restrained him, and his agents, attorneys, employes, etc., from entering upon any of the lands described in the complaint therein, and from interfering with the plaintiffs in said action or either of them, or their tenants, grantees, or agents in the possession, control, or ownership, of such lands. The other petitioner, Carpenter, was Vance's attorney in said action. The findings of the superior court in the contempt matters are very full, and show that the petitioner Vance violated the decree by interfering with the possession of one Evans, who was a lessee of plaintiffs of part of said lands, by preventing the sheep of said Evans from grazing on said land and driving them away from said land, and assisting in the building of a fence on said land to prevent the grazing of said sheep thereon, and offering to lease said land in opposition to the lease thereof given by the successors in interest of the plaintiffs in said action; and that the other petitioner, Carpenter, had counseled and advised with and aided and abetted said Vance in so interfering with the said tenancy and occupation of said Evans. All the other facts necessary to the validity of said order punishing for contempt are fully found. We see nothing in the contention that the court had not jurisdiction in the said action of Pennie v. Fisher, and there is no reason why the petitioners should be discharged. Let an order be entered in each of said proceedings in habeas corpus that the petitioner be remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Sacramento county, and that the proceedings be dismissed.

EQUITABLE MORTGAGE—MINORS.

Where a father, for himself, and as guardian for his minor children, purchases land, and takes a deed to himself and them, agreeing to give a mortgage for the purchase money, the mortgage is good in equity against the minors, who appear by guardian ad litem, and do not disclaim the title to the land vested in them.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; JOSEPH P. JONES, Judge.

Chase & Chase and C. Y. Brown, for appellants. J. B. Reinstein and J. M. Seawell, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The court below adjudged that defendant Thomas McLaughlin is indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $1,615.24, and that said indebtedness is a lien upon the land described in the complaint, and directed that it be sold to satisfy said lien. All of the defendants appeal from this judgment. There is no bill of exceptions in the record. The findings show the following facts: The defendants John Thomas Edward McLaughlin and Margaret McLaughlin are the minor children of the defendant Thomas McLaughlin. In March, 1884, the plaintiffs and the defendant Thomas McLaughlin made an agreement, the plaintiffs to convey to said Thomas McLaughlin and his said minor children the land described in the complaint for the sum of $2,500, and at the same time the defendant Thomas McLaughlin paid to plaintiffs on account of said purchase the sum of $1,300, and the balance of $1,200 was to be paid October 1, 1884. On October 10th following this balance was still unpaid, and it was then agreed between plaintiffs and the defendant Thomas McLaughlin, "for himself and his said children, * * * that plaintiffs should execute a deed * * * of said * * * land to Thomas McLaughlin and his said children, and that the said balance of said purchase price * * * should be secured by a mortgage upon said lot of land." Thereupon plaintiffs conveyed said land to the defendant McLaughlin and his said minor children, at the same time receiving back a note for $1,200 and a mortgage to secure it upon the land conveyed. The mortgage recited that "Thomas McLaughlin, John Thomas Edward McLaughlin, and Margaret Mc-Laughlin" are parties thereto of the first part, and was signed: "THOMAS McLAUGHLIN, [Seal.] THOMAS McLAUGHLIN, [Seal.] Guardian of the persons and estate of John Thomas Edward McLaughlin and Margaret McLaughlin, minors." The note was also signed by Thomas McLaughlin for himself, and also below as guardian for the said minors. The court further finds "that said deed and mortgage were drawn by one Oliver Walcott, an attorney at law, who represented to said plaintiffs that said mortgage was sufficient to create a lien for said sum of $1,200 upon the interests of said children, as well as upon the interest of said Thomas McLaughlin in said lot of land, and that said plaintiffs, when they executed said deed and received mortgage, believed that said mortgage was sufficient and effective" for that purpose. It is claimed by the defendant minors that the judgment is erroneous, in so far as it makes the said indebtedness of the defendant Thomas McLaughlin alien upon their interest in the land so conveyed to them. There is nothing in the case showing that any portion of the money paid by the defendant Thomas McLaughlin belonged to said minors, or whether he was or was not in fact the guardian of their estates.

We are of the opinion that, upon the facts appearing here, the mortgage referred to may be enforced as an equitable mortgage upon the whole land, and whatever interest the defendant minors may have acquired therein by virtue of the deed referred to is subject to its lien. The principle is well settled in equity that a mortgage defectively executed, or an imperfect attempt to create a mortgage upon specific property for the purpose of securing a debt, will create a specific lien upon the property so intended to be mortgaged. Daggett v. Rankin, 31 Cal. 327; Love v. Mining Co., 32 Cal. 652. In Remington v. Higgins, 54 Cal. 620, which was an action against husband and wife, the facts were that the husband bargained for land, agreeing that a mortgage should be given to secure the purchase price, and at his request the deed was made to his wife, and she executed the mortgage. This mortgage was, however, invalid, because, by the conveyance to the wife, the property became community property, and as such was not subject to mortgage by the wife. In dealing with that state of facts, the court uses this language: "Admitting that the transaction did not create a mortgage in law, and not deciding but that plaintiff may have waived his lien of a vendor, we are of the opinion that plaintiff has a lien upon the premises by way of equitable mortgage to recover the unpaid portion of the purchase money and interest. The husband, in bargaining for the premises, agreed that a mortgage should be given. A paper was executed in pursuance of that agreement, which was supposed by the parties to have accomplished that object. It now appears that that paper is invalid as a mortgage. Equity will treat that as done which the parties agreed to have been done." So in this case the father agreed that the balance of the purchase price should be secured by a mortgage of the land conveyed, and we presume that the one under consideration was executed by him in good faith to carry out that agreement, and the court below finds that the plaintiffs accepted it under the belief that it was a valid lien upon the whole land they were conveying, and it was because the plaintiffs so relied upon it that the defendants were enabled to acquire any interest in the land. We have not overlooked the fact that in all the cases above cited the persons against whom the imperfect instrument was enforced had the capacity to make a valid contract, while by the judgment here it is the land of minors who were and are incapable of contracting for land, and, in a general sense, of ratifying such a contract against which this mortgage is enforced. But this fact ought not, under the circumstances here disclosed, to prevent the application of the equitable rule which lays at the foundation of these cases. It must be borne in mind also that the agreement of the father and his assumed agency in accepting a deed in pursuance of the agreement is the source or foundation of all the right, legal or equitable, which these minors have in the land. The deed was made to them solely by direction of the father. That was the form which the transaction took, and in equity the agreement that the purchase price should be secured by a mortgage upon the land the conveyance and the mortgage must be regarded as one transaction, and no person, whether minor or adult, can be permitted to adopt that part of an entire transaction which is beneficial and reject its burdens. This commanding principle of justice is so well established that it has become one of the maxims of the law. The father acted for the children, and they must either accept or repudiate the entire contract which he made. They cannot retain its fruits and at the same time deny its obligations. "A party cannot apply to his own use that part of the transaction which may bring to him a benefit, and repudiate the other, which may not be to his interest to fulfill. Thus it has been held that an infant cannot avoid a mortgage and affirm a deed, when both are made at one and the same time, relate to the same property, and go to make up one transaction. If the mortgage be avoided under the plea of infancy, the deed becomes of no effect." Heath v. West, 28 N. H. 108. In this case the minors are before the court, and have filed an answer by their guardian ad litem. They have not disclaimed the title vested in them by the deed procured under the circumstances stated, but seek to defeat the lien of plaintiff's mortgage, so far as their title is concerned, by the plea "that they have not ratified any contract relating to the sale of said lot, and that they are incapable of ratifying the same." But what the rules of equity would not permit them to do if they had attained their majority they cannot be permitted to do now through their guardian ad litem. Judgment affirmed.

CONTRACT OF CORPORATION—LIABILITIES OF STOCKHOLDERS.

The following instrument in writing was issued by the president and manager of a corporation: "Montpelier, Idaho, April 29, 1884. Be it known by these presents, that I, as manager and president of this institution, do agree to refund to Jacob Jones the sum of $928 80-100 dollars at one year's notice from date of said notice. It is the understanding that this money shall draw what interest it makes in proportion to all the shares in the institution. [Signed] H. S. WOOLLEY." Held, that it was the obligation of the corporation, and that an action could be maintained thereon by the payee named therein against the stockholder under section 2609 of the Revised Statutes of Idaho.

Smith & Smith, for appellant. R. S. Spence, Kimball & White, and Hawley & Reeves, for respondents.

HUSTON, J. This is an action instituted by the plaintiff against the defendant and several others as stockholders in "The Montpelier Co-operative Institution," alleged to be organized and existing under the laws of Idaho territory, under the provisions of section 2609 of the Revised Statutes. The answer denies any indebtedness by the defendant. Certain other defenses set up in the answer were stricken out on demurrer. The action is based upon a paper writing, as follows: "Montpelier, Idaho, April, 29, 1884. Be it known by these presents, that I, as manager and president of this institution, do agree to refund to Jacob Jones the sum of $928 80-100 dollars at one year's notice from date of said notice. It is the understanding that this money shall draw what interest it makes in proportion to all the shares in the institution. [Signed] H. S. WOOLLEY." Upon the trial the above paper was introduced, its execution proven, as was also the giving of the notice provided for therein, and the plaintiff then rested. Thereupon the defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was granted by the court. We are left to conjecture upon what principle of law, equity, or justice the court based its decision, as no reason is given in the record. The whole defense seems to be based upon the construction of the paper copied above, and this court is presented with a lengthy dissertation upon the word "refund," as defined by the various lexicographers. No attempt is made to disprove the paper or its contents, or to do away with the plain and palpable obligation to repay the money borrowed or received, upon compliance with the conditions prescribed in the paper writing. It is claimed by the defendant that "the instrument in question is a prima facie certificate of stock." An inspection of the paper is all that is necessary to show the absurdity of this proposition. In support of this latter contention the counsel of respondent cites Daniel, Neg. Inst. (3d Ed.) § 406, and Blanchard v. Kaul, 44 Cal. 440. A careful examination of these authorities fails to develop anything in support of the position of the respondent.

On the contrary, they millitate strongly against such a view; nor is this position supported by the authority quoted from Thompson on Liability of Stockholders. The paper writing does not make the plaintiff a stockholder in any sense. While the provision that "it is the understanding that this money shall draw what interest it makes in proportion to all shares in the institution" may have been intended by its author to place the plaintiff in the unfortunate position of a stockholder, the object fails when tested by the plain rules of justice, unaided by revelation. The corporation had the money of the plaintiff. They gave their legal written obligation to pay it, and, as the answering defendants appear from the evidence to have absorbed the assets of the corporation, it is only simple justice that they should "refund" their proportion of the money so received. The objection of respondent to the consideration of the evidence, which appears in the transcript by this court, we do not think is well taken. The evidence appears in the bill of exceptions, which was prepared, settled, and served in due time, and is properly before us. Judgment of the court below reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

STATE LEGISLATURE—COMPENSATION—MANDAMUS.

1. Section 8, art. 8, of the constitution, designates the different sessions of the state legislature, as follows: First, the first session; second, sessions to be held biennially after the first session, commencing on the first Monday after the 1st day of January, and every second year thereafter; third, sessions convened by the governor.

2. The first paragraph of section 23, art. 8, of the constitution, applies to the regular or biennial sessions only as to the per diem compensation of members, and the aggregate of per diem allowances.

3. The second paragraph of said section 23 fixes the per diem of each member, except the presiding officers, for the first session of said legislature and for sessions convened by the governor, and does not limit the aggregate per diem allowances for said first session.

4. A writ of mandate will issue to compel the state auditor to issue his warrant to pay the per diem of each member for each day's attendance upon the first session of said legislature, regardless of whether such member has already received, in the aggregate, $300 for per diem allowances for said first session or not. HUSTON, J., dissenting.

Application for writ of mandate.

Littleton Price and T. J. Jones, for applicant. George H. Roberts, Atty. Gen., for defendant.

SULLIVAN, C. J. On the 23d day of February, 1891, J. L. Goodnight, the plaintiff, made his application to this court for a writ of mandate to the Hon. Silas W. Moody, auditor of the state of Idaho, commanding said auditor to issue his warrant upon the state treasurer for the sum of five dollars, in payment of the per diem for the applicant's attendance as a member of the house of representatives of the state of Idaho for the 21st day of February, 1891. The facts stated in said application are substantially as follows: That said applicant was, on the 1st day of October, 1890, duly elected as a member of the house of representatives of the legislature of the state of Idaho from the county of Nez Perces, state aforesaid, for the term of two years; that on the 8th day of December, 1890, he duly qualified as such representative, and that ever since said 8th day of December he has been, and now is, a duly-qualified and acting member of the house of representatives of said Idaho legislature for the county aforesaid; that on said 8th day of December the legislature of the state of Idaho was convened in its first session by a proclamation of the governor, and began its duties under and by virtue of said proclamation and the constitution of the state of Idaho, and remained in continuous session from said 8th day of December, 1890, to the 20th day of December, 1890, at which last-mentioned date said legislature adjourned to the 5th day of January, 1891, and on said 5th day of January reconvened, and remained in continuous session since said 5th day of January; that on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1891, the said legislature was in lawful session at the capitol of the state, and that the applicant, as a member thereof, as aforesaid, was present and attended the session on that day, and performed all duties required to be performed by him as such member by the laws and constitution of the state of Idaho; that there was due and payable to said applicant from the state of Idaho for said day's services the sum of five dollars; that on said 21st day of February, Hon. Frank A. Fenn was the duly elected, qualified, and acting speaker of said house of representatives, and as such speaker made out and delivered to the applicant his certificate, in due form of law, showing and certifying that the applicant had attended said day's session of the house of representatives aforesaid, and was entitled to the sum of five dollars for said day's services; that the defendant, Silas W. Moody, is the duly elected, qualified, and acting auditor of the state of Idaho, and that it is the duty of the said auditor to issue warrants to all members of the said legislature for their per diem for attendance for each day that the members of said legislature are legally entitled thereto; that there is a lawful appropriation of funds in the state treasury for the payment of the per diem of all members of the legislature for said day; that on the 21st day of February, 1891, the applicant presented to said auditor, at his office in Boise City, Idaho, the said certificate of the said speaker of the house of representatives, issued to the applicant as aforesaid, and the applicant then and there requested and demanded that he, the said state auditor, issue to the applicant a state warrant on the state treasury of the state of Idaho for the sum of five dollars, the amount due the applicant for the services rendered by him, as aforesaid, on the 21st day of February, A. D. 1891; that the said Hon. Silas W. Moody refused without any just cause to issue and deliver to the applicant his warrant on the treasury of the state of Idaho, as by law it was his duty to do, and that said auditor still refuses, although often requested so to do, to issue and deliver to the applicant an Idaho state warrant for said sum of five dollars; that said Hon. Silas W. Moody, auditor, as aforesaid, stated as his reason for refusing to issue the warrant aforesaid that the applicant, J. L. Goodnight, had heretofore been paid the sum of three hundred dollars as per diem, in state warrants, as representative in the first session of the legislature of the state of Idaho, the same being the sum limited by the constitution of the state of Idaho. The applicant prays that a writ of mandate issue to compel the said auditor to issue to the applicant his warrant, in due form of law, upon the state treasurer, for the sum of five dollars, in payment of the per diem provided by law for his attendance as a member of the house of representatives of the state of Idaho for the 21st day of February, A. D. 1891. The defendant, Hon. Silas W. Moody, interposes his demurrer to said application, and alleges as the ground thereof that said application does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against him. This cause came on for hearing upon said demurrer. The defendant, by his demurrer, admits the facts set up in the application to be true. It is therefore admitted that the defendant refused to issue his warrant to the plaintiff, for the reason that said plaintiff had theretofore been paid the sum of $300 for per diem allowances as a member of the state legislature of Idaho for the first session thereof; that being the sum to which each member is limited for per diem allowances by the constitution. If it be true that the constitution limits the per diem of each member of the legislature to $300 for the first session thereof, then the writ of mandate should not issue; but if the constitution does not limit the aggregate amount which each member shall receive at this session for per diem allowances, the writ should issue.

To determine the question involved we must turn to the constitution. Section 8, art. 3, of the constitution is as follows: "The sessions of the legislature shall, after the first session thereof, be held biennially at the capitol of the state, commencing on the first Monday after the first day of January, and every second year thereafter, unless a different day shall have been appointed by law, and at other times when convened by the governor." This section mentions the first session of the legislature, the sessions to be held biennially after the first session, and sessions convened by the governor. The first session of the legislature is the session provided for by section 14, art. 21, of the constitution. This section directs the governor of the state, immediately upon his qualifying and entering upon the duties of his office, to issue a proclamation convening the legislature of the state at the seat of government on a day to be named in said proclamation, which shall not be less than 30 nor more than 60 days after the date of said proclamation. The biennial sessions are those fixed by said eighth section of the constitution to be held at the capitol of the state, commencing on the first Monday after the 1st day of January, biennially, after the first session, and every second year thereafter. The other sessions of the legislature referred to in section 8 are those convened by the governor. The last-mentioned sessions are those referred to in section 9, art. 4, of the constitution, which section empowers the governor, on extraordinary occasions, to convene the legislature by proclamation. The present session of the legislature is the session designated in said section 8 of the constitution as the "first session." Section 23, art. 3, of the constitution, among other things, fixes the pay of the members of the legislature, and is, upon that point, as follows: "Each member of the legislature shall receive for his services a sum not exceeding five dollars per day from the commencement of the session, but such pay shall not exceed for each member, except the presiding officers, in the aggregate three hundred dollars for per diem allowances for any one session; and shall receive each the sum of ten cents per mile each way by the usual traveled route." "When convened in extra session by the governor they shall each receive five dollars per day; but no extra session shall continue for a longer period than twenty days, except in case of the first session of the legislature;" and also provides that they shall receive such mileage as is allowed for regular sessions. This section is divided into two paragraphs. In the first paragraph it is declared that no member, except the presiding officers, shall receive for his services a sum exceeding five dollars per day, and in the aggregate, for per diem allowances, not more than three hundred dollars for any one session, and shall receive the sum of ten cents per mile each way by the usual traveled route. The second paragraph fixes absolutely the per diem which each member shall receive when convened in extra session by the governor, and what each member shall receive at the first session, and declares that no extra session shall continue for a longer period than 20 days, except in case of the first session; and further declares that each member shall receive such mileage as is allowed for regular sessions. There is no provision of the constitution fixing the mileage for regular sessions, except said first paragraph of section 23, and that part of said paragraph referring to mileage is separated from the remaining part of said paragraph by a semicolon, as shown by the original enrolled copy of the constitution, filed in the office of the secretary of state, and not by a period, as shown by the printed (pamphlet) copy of the constitution. As the second paragraph of said section clearly refers to the first paragraph thereof as fixing the mileage of members for regular sessions, and as that part of said first paragraph fixing such mileage is separated from the remaining part by a semicolon only, we are of the opinion that that part of said first paragraph which declares that no member except the presiding officers shall receive more than $300 for per diem allowances for any one session applies to biennial or regular sessions.—sessions directed by section 8, art. 3, of the constitution to be held biennially after the first session, commencing on the first Monday after the 1st day of January,—and every second year thereafter, and does not apply to the first session of the legislature. The framers of the constitution, and the people who adopted it, certainly recognized the fact that the first session of the legislature would necessarily, from the amount of legislation required, be a prolonged one. United States senators were to be elected; laws passed to carry into effect the provisions of the constitution; the laws amended so as to conform to the conditions of statehood; and much other needed legislation. In view of these facts, and, as we think, the clear intent of the provisions of the constitution, we are of the opinion that the members of the legislature at the present session (this being the first session) are not limited in the aggregate to three hundred dollars for per diem allowances, but that each member, except the presiding officers, is entitled to the sum of five dollars per day for each day's attendance during the present session. The demurrer is therefore overruled, and it is ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for by the plaintiff.

HUSTON, J., (dissenting.) I find myself unable to agree with the majority of the court in the conclusion they have reached in this case. Whether the first session of the legislature be called a regular or an extra session or a session sui generis, it seems to me that the provision in the first subdivision of section 23 of the constitution, limiting the per diem compensation of members to $300 "for any one session," is so clear, distinct, and unequivocal, as not to necessitate the invocation of any rule of construction. My view is strengthened when I consider the consequences involved in the construction given by the majority of the court to section 23. I am unwilling to believe that the framers of the constitution intended to place no other limit upon the amount of per diem compensation to members of the legislature than that of their full term of two years, at five dollars per day.

FINDINGS OF REFEREE—SETTING ASIDE.

Where a cause has been submitted by agreement of parties, and on order of the court to a referee to hear the testimony and report his findings of fact thereon, it is error for the court, upon its own motion, to set aside such findings, make findings of fact of its own, and enter judgment thereon.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, Bingham county.

J. T. Morgan and T. M. Stewart, for appellant. J. Ed. Smith and Hawley & Keaves, for respondent.

HUSTON, J. This is an action for the dissolution of a copartnership between plaintiff and defendant, and for the adjustment of the accounts of the firm. The pleadings in the case are various, multitudinous, and voluminous, too much so in fact to be inserted; nor is it necessary they should be, in the view we take of the case. The record, aside from the copies of the pleadings, is incomplete and unsatisfactory. Suffice to say that on the 10th day of December, 1887, the case was, upon agreement of parties, by order of the court, referred to a referee "to hear the testimony and report his findings of fact thereon." On the 14th day of February, 1888, the referee filed his findings of fact, and on the 20th day of July, 1888, the referee, by leave of the court, made and filed additional findings. It does not appear from the record that any exceptions were taken to the findings of the referee, or that any motion for a judgment was made. The next entry upon the record is a motion by the attorney for the plaintiff to modify and set aside the findings of the court made and filed on the 2d day of August, 1889. We next have the amended and supplemental "findings by the court," from which it appears that the court had previously made findings of fact in the case, but that, "the attention of the court having been called to the necessity of a review of its previous action, such review has been had," etc. These last findings by the court were filed on February 6, 1890, and judgment entered thereon in favor of the defendant, from which judgment this appeal is taken. The record does not show any motion to amend or set aside the report of the referee, nor does it appear that any motion was made for a resubmission. The record simply shows that the court, upon its own motion, or of its own volition, assumed to set aside the findings of the referee, and make findings of its own, and enter judgment thereon. This action of the district court, we think, was error. In the making up of the record there may have been omissions; but of this we cannot, of course, take cognizance. We must deal with the case as it is presented to us by the record. We can find no warrant, either in the statutes of the state or the decisions of the courts, for the action of the district court in this case in setting aside the findings of the referee. The judgment of the district court is reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to the district court, to make conclusions of law, and enter judgment upon the findings of the referee.

MORGAN, J., having been of counsel, took no part in the hearing or decision of this case.

ROBBERY—EVIDENCE—FORCE NECESSARY.

1. Defendant was indicted for robbery. H., a witness for prosecution, testified that he saw defendant scuffling with Miles, (the party alleged to have been robbed;) saw defendant hand something to McLouthlin, co-respondent, and alleged accomplice of defendant. Witness said "he thought" defendant took what he handed to McLouthlin from the person of Miles; did not see him take it, but "thought he did, because he thought he did." Motion to strike out latter part of testimony, as to what witness "thought," denied. Held, such denial was error, as it was not a matter upon which the opinion of witness was permissible.

2. The statutes of Idaho define "robbery" as "the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear." Under an indictment upon this statute, the trial court charges the jury as follows: "As to the force, the court instructs you that, if a man stealthily flich from the pocket of another, the force necessary to remove the property is all the force that the statute requires." Held error.

T. M. Stewart, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Roberts, for the Territory.

HUSTON, J. The defendant was indicted and convicted at the May term, 1890, of the district court for the county of Bingham of the crime of robbery. "Robbery," as defined by the statutes of Idaho, "is the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear." The evidence in this case, as shown by the record, is as follows: "One W. D. Hood testified that he was in Pocatello on or about the 28th day of January last. Knows the defendant. Saw him there about that time. Started to go into a saloon, when witness met this man and one McLouthlin. Afterwards saw them get into a scuffle. While they were scuffling, saw defendant hand McLouthlin something. He took this something, and dodged into next room. Didn't see what it was that he handed him. He got it from an old man that he was scuffling with. Didn't see him get it from him. Wouldn't swear that he got it from him. Thought he got it from him, because I thought so." On cross-examination this witness testified, in response to the question what he saw: "I think he got it from this man, and I saw him pass it to McLouthlin. Didn't think he would get into a scuffle without some object. The old man was very drunk. Think the defendant was sober." James Criswell, a witness on the part of the prosecution, testified, as appears by the record, in substance as follows: "Was in Gundecker's saloon at five o'clock on the morning of that day, [January 28, 1890.] Saw this man and a man by the name of Miles standing close together, and defendant had his right arm over his shoulder, and while he was standing there he took something from Miles' pocket, and it was handed to this man McLouthlin, and he left the room. Witness was not more than two or three feet away when defendant took, and saw him take it from his pocket." On cross-examination, this witness testified, as appears by the record: "That there was no scuffle at all. That there were in the saloon only witness, Hood, and the bar-tender. This occurred about five minutes after witness entered the saloon. Don't know what the parties were doing before. Defendant and Miles stood in position described some time. When witness entered they were standing close to the window. McLouthlin's whereabouts, when he saw the defendant put his arm around the old man, unknown to the witness. They were not standing in that position when witness entered. The old man was drunk,—very drunk. Didn't seem to know what was going on. Don't think he realized what was going on. Question. You say you saw no scuffling? Answer. Yes, sir; that is what I say. McLouthlin took what the defendant handed him, and left the room." Samuel Gundecker, a witness for the prosecution, testified: "That he was a machinist residing at Pocatello, Idaho. Was there on the 28th day of January last. Was keeping the People's saloon. Saw the defendant on that day, after the occurrence in the saloon, in the jail at Pocatello. Witness, having learned what had occurred, thought he would look up the case, and found the man, and he acknowledged to him that he got the money, and when witness asked him what he did it for he said that it was to get out of town. Didn't state what he did with the money, or what was the amount." On cross-examination, this witness testified that when he called on this man in jail he asked him what he did with what he took, and what he took the money for; and he said he didn't take any money; and after witness made him believe that he was going on his bond, and told him that it was no use to deny it, for that he knew that he was the man,—after that, he said he was the fellow who done it, and that he didn't know what he was doing. Witness is sure that he said this. It was previous that witness made him believe that he would go on his bond. This witness, proceeding, testified that he took the man McLouthlin with him to the jail, and that he was present at the conversation already related. "Witness is a detective, and so told the defendant. Has no interest in securing the conviction of the defendant. Hope to be a partner of the district attorney." There was no testimony offered by defendant.

The above is the substance of all the evidence in the case. There were several requests to charge on the part of the defendant, which were refused by the court, to which exceptions were taken. The first error assigned by the defendant is the refusal of the court to strike out so much of the testimony of the witness Hood as states "what he thought." It is not proper to permit a witness, except in the case of an expert, to testify as to his opinion in regard to a fact, or the occurrence of a fact. The witness had already stated what he saw. He had detailed the facts and circumstances upon which his opinion, or his "thought," as he expresses it, was based; but we cannot say what weight the opinion or "thought" of the witness may have had with the jury. The rule as given by Prof. Best, in his work on Evidence, (page 494, note 1,) is as follows: "The opinion of a witness is not in general to be received. Facts should be stated, and not inferences made." In the same note he says: "Where, therefore, it is both desirable and possible that the jury should draw an inference from the facts upon which the witness must necessarily base his opinion, and these facts can be placed before the jury, the opinion of the witness is not to be received." Best, Ev. p. 495, and cases cited in note 1. This would seem to exclude the statement of an opinion in such a case as that under consideration. The witness had already stated all the facts within his knowledge, and we think the inference to be drawn from these facts should have been left to the jury, unaided by the "thought" or opinion of the witness. Defendant's motion to strike out so much of the testimony of the witness Hood as stated what he thought defendant did, should have been allowed. Abbott v. People, 86 N. Y. 471. We do not think the second assignment of error is well taken. The confessions of the defendant to the witness Gundecker were not made to a person or under circumstances that would exclude them as evidence. Gundecker was not, nor did he pretend to be, acting under authority at the time the confession was made. The fourth assignment of error is as to the oral charge of the court, in the following words: "As to the force, the court instructs you that, if a man stealthily flieth from the pocket of another, the force necessary to remove the property is all the force that the statute requires." We think this was error. Subdivision 6, § 7855, Rev. St. Idaho, provides that, in criminal cases, the charge of the court "must be reduced to writing before it is given, unless by mutual consent of the parties it is given orally." It does not appear that any such consent was given. Again, the charge does not correctly state the law. It virtually abolishes all distinction between robbery and larceny from the person. Larceny from the person is made grand larceny by our statute. Rev. St. Idaho, § 7048, subd. 2. There are other assignments of error which we do not deem it important to consider. The judgment of the court below is reversed, and it is ordered that said defendant be discharged.

PUBLIC NUISANCE—ACTION FOR SPECIAL DAMAGES
—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. If a bill of exceptions is presented for settlement after the trial of the cause, and is certified to as correct by respondent's attorneys, and such bill is thereafter settled by the judge and used on the hearing of the motion for a new trial, it is too late for the respondents to raise the objection for the first time in this court that such bill was not settled in time.

2. To maintain an action for special damages caused by an obstruction of a public street constituting a public nuisance, a plaintiff must allege in his complaint and establish facts showing that he has sustained special damages,—damages of a different kind and character than the damages sustained by the public.

Appeal from district court, Bingham county; C. H. BERRY, Judge.

John T. Morgan and T. M. Stewart, for appellants. Hawley & Reeves, for respondents.

SULLIVAN, C. J. This action was brought by the respondents to abate a public nuisance, which it is claimed plaintiffs had created by the erection of a certain building on certain lands lying between the west side of West Main street and the Utah & Northern Railway track, in the town of Blackfoot, Bingham county, state of Idaho. The plaintiffs allege in their complaint and amendment thereto substantially as follows: That plaintiffs are husband and wife, and have been such during all the times mentioned in said complaint, and are living together as such; that they are the owners and in the possession of lots 1 and 20 in block 28 in said town of Blackfoot; that there are situated upon said lots certain buildings owned by and in the possession of plaintiffs, and used by them for hotel and restaurant purposes; that said property is situated on the west side of West Main street in said town; that said street extends in a northerly direction through said town, and is 100 feet in width throughout its entire length, and was and has been for more than 12 years prior to the commencement of this suit used, appropriated, and dedicated as a public street; that the Utah & Northern Railway Company own a strip of land 200 feet wide, extending through said town, and bordering on the easterly side of said West Main street, on which strip of land are situated the road-bed, track, depot, and other buildings of said company; that said corporation is a common carrier, and its trains stop at the depot in said town of Blackfoot, to receive and discharge mail and passengers; that said depot and other buildings of said railroad company are situated easterly of the above-described lots, and that there are no obstructions or impediments to travel or to the sight between said points, except those placed there by the defendants; that in the year 1890 the defendants commenced the erection of a frame building easterly and southerly from said lots and buildings of plaintiffs and the said depot and place where passengers leave and enter the cars running upon said railroad, and continued to erect said building, and have maintained the same thereon; that by reason of said building so erected by the defendants travel in and upon and across said street has been impeded and obstructed, and communication made more difficult between said railroad depot and grounds and that part of said town situated west of said West Main street; that all the people of said Bingham county residing in and about said town of Blackfoot have been delayed and damaged by reason of the erection and maintenance of said building by the defendants as aforesaid; that, beside being injured and damaged thereby, and in common with other people and residents of said town of Blackfoot, the plaintiffs have been specially injured and damaged by reason that travelers visiting said town are unable to readily see and determine the location of plaintiffs' said hotel and restaurant, and in consequence thereof such travelers have become the guests of other hotels, to plaintiffs' damage in the sum of $100; that in consequence of said building erected and maintained as aforesaid, the said property of plaintiffs has become lessened and depreciated in value, to their damage in the sum of $100, and that the erection and maintenance of said building is a nuisance to the people of said town of Blackfoot and vicinity; that plaintiffs have requested defendants to remove said buildings, and they have refused to do so; that plaintiffs are without adequate remedy at law; that no pecuniary damages would be adequate compensation to plaintiffs, and that defendants are insolvent. Plaintiffs demand judgment for $200 damages and costs of suit, and that defendants be perpetually restrained from maintaining said building, and that the same be declared a nuisance, and that an order for its abatement be made. The defendants deny that West Main street in said town of Blackfoot is 100 feet wide, or is, or ever was, of any greater width than 66 feet. They aver that the store building and warehouse of W. H. Danilson is 10 feet and 5 inches upon the 34 feet which plaintiffs aver to be a part of said street; that said store has been so located during 11 years last past; and denied each and every allegation in said complaint; and aver that said building, erected as aforesaid, is situated on defendants' private property, and that said ground on which said building is situated was never claimed as a part of said West Main street to their knowledge, and that plats of said town, made for W. C. Lewis, W. N. Shilling, and W. H. Danilson, (each for portions of said town,) show the streets of said town to be but 66 feet wide; and that the stock-pen of said Utah & Northern Railway Company has stood for 18 months immediately prior to the commencement of this suit 22 feet upon the 34 feet claimed by plaintiffs as a part of said West Main street. This cause was tried by the court without a jury on the 19th day of July, 1890. Judgment was entered in the court below in favor of the plaintiffs on the 29th day of July, 1890. Thereupon the defendants moved for a new trial, which motion was overruled, and from the order overruling said motion this appeal was taken. The appeal is presented on a bill of exceptions and statement.

The first assignment of error contained in appellants' brief is as follows: "First. The order of the court overruling defendants' objections to the introduction of any evidence, for the following reasons, to-wit: (1) That the complaint does not state any cause of action in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendants. (2) That the plaintiffs have no suit for the town of Blackfoot at large, and no right to introduce evidence for damages to it, and have no action for special damages to themselves." The respondents contend that said assignment of error cannot be considered by this court, for the following three reasons: "(1) That this is an appeal from the order refusing a new trial alone; (2) that no reference is made to such alleged error in the notice of motion for a new trial; (3) that the bill of exceptions herein cannot be entertained here, and is not before the court, as it was not filed in time, and no extension of time was granted for said bill of exceptions." It appears from the record that the bill of exceptions was served on the attorneys for the respondents on November 14, 1890, and on the 3d day of December, 1890, was certified to by said attorneys as correct, and was on said date settled by the district judge. The record further shows that said district judge made the following order overruling appellants' motion for a new trial, to-wit: "Now, upon this 3d day of December, 1890, the motion of the defendants for vacation of decision and granting of new trial herein coming regularly on to be heard before the judge at chambers upon their statement and bill of exceptions heretofore settled and on file herein, said motion being submitted for decision, and the judge being fully advised thereon, it is hereby ordered that said motion for vacation of decision and for new trial be, and the same is hereby, overruled. D. W. STANROD, Judge. Filed December 3, 1890." It is thus shown that the respondents had full knowledge of the contents of said bill of exceptions, and certified to it as correct on the 3d day of December, 1890, and on that date said bill was settled and signed by the district judge. On the same date the motion for new trial was submitted for hearing on said bill of exceptions and statement. The record contains no objection or exception by respondents to the settlement of said bill of exceptions, nor to its being submitted to the judge at the hearing of the motion for new trial. The respondents had knowledge of the fact that appellants would apply to the judge to have said bill of exceptions settled. Respondents' attorneys certified to the correctness of said bill of exceptions, and permitted it to be used on the hearing of appellants' motion for new trial, without objection. The respondents, by said acts, waived their right to said objection. Hayne, New Trial & App. §§ 27, 145; Higgins v. Mahoney, 50 Cal. 444. We think that section 4443 of the Revised Statutes is conclusive in this matter. Said section enumerates the papers that constitute the record on appeal, to-wit, the judgment roll and affidavits, or the records and files in the action, or bill of exceptions, or statement used on hearing of the motion for new trial. The order overruling the motion for a new trial recites the fact that said bill of exceptions was used on said hearing, and is therefore properly before this court for consideration.

The first error assigned by the appellants is the order of the court overruling the objection to the introduction of any evidence whatever, for the reason that the complaint does not show any cause of action in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendants. To entitle plaintiffs to recover for injuries sustained from a public nuisance they must first allege in their complaint facts clearly showing that they have sustained special or peculiar damages, damages different in kind and character from the rest of the public, so that such damage cannot fairly be said to be a part of the common injury resulting from such nuisance. Wood, Nuis. § 646; Bigley v. Nunan, 53 Cal. 403. Will the complaint in this action, when measured by the rule above indicated, bear the test? The only allegation of special damage or injury contained in said complaint is as follows, to-wit: "That, besides being injured and damaged thereby and in common with other people and residents of said town of Blackfoot, these plaintiffs herein have been specially injured and damaged by reason thereof in this: that on account thereof travelers visiting said town of Blackfoot are unable to readily and easily see and determine the location of said hotel and restaurant of the plaintiff, and in consequence thereof such travelers have and still continue to become the guests of other hotels and restaurants in said town of Blackfoot situate and being, instead of the guests and patrons of the plaintiff, and that in consequence thereof the plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of one hundred dollars; that, in consequence of said building being erected and maintained, the said property has become lessened and depreciated in value, to their damage in the sum of one hundred dollars; that the erection and maintenance of said building aforesaid is a nuisance to the people in the said town of Blackfoot and vicinity generally, in this: that it is an obstruction to the free passage and use in the customary manner of said West Main street." This allegation shows that said obstruction is a public nuisance, but does not show that respondents have sustained an injury different in kind or character from that sustained by the public or other business men located in the vicinity of respondents' hotel. The allegation of special damages would equally apply to other business men situated in said vicinity,—that by reason of the erection of said building the merchants and other dealers have sustained special damages because passengers leaving the trains could not as readily and easily see their places of business, and by reason thereof go to other places of business. We are of the opinion that, if said allegations of special damage were fully established by the evidence, the respondents would not be entitled to any relief in this action. In cases of this kind the authorities are very numerous which hold that no person can maintain an action for damage from a common nuisance, where the injury and damage are common to all. The reason for this rule is that, if private persons were permitted to maintain suits to abate a public nuisance, it would lead to a multiplicity of suits. Wood, in his excellent work on the Law of Nuisances, (section 646,) says: "Therefore the courts very wisely have unwaveringly adhered to the rule that an individual, in order to be entitled to a recovery for injuries sustained from a public nuisance, must make out a clear case of special damages to himself, apart from the rest of the public, and of a different character, so that they cannot be fairly said to be a part of the common injury resulting therefrom. It is not enough that he sustained more damage than another; it must be of a different character, special and apart from that which the public in general sustain, and not such as is common to every person who exercises the right that is injured." The respondents allege that said building is in a public street, and is a public nuisance. If this allegation be true, the Revised Statutes, § 960 et seq., provide the method and manner for the removal of such obstructions. Section 961 provides the manner of giving notice to the person causing such obstruction to remove the same. Section 962 fixes the penalty for failure to remove such obstruction; and, in case that the encroachment upon such street is denied, section 963 directs the road overseer to commence an action in the proper court to abate the same as a nuisance. This statute was enacted for the purpose of removing obstructions from highways, and such obstructions as are public nuisances, and was intended to prevent a multiplicity of suits. We are of the opinion that the complaint does not state a cause of action in favor of the plaintiffs. With this view of the case it is not necessary for this court to consider any other questions raised on this appeal. The cause is reversed, and remanded for dismissal.

SNYDER v. VIOLA MINING & SMELTING CO.

INJURY TO SERVANT—FELLOW-SERVANTS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. S. was a miner engaged in under-ground work. G. was a blacksmith engaged in same mine, in sharpening tools for use of miners, and whose duty it was to deliver such tools, after being sharpened, to miners at work in mine. Held, that S. and G. were fellow-servants; and held, further, that for carelessness in delivering such tools to miners by G., whereby S. was injured, defendant was not liable, defendant not being shown to be in fault.

2. Where the evidence shows that the defendant had furnished safe and convenient machinery and appliances for the performance of the required labor, and either the plaintiff or his fellow-servant, or both, for their own convenience, had seen fit to use other means or appliances than those furnished by defendant, and injury results therefrom, the defendant is not liable, and in such case plaintiff is guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from district court, Lemhi county.

Stewart & Morgan, for appellant. Hawley, Reeves & Quarles, for respondent.

HUSTON, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff against defendant corporation to recover damages for injuries alleged to have been received by the plaintiff while in the employ of the defendant, as a miner, working in the Viola mine, owned and operated by defendant, in Lemhi county, in this state, which injuries plaintiff charges were the result of and attributable to the negligence of defendant. We are called upon in limine to pass upon the motion of respondent to strike out the statement and dismiss the appeal in this case, first, because it does not appear by the record that the judge of the district court, in allowing an extension of the time for defendant to prepare and serve its statement, made such allowance upon good cause shown, as provided in section 4932, Rev. St. Idaho. We do not think it necessary that the record should contain the evidence upon which the action of the district judge was predicated. The presumption of law is that good cause was shown, and such presumption can only be overcome by proof. No attempt at such proof is shown.

The next objection by the respondent is that this court cannot review the exception of defendant to the charge of the court, for the reason that such exception was not taken in time, and is too general to entitle it to consideration on appeal. We do not think this case comes within the purview of the rule laid down in Black v. City of Lewiston, (Idaho,) 13 Pac. Rep. 80. The following language by Mr. Justice MILLER in the case of Railroad Co. v. Reeves, 10 Wall. 189, seems to us to be more applicable in this case: "As to the charge given by the court, the language of the exception is more general than we could desire; and if the errors of this charge were less apparent, or if there was any reason to suppose they were inadvertent, and might have been corrected if specified by counsel at the time, we would have some difficulty in holding the exception to it sufficient. But the whole charge proceeds upon a theory of the law of common carriers, as it regards the effect of loss from the act of God on the contract, so different from our views of the law on that subject that it needs no special effort to draw attention to it, and it is so clearly and frankly stated as to have made it the turning point of the case. We are of opinion, then, that both the refusal to charge as requested and the charge actually given are properly before us for examination." So, in this case, we think the exposition of the law of negligence, as applicable to the evidence in this case, given by the district court in its charge to the jury, was so erroneous as to bring it clearly within the rule laid down by the supreme court of the United States in Railroad Co. v. Reeves, above cited. No point is sought to be made by the respondent against the exceptions of defendant to the refusal of the court to give instructions 1 and 2, asked by defendant. We will consider those instructions further on.

The facts in this case, as shown by the evidence,—and there is but little conflict in the testimony,—are briefly as follows: The appellant, defendant below, was on the 15th February, 1889, the owner of and engaged in working and operating the Viola mine, in Lemhi county, Idaho; that on that date the respondent, plaintiff below, was in the employ of defendant as a miner in said mine; that on the date last aforesaid the plaintiff was at work in a drift about 110 feet below the surface of the ground; that he had been thus employed for some months, and on this day it became necessary for him to ascend to the surface for some purpose. There was a shaft some four or five feet square, sided up with lumber, extending from the surface to the level where plaintiff was at work, and below. Through and up this shaft, ore, etc., was hoisted to the surface from below by means of a steam-hoist, located on the surface, and near the mouth or entrance of the shaft. As is usual in such cases, there was a ladder at the side of the shaft, presumably for use in ascending or descending the shaft, whenever the exigencies of the work or the convenience of the workmen required. Extending from the surface to the level below, there was at the time last mentioned a large rope. The evidence shows that the steam-hoist had not been used regularly for a period of several months. There was also a wire attached to a bell on the surface, and extending down the shaft, which was used as a signal, by those working below to those above, of the presence of some person in the shaft. The blacksmith, one Goodall, employed by the defendant in sharpening the picks, drills, and other tools used by the miners, had been in the habit, as he testifies, and he is undisputed on this point, for a long time, when the steam-hoist was not being run, of lowering the drills, picks, etc., sharpened by him, to the level below, by attaching them to the large rope above referred to by means of a smaller rope, the end of which he held in his hand, and allowing them to slide down the large rope to the level, while descending himself by the ladder, and delivering the said tools to the miners in the drift where they were at work. This was the condition of things on the 15th day of February, 1889, when the plaintiff attempted to ascend the shaft from the level by means of the ladder aforementioned. He had proceeded but a short distance up the ladder when he was, as he testified, struck upon the head and arm by a drill then being lowered by the blacksmith down the rope as above described, and received thereby the injuries complained of, and for which he seeks to recover damages of the defendant.

The first question for our consideration is, was there negligence on the part of the defendant in a failure to furnish sufficient and safe appliances and machinery for the performance of the labor upon which the plaintiff was engaged? It is nowhere assumed, or attempted to be proven, that there was any defect in any of the machinery or appliances in or about the mine, nor that the injury of plaintiff resulted from or was in any way attributable to a want of proper machinery or appliances, or to any defect in the machinery or appliances provided by defendant. In fact, the case seems to have been tried wholly upon the theory that the accident which resulted in the injury to the plaintiff resulted entirely from the negligence or want of care of the blacksmith Goodall, and that, Goodall not being a fellow-servant of plaintiff, defendant is liable for any injury resulting from such negligence or want of care on his part. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint "that at the time plaintiff entered into the employment of the defendant, and from then up to the timesaid injury occurred, the regular and usual mode of letting all tools used in said mine down into the same was by means of a hoist and buckets." It is further shown by the testimony of the plaintiff himself that there was another shaft located about 700 or 800 feet, on the surface, from the shaft in question; that said shafts were connected underground; and that at the other shaft there was a hoist which was running at the time. It was as easy for Goodall to let the tools down by one shaft as by the other, except that in one case a walk of some 700 or 800 feet on the surface, and a corresponding distance below, was involved. Every means necessary or requisite for the safe transmission of tools from the surface to the miners at work below, as well as for their safe entry to and exit from the mine, had been provided by the defendant. How, then, could the defendant be said to be guilty of negligence? We think the evidence in this case entirely fails to establish negligence on the part of the defendant. Mr. Beach, in his work entitled Contributory Negligence, says: "It is the common law in every state and territory of the Union, and in the federal courts, that a master or employer is not responsible to those engaged in his employment for injuries suffered by them as the result of negligence, carelessness, or misconduct of other servants in his employ, engaged in the same common or general service or employment, denominated 'fellow-servants' or 'co-employees,' unless the employer himself has been at fault;" and he adds: "This rule is so undisputed that it is sufficient to cite one leading or recent decision in point in each jurisdiction;" and he cites innumerable cases in support of the text. We think the district court erred when it assumed that the defendant had provided the means used by Goodall for getting the tools into the mine for any such purpose. On the contrary, we think the evidence clearly shows that the means employed by Goodall for getting the tools into the mine, to-wit, by tying or fastening them to the large rope, was not the means provided by the defendant for that purpose. There was a bucket attached to another large rope, which, had it been used by Goodall, would doubtless have prevented any accident. If it is claimed that the hoist to which this rope was attached was not then running, we answer that there was another shaft easy of access, in which there was a rope and bucket, and which was running at the time, and the neglect of either the plaintiff or Goodall to avail themselves of such safe appliance cannot be attributed or charged as negligence on the part of defendant. We think the district court erred in its statement of the law as to what constitutes a fellow-servant. Says Mr. Beach, in his work above referred to on Contributory Negligence: "In the present state of the law, the essence of common employment is a common employer and payment from a common fund. The weight of authority is to the effect that all who work for a common master, or who are subject to a common control, or derive their compensation from a common source, and are engaged in the same general employment, working to accomplish the same general end, though it may be in different departments or grades of it, are co-employees, who are held in law to assume the risk of one another's negligence." Beach, Cont. Neg. § 109, and cases cited in note 4. If this is the correct rule, and we so accept it, can there be any doubt that plaintiff and Goodall were fellow-servants? The plaintiff having failed to show negligence on the part of defendant, it seems to us that the defendant's motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. Under the rule of law applicable thereto, as quoted by us above from Beach on Contributory Negligence, which seems to have been very generally, if not uniformly, recognized by the courts of this country, we think that the fourth instruction asked by the defendant, and refused by the court, should have been granted. It seems to us that the plaintiff, in not availing himself of any of the precautions usual, and which in the exercise of ordinary care would have been adopted by a prudent person in his situation, to-wit, by signaling to those at the surface, either by ringing the bell, calling up the shaft, or carrying a light; was guilty of contributory negligence; and his only excuse for not so doing is that "there was not supposed to be anybody there, and nobody was supposed to be around there;" and yet it seems from the evidence that there were at least two persons there at that time, i. e., Goodall and Ruhl. The plaintiff cannot act upon his suppositions, and then, when he is injured by reason of their being unfounded, make it the predicate of a charge of negligence on the part of either the defendant or his fellow-servant. The judgment in this case is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

WALLEY v. PLATTE & DENVER DITCH CO.

ABUTTING OWNERS—SPECIAL DAMAGES.

1. Since the city of Denver acquired its streets subject to the prior lawfully acquired right of a ditch company to construct and maintain a ditch in some of them, one who, long after the construction of the ditch, purchased land abutting on such a street, cannot recover from the ditch company for the maintenance of the ditch, unless he suffers special damages thereby. Following City of Denver v. Mullen, (Colo.) 3 Pac. Rep. 693, and Ditch Co. v. Anderson, (Colo.) 6 Pac. Rep. 515.

2. Allegations in the complaint that the ditch is dangerous to the public health and safety, that it is a public nuisance, and that it is dangerous to the health and safety of all who have occasion to transact business in the vicinity, do not authorize the recovery of special damages.

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Arapahoe county.

Browne & Putnam, for plaintiff in error. Markham & Dillon and E. A. Clark, for defendants in error.

RICHMOND, C. In this action plaintiff in error sought to recover damages alleged to have been done to his premises by the waters in the ditches of the defendant companies. The complaint, answers, and replications constitute the pleadings in the action, and the following stipulation was entered into by and between the respective parties: "It is stipulated and agreed by and between the parties to this suit that the title of the premises in the complaint described is in the plaintiff, that the city of Denver was incorporated in 1861, and has ever since remained a corporation, with a city government charged with the duty and provided with the power to grade, open, improve, keep in repair and free from obstruction the streets, alleys, and highways in said city; and that said premises were and are within the limits of said city; and that the right of way for said ditch at the point complained of was never procured by any condemnation proceedings in any court. It is further stipulated and agreed that the Platte & Denver Ditch Company was incorporated and organized October 7, 1864, for the purpose of constructing the said ditch for milling, manufacturing, and irrigating purposes, and that the said Platte & Denver Ditch Company did so construct said ditch in 1864 and 1865, and that it was used for the purposes aforesaid; that the defendant company was incorporated and organized on the 1st day of October, 1864, for the same purposes as the Platte & Denver Ditch Company; that on the 4th day of October, 1864, being a few days after the organization of the defendant company and a few days before the expiration of the charter of the Platte & Denver Ditch Company, sold, transferred, and conveyed said ditch and all of its right, title, and interest to and in said Platte & Denver ditch, with its rights, privileges, and appurtenances, right of way and easements, to the defendant company; the plaintiff, however, not admitting hereby, but protesting, as a matter of law, against, the right of said company to sell and convey to the defendant company the said ditch or anything connected therewith, beyond the period of the corporate existence of the said Platte & Denver Ditch Company; that the water from said ditch is still used for the same purposes for which it was intended to be used by the company organized to construct the said ditch,—that is, for milling, manufacturing, and irrigating purposes. It is further agreed that the lots and premises, streets and alleys, in the complaint mentioned are a part of the tract of land known as the 'Congressional Grant,' and which tract of land was by act of congress of May 28, 1864, entered by the probate judge of Arapahoe county in trust for the inhabitants as a town-site; that the certificate of entry thereof was issued May 6, 1865, and a patent therefor issued June 8, 1868. It is further admitted that all that part of the ditch anywhere near the premises mentioned was constructed upon the same tract of land known as the 'Congressional Grant.' This stipulation to be considered as admissions in the pleadings. Dated October 21, 1887." Upon the pleadings and stipulation defendants in error moved for judgment on the grounds that the plaintiff could not recover damages for the lawful construction, maintenance, and operation of the ditches; second, that the allegations in the complaint as to any special damages occasioned by any acts or doings of the defendants were so vague and indefinite that no recovery could be had on these allegations, and that no negligence whereby any special damage was done to the plaintiff was alleged against the defendants.

The case at bar is precisely similar to Ditch Co. v. Anderson, 8 Colo. 131, 6 Pac. Rep. 515; therefore we deem it unnecessary to further extend the statement of this case. The principal questions presented to the court below, and rediscussed in the briefs on this appeal, are identical with the questions discussed in City of Denver v. Mullen, 7 Colo. 345, 3 Pac. Rep. 693, and Ditch Co. v. Anderson, before referred to. In view of the fact that these two cases practically decide every issue presented in the case at bar we may be pardoned for abbreviating our opinion. In the case of City of Denver v. Mullen, this court determined that the ditch company had acquired a prior right as against the city to use the street for its ditch. In other words, they held that the city accepted the dedication of the street subject to the prior lawfully acquired right of the ditch company to construct and maintain the ditch where it runs, and for the purposes to which it was applied. Following this decision, and reaffirming in most unmistakable language the doctrine therein announced, this court in the case of Ditch Co. v. Anderson says no recovery can be had for damages incident to the construction and maintenance of the ditch within the scope of the lawful authority under which said ditch was constructed and is maintained. In other words, the ditch existing by lawful authority, its proprietors are not liable for damages resulting from such existence of the ditch ipso facto merely. It is conceded by the stipulation and by the pleadings in this case that the plaintiff in error occupied the said lot while it was a part of the congressional grant, and that his title did not accrue until after the appellees' rights and privileges accrued by the statutory concessions of congress to ditch companies. The plaintiff in error purchased his lots bordering upon the street which was then and for a long time prior thereto had been burdened with the easement lawfully acquired of the ditch in question.

The plaintiff in error by his complaint does not aver that the damages for which he seeks to recover resulted from an unlawful, improvident, or negligent manner in the use of the said ditch. To use the language of the complaint, it is averred that it is dangerous to public health and safety, and is a public nuisance, and is dangerous to the health of all who have occasion to transact business in its vicinity; and that the damages resulting are from the maintaining and operating of the said ditch. It can be said without fear of contradiction that there is not a single averment in the complaint which sets forth any improper or negligent manner in the use of the ditch by the appellees. It being a conceded fact that it was constructed prior to the purchase of the premises by the plaintiff in error, no special damages being averred, no special damages could be recovered. We deem it sufficient to say without further comment that the two cases heretofore cited are conclusive of the case at bar. The contention that the Platte & Denver Ditch Company had no right to transfer the ditch, with its rights, privileges, and appurtenances, to the defendant company beyond the period of its corporate existence is not discussed by plaintiff in error, but, if it were, this court by its conclusion in the case of Bailey v. Milling Co., 12 Colo. 200, 21 Pac. Rep. 35, has conclusively settled the question. We therefore think the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

REED and BISSELL, CC., concur.

MACKEY v. BRIGGS.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 27, 1891.)

LIABILITY OF AGENT—UNDISCLOSED AGENCY.

1. Where defendant bought wood for another without disclosing his agency, he thereby rendered himself liable for its value, at plaintiff's option.

2. Although it appeared that plaintiff made a demand on another agent, who was settling the principal's debts, defendant cannot complain of a failure to charge that this was an election to hold the principal, when he made no request therefor.

3. On appeal from the county to the district court, (in which the case might have been begun,) it was too late to object to the jurisdiction, because the record failed to show the taking of the statutory steps on appeal, after the parties appeared without objection and tried the issue by a jury.

4. By Code Colo. 1887, § 846, depositions of witnesses residing in the state, but outside the county where the case is tried, may be taken under a dedimus with interrogatories, without service of an affidavit, and in the same manner as the testimony of a witness residing out of the state.

5. The court will not disturb a judgment where there is evidence to support it, and no passion or prejudice on the part of the jury is shown.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Gilpin county.

Patterson & Thomas, for appellant. W. C. Fullerton, for appellee.

BISSELL, C. In 1887 Leonard Briggs brought suit against the defendant, Richard Mackey, in the county court of Gilpin county, to recover $75.82 as a balance due him for wood furnished at the Post Hole mine in Gilpin county. The case seems to have been tried in the county court, although the record is silent as to the rendition of a judgment in that tribunal. It ultimately got into the district court, and there pleadings were filed by the respective parties, and the case was tried upon the issues thus formed, counsel appearing for both parties. The regularity of the appeal is questioned, and the jurisdiction of the district court is attacked here because the record fails to show the taking of the various steps prescribed by the statute to bring the case by appeal from the county court to the district court. It is urged, and apparently with some degree of confidence, that the acquirement of jurisdiction by the district court, through the appeal, must regularly appear, and that without it that court would be entirely without jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause. However true this principle might be when applied to courts having an exclusively appellate jurisdiction, it is inapplicable to the determination of the jurisdiction of the district court when a case is brought there upon appeal from the county court. The district courts of this state are courts of general jurisdiction, and, as is apparent from the record, that court, sitting in Gilpin county, had jurisdiction both of the subject-matter of the suit and of the parties to the action. When the case was brought to the district court, the parties appeared in person and by counsel, and the case was tried to a jury without objection from the defendant. Under these circumstances he cannot be heard to complain. This court has decided that wherever the appellate court has original jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the parties voluntarily appear and go to trial on the merits without exception, their conduct amounts to a waiver of the objection, and they cannot afterwards object. Todd v. De la Mott, 9 Colo. 222, 11 Pac. Rep. 80.

The remaining errors assigned and discussed relate to matters occurring during the progress of the trial. It appears that prior to the hearing the plaintiff sought to take the testimony of one Richter, who was residing in Denver. For that purpose he sued out a dedimus, and thereunder, upon interrogatories filed, the deposition of the witness was taken. A motion was made to quash this deposition because the witness was a resident of the state, and no affidavit was served as provided by section 868 of the Code. The objection to the deposition was very properly overruled by the court. The objection was not well taken, since it was not sought to take the deposition of the witness in the manner and form provided for by the chapter which contains the provisions making the service of an affidavit of the party essential to its regularity. The deposition of witnesses residing in the state, but outside of the county where it is to be tried, may be taken under a dedimus with interrogatories, in the same manner precisely as the testimony of a witness residing out of the state may be taken. Section 846, Code 1887. To entitle parties to proceed in that manner they are required by the statute to take only those steps prescribed for the taking of testimony of witnesses residing out of the state. The service of the affidavit then becomes unnecessary. It was not error for the court to refuse to quash the depositions for the reasons assigned.

The only other objections relied upon by counsel for appellant are based upon the instructions given by the court, and its refusal to grant a new trial upon the case as made to the jury. The instructions which are complained of relate to the right of the vendor of property to hold either the undisclosed principal, or the agent to whom the property is sold. The court observed the law in the instructions which it gave, and very properly told the jury that if the defendant, at the time that the wood was delivered, failed to disclose the fact that he was acting as an agent, he rendered himself liable for its value, and the plaintiff, being without notice or knowledge of the agency, was at liberty to elect to hold him, even though he might afterwards ascertain that one Richter was the principal in the transaction. That the agent may be held, under such circumstances, there can be no doubt. The appellant likewise complains that the court failed to instruct the jury that they were at liberty to find from the demand made by the plaintiff upon another agent of the undisclosed principal, who was there for the purpose of settling the claims against the mine, that he had made his election, by which he was bound. No instruction upon this subject was asked by the appellant. If an instruction embodying that idea was desired by the appellant, he should have requested the court to instruct the jury specifically upon that subject. It would not have been error for the court to have refused upon the case as made to modify its instructions according to appellant's present contention. There is nothing whatever in the record which either proves or indicates that the plaintiff intended to make an election when he requested payment of the individual, who was there apparently to settle the accounts of the Post Hole mine. The request, under the circumstances under which it was made, would not amount to an election binding upon the plaintiff.

The only remaining error discussed is the one based upon the refusal of the court to grant a new trial upon the case as it went to the jury. The case seems to have been fairly tried. There is evidence enough in the record to support the verdict, and there is nothing which discloses either passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. Under these circumstances, when the verdict is abundantly supported by the testimony, this court will not disturb the judgment, whatever their opinion may be in regard to its weight or its preponderance. There is no error apparent upon the record. The judgment should be affirmed.

JACKSON V. ACKROYD.

TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—MATTERS NOT IN ISSUE.

In an action for damages to property abutting upon a street, the complaint alleged that an embankment had been constructed by the receiver in addition to one already built in the middle of the street prior to the time plaintiff acquired title and claimed damages for such addition. The court instructed the jury as to the measure of damages for the injuries caused by the construction of the embankment in the first instance. Held that, as the only issue was upon the question of damages caused by the construction of the addition, the instruction was erroneous.

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Arapahoe county.

Defendant in error commenced this suit on the 23d day of February, 1886, by filing a complaint in which it is alleged that she then was, and at all times since January 17, 1883, has been, the owner in fee-simple of certain property, describing the same, and of the buildings and improvements thereon, "which but for the injuries herein-after complained of would be of the value of, to-wit, fifteen thousand dollars, but which, because of said injuries, are only of the value of seven thousand five hundred dollars." "(2) That the property abuts on Sixth street, in the city of Denver, which street has at all times since November, 1861, been one of the public streets of the city of Denver," etc. "(3) That long prior to the appointment of said defendant, as receiver of said railroad company, the said railroad company entered upon said street in front of the premises of the plaintiff, and near the center of said street, and constructed a grade or embankment thereon six feet high, and wide enough for a double-track railway, which it then laid down on said grade, and continued to occupy the same for railroad purposes from thence until the appointment of said receiver, and for the running of cars propelled by steam, leaving a space of only about eight feet between their said embankment and the outer edge of the sidewalk. That since the appointment of defendant as receiver of said company, and on, to-wit, the 1st day of September, A. D. 1884, he, as such receiver, entered upon that portion of the street lying between the said embankment in front of plaintiff's premises and the sidewalk, and built thereon another or an addition to the said railroad grade to the height of six feet, and of the width of eight feet, thereby occupying all of said street not previously occupied by said grade adjacent to plaintiff's said premises except the sidewalk, and encroaching on said sidewalk two feet; so that by the wrongful acts of said receiver all ingress and egress to and from her said lots have been wholly cut off for vehicles of all kinds, except upon the sidewalk, the safety of her said property endangered, the comfortable and profitable enjoyment thereof invaded, the rental values decreased one-half, and the actual value thereof decreased in the sum of seven thousand five hundred dollars; and that all of said acts of the said receiver were committed against the will of plaintiff, and without compensation to her. (4) That at all times since the construction of said additional embankment by the said receiver he has been charged with the sole management of said railroad, and has been running trains of cars on and over said railroad in front of plaintiff's said premises, at all hours of the day and night, and has been and is now occupying the said embankment for railroad purposes, to the exclusion of the public and of the plaintiff from the use of said street, and the special damage of the plaintiff as aforesaid. (5) That the said William S. Jackson was duly appointed receiver of the said railroad company by the circuit court of the United States on the 9th day of July, A. D. 1884, and qualified and took control and sole management of the said railroad property and equipment thereof on the 11th day of the same month, by virtue of the order and decree of said honorable court, made in a certain cause then and now pending in said court, wherein Elias L. Frank et al. are complainants, and the Denver & Rio Grande Railway Company et al. are defendants, and that he is now operating, controlling, and managing all of the affairs and business of said railway by virtue of his said appointment. Wherefore plaintiff demands a judgment against said William S. Jackson, as receiver as aforesaid, for the sum of seven thousand and five hundred dollars, her damages as aforesaid, and for the costs of this suit."

A demurrer was filed on the ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action, which was overruled. Defendant answered specifically, denying the allegations of the complaint, and as a special defense alleged the corporate character of defendant; the granting of the right of way to defendant by the city by an ordinance of June, 1871, through the street in question, and in front of the premises of plaintiff, authorizing it to build, maintain, and operate the railway along and over the street, "together with the right to lay down a single or double tracks, switches, or sidings," etc.; setting out the ordinance in hæc verba, in which it is provided that the established grade of a railway through the street in front of plaintiff's property should be regarded as the grade of the street; alleges the construction of the road upon an embankment in the street; the continual operation of the same, without objection on the part of plaintiff, until it went into the hands of the receiver on the 12th day of July, 1884; and continues as follows: "And this defendant further alleges that the said embankment on which said railway is situated, along and at the side of the premises of the plaintiff, has not been raised or widened since the year 1880; that the grade line of railway along said street is still the established grade of said street as such; that ever since the construction of said railway, and of said embankment, the same have been situated, operated, and used in the same manner as at the time of the institution of this suit; that the same have been so situated and so operated for more than six (6) years prior to the beginning of this action, during all of which said time plaintiff has made no complaint and raised no objection to the existence or operation of the same;" and for a further defense pleads that the cause of action did not accrue within six years. The special defenses were traversed by a replication. On June 8 and 9, 1887, trial was had to a jury.

The defendant, among others, prayed the court to give the following instructions: "(4) The defendant is not liable to the plaintiff for any depreciation of the value of the property mentioned in the complaint prior to the purchase of the same by the plaintiff. (5) If you find from the evidence that the defendant's railroad had been constructed and operated before the plaintiff's purchase of her property, substantially the same as it has been since, and that the plaintiff bought the property with knowledge of the existence and operation of the railroad in front of same, then she is not entitled to recover from the defendant by reason of the continued operation and maintenance of said railroad. (6) Where one buys a city lot bordering upon ground set apart or dedicated to any public use, he takes it subject to all the annoyances incident to the purpose of the dedication; and in this case, if Sixth street, in front of plaintiff's premises, was occupied by the defendant for railroad purposes by authority of the city of Denver, the plaintiff in purchasing said premises took them subject to the annoyances of the proximity of the railroad and its operation;" which were refused, and exceptions saved to the refusal of each. The court, upon its own motion, instructed the jury as follows: "The only question to be submitted to you for consideration is, how much is this plaintiff entitled to, by way of compensation, for any diminution in value of the property owned by her which has been described to you in the testimony? If the defendant company built its railroad along the street adjacent to the property belonging to the plaintiff, for the purpose of operating the same in the manner usual with railroad companies, then the plaintiff is entitled to recover the difference between the value of the property as it was before the railroad company took the street for the purpose of its road, and the value after it had been taken for that purpose, and the operation of its road as a railroad. * * * The question then will be simply as to the difference in value by reason of the building and operating of the road upon the established grade, as compared with the value of the property before the construction of the road. * * * If the jury find from the evidence that the property of the plaintiff has received permanent injury and damage from the maintenance and operation of defendant's railway, then the measure of her compensation is the actual diminution in the market value of her premises for any use to which they may reasonably be put." Defendant excepted to the charge. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $500. A motion for a new trial was overruled, and judgment entered upon the verdict.

Elizabeth Ackroyd, pro se.

REED, C., (after stating the facts as above.) The case here presented for examination and review is peculiar. The case made by the complaint is one against the receiver, who was appointed July 9, 1884, and entered into the possession and assumed the management of the property on the 11th of the same month, for special damages and injury to the property of defendant in error by acts alleged to have been committed by him, commencing on, to-wit, September 1, 1884. It is alleged in the third paragraph of the complaint that at that date the receiver entered upon the street between the former embankment and the sidewalk in front of the premises, built another embankment eight feet wide and six feet high, using all the street upon that side and two feet of the sidewalk, "so that by the wrongful act of said receiver all ingress and egress to and from her said lots have been wholly cut off for vehicles of all kinds, except upon the sidewalk, the safety of her said property injured, the comfortable and profitable enjoyment thereof invaded, the rental values decreased one-half, and the actual value thereof decreased in the sum of seven thousand five hundred dollars." In the former part of the same paragraph it is stated, as a necessary part of the history of the case, that long prior to the appointment of the receiver the road had been built; that there was in the middle of the street an embankment six feet high, wide enough for two tracks, etc.; and that from the time of its construction to the appointment of the receiver the railroad company had continued to operate the road, etc. There is no allegation of damage and diminution of value of the property by reason of its original construction and operation from its inception down to September 1, 1884,—no complaint or claim for damage. It seems to have been conceded that defendant in error bought the property subject to all the inconveniences arising from the former building and subsequent operation of the road, as it had been built and was being operated at the time of such purchase. The only acts complained of, and for which damages were sought, were those of the receiver, as shown in paragraphs 3 and 4 of the complaint. These allegations in the complaint were specifically denied in the general answer, and again in the second defense, where it is said: "And this defendant further alleges that the said embankment on which said railway is situated, along and at the side of the premises of the plaintiff, has not been raised or widened since the year 1880; that the grade line of railway along said street is still the established grade of said street as such." The issues so made were the only ones that could have been properly tried under the complaint. But plaintiff in error, after specifically traversing the allegations in the complaint, did not deem it sufficient, but pleaded the right of way obtained from the city, and alleged the original building and operation of the road in front of the property in nearly the same language that the fact was stated in the complaint, and adding the plea of the statute of limitations. The extent and scope of the suit seem to have been misconceived by plaintiff in error, and regarded as a proceeding to recover damage for the original construction,—on no other theory can we understand its defenses,—and the eminent judge before whom the case was tried seems to have fallen into the same error. The case, as made by the pleadings against the receiver for alleged injuries to the property after September 1, 1884, was not tried at all. Some testimony in regard to the alleged injuries was introduced by plaintiff in error, which we shall have occasion to refer to hereafter. The inquiry to which the testimony was directed was that propounded to the first witness, and runs through the entire testimony of defendant in error, viz., the value of the property in its present condition, and what its value would have been if the railroad had never been constructed and operated. And the same question is distinctly submitted to the jury by the first paragraph of the instruction given by the court, and afterwards condensed, and again given in these words: "The question, then, will be simply as to the difference in value by reason of the building and operating of the road upon the established grade, as compared with the value of the property before the construction of the road." The instruction, aside from not being directed to any issue in the case, is hard to be understood and applied. It was alleged and conceded that the road was constructed in 1871. We can find no testimony in the record to show what the value of the property was before the construction of the road, or for some years afterwards. It will be observed that no instruction whatever was given by the court regarding the alleged wrongful acts of the receiver, and special damage by reason of the alleged further use and appropriation of the street by the receiver after September 1, 1884, for which the suit was brought, and upon which the issues were made. It is ably contended in argument by counsel for plaintiff in error that defendant in error, who became the purchaser of the property in 1883, could not maintain an action for damages to the property for the building and operation of the road, as it had been built and operated some 12 years before she became the owner, and cite numerous authorities in support of the proposition. They also contend that the instructions asked in support of their position, numbered 4, 5, and 6, should have been given, and that the refusal was error. In a proper case, where the question was properly raised and necessary to be determined, we might agree with counsel, and hold that a refusal to so instruct was error. Ditch Co. v. Anderson, 8 Colo. 131, 6 Pac. Rep. 515; Railroad Co. v. Loeb, 118 Ill. 203, 8 N. E. Rep. 480; Railroad Co. v. McAuley, 121 Ill. 160, 11 N. E. Rep. 67; Railroad Co. v. Maher, 91 Ill. 312; Bizer v. Power Co., 70 Iowa, 145, 30 N. W. Rep. 172; Railroad Co. v. Strange, 63 Wis. 178, 23 N. W. Rep. 432. But this would not preclude the owner from recovering special damages for unwarranted acts further diminishing the value of the property after he or she became the owner. Counsel for defendant in error urge that the judgment should be affirmed, and say, in speaking of the cause of action as stated in the complaint: "She alleges the construction of the railroad as originally constructed long prior thereto, but only by way of inducement. * * * She then shows the appointment of Jackson as receiver, and that on September 1, 1884, and subsequently, he caused the damage complained of;" reiterating the allegations of the complaint. Then adds: "It was for this additional burden thus imposed that plaintiff sued and recovered after a trial before a most careful and learned judge. * * * The recovery was limited to the damages sustained between the date of the addition to the embankment, September 1, 1884, and the service of the summons, February 19, 1886. * * * The injuries complained of could not have accrued to the grantor of the plaintiff, because they arose long after her title accrued." Again, counsel say: "We do not sue for the operation of the railroad constructed and in use at the date of our purchase, but for the invasion of our right to the occupancy and use of a part of a public thoroughfare open to public use at the date of our purchase, and taken afterwards by the defendant for railroad purposes, whereby we were entirely foreclosed of the use of the street on which our lots abut." The statement of counsel in regard to the scope, intent, and object of the suit, as stated in the complaint, is correct. But we cannot agree with their conclusion that the recovery was limited to damages accruing after September 1, 1884. We can find no testimony introduced on the part of defendant in error (plaintiff below) in support of the allegations in the complaint of the wrongful acts of the receiver after his appointment. Two or three witnesses testified to an increased use of the street by widening and raising the embankment and the addition of tracks between the date of its construction and bringing suit, but no dates are given except by the witness Eckels, who says: "The change was made in the spring of 1881." The whole inquiry on the part of defendant in error on the trial seems to have been predicated upon the supposed right to recover damage for the original construction and subsequent operation of the road. On the part of the defendant (plaintiff in error) two or three witnesses testified that, after the appointment of the receiver, only changes of slight importance were made; consequently the case attempted in the complaint fails for want of evidence, and the judgment was erroneous. But, as shown above, there was an entire departure, and the trial of another and different case. The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

RICHMOND and BISSELL, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ELECTIONS—FRAUD—QUO WARRANTO—PARTIES—PRACTICE.

1. Where the judges of election fraudulently admit illegal and exclude legal votes to an extent that cannot be shown with reasonable certainty, the entire return will be rejected.

2. In a contested election case, where an order is made, on motion of respondent, to require relator to furnish a list of the names of persons alleged to have voted illegally, he may give names of persons, legally registered, whose ballots were cast by others whose identity cannot be shown.

3. Const. Colo. art. 12, § 1, provides that every person holding a civil office in a municipality shall, unless removed according to law, exercise the duties of such office until his successor is duly qualified. Held, that where a candidate for mayor is by the proper canvassing board declared elected, and, filing his oath, enters upon the discharge of his official duties, the outgoing mayor vacating the office without objection, the court may, on the election being contested and adjudged illegal, order him to yield the office to the president of the board of supervisors, since Laws Colo. 1885, p. 90, § 11, provides that in case of a vacancy in the office of mayor the president of the board of supervisors shall act.

4. Under Civil Code Colo. § 289, providing that an action may be brought by the district attorney in the name of the people, on relation and complaint of a private party, against any one unlawfully holding an office, or, in case of his neglect, by such private party on his own relation, in the name of the state, such action may be brought by the defeated candidate, though he may not be entitled to the office.

5. In such action the court may, against respondent's objection, call a jury, and submit special issues to them to aid him in his finding of facts, under Civil Code Colo. § 173, which provides that in actions other than for the recovery of property, or money due on contract, or for damages for breach of contract, or for injuries, the issues of fact must be tried by the court, subject to its power to order any issue to be tried by a jury.

6. Where, in quo warranto proceedings, in which the sheriff was relator, to determine the right to an office, a special venire for jurors was issued, respondent's challenge to the array, on the ground that the regular panel was not exhausted, was properly overruled.

7. Jurors sworn to well and truly try the matters at issue may make any special findings of fact raised under the pleadings, and need not be resworn during the trial, if the pleadings are not changed.

Error to district court, Arapahoe county.

At a municipal election held in April, 1889, relator, Barton, and respondent, Londoner, were opposing candidates for the office of mayor of the city of Denver. The returns showed an apparent majority for respondent, who was duly declared elected, received his certificate of election, took the requisite oath, and entered upon his official duties. Relator at once instituted the present proceeding, and a demurrer to his complaint or petition was sustained; but on a former review by the supreme court (22 Pac. Rep. 764) it was held that while an election contest proper was, under the circumstances, not maintainable, the pleading in question contained averments sufficient to lay the foundation for a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto, and that in pursuance thereof the title of respondent might, on behalf of the people, be thus investigated. The cause went back to the district court, the issue mentioned was made, and, upon trial, judgment of ouster was rendered against respondent. To reverse this judgment the present writ of error was sued out.

The special findings of the court contain the following, among other, conclusions of fact: "That with respect to the conduct of said election upon said 2d day of April, 1889, in the 18th, 19th, and 30th precincts of said city, and in each and every of said three precincts, upon the evidence introduced upon the trial of said cause, and upon the findings made by the jury with respect thereto, the court finds that certain persons combined and confederated together to procure the casting of illegal ballots for the defendant for said office of mayor; that such persons did procure to be cast for the defendant for the office of mayor fraudulent and illegal ballots in the 18th precinct, to the number of about 210, in the 19th precinct about 220, and in the 30th precinct about 250; that it is not possible to estimate or calculate with reasonable certainty the number of illegal ballots cast in either the 18th, 19th, or 30th precincts for the defendant for the office of mayor; that fraud was practiced in each of said three precincts in the conduct of said election, and such fraud culminated in the deposit of illegal votes in the ballot-boxes in each of said precincts, and the same were counted, returned, and canvassed; that such illegal votes amounted to about the following in number, to-wit: In the 18th precinct, to about 100 illegal votes; in the 19th precinct, to about 100 illegal votes; and in the 30th precinct, to about 150 illegal votes; that the casting, counting, and returning of said illegal votes was done with the knowledge of some of the election judges in each of said precincts, and the acts of such judges of election in so receiving, counting, and returning such illegal votes were knowingly, willfully, and deliberately done; that the conduct of the judges of election at each of said three precincts was not fair or faithful in receiving legal votes, and rejecting illegal votes; that fraud was practiced in the conduct of said election in each of said three precincts, and some of the judges of election participated in such fraud in each of said three precincts; that the judges of election receiving ballots in each of said three precincts connived at, consented to, acquiesced in, and knowingly permitted the casting of illegal votes at said election for the office of mayor; that the judges of said election, receiving ballots in each of said three precincts, negligently and carelessly permitted the casting of illegal ballots for the office of mayor; that the judges of election, receiving ballots in each of the said three precincts, intentionally disregarded challenges offered against illegal votes, and such disregard led to the deposit of illegal votes in each of said three precincts; that the judges of election, receiving ballots in each of said three precincts, received votes without challenging the persons offering them, or requiring such persons to be sworn after receiving reasonable and credible notice that such persons were not entitled to vote, or that they were voting upon the names of other persons, or that they had voted before; that votes were cast at said election for the defendant for mayor by persons on the names of persons other than themselves, in each of said three precincts, to the number of about 100 in the 18th, and about 100 in the 19th, and about 150 in the 30th, precincts; that the judges of election in the 30th precinct refused to permit persons entitled thereto to inspect the register list of said precinct for the purpose of preparing a challenge book; that the police officers, or some of them, who were present at the polling places in each of said three precincts, connived at the casting of illegal votes for mayor, and interfered to prevent the challenging of illegal voters, and by force or threats prevented the challenging of illegal votes at said election; that the polling place in the said 30th precinct was so boarded up that the voters, when casting their ballots, could not see the ballot-box or the persons in the room other than the judge who was receiving the ballots, nor could the bystanders or citizens immediately in front of the polling place see the ballot-box or the persons in the room other than the judge who was receiving the ballots, nor could the voters when voting, nor the bystanders or citizens immediately in front of the polling place, see what disposition was made of the ballots after they were handed to the election judge; that said polling place was so boarded up by the order of the then chief of police of the said city of Denver, and in the interest of the candidacy of the defendant for mayor; that the public registry list in said 30th precinct was torn down and taken away by a police officer of said city of Denver, and working at said election in the interest of defendant, for the purpose of preventing persons from making a challenge book to be used at said election; that Matthew Finehart and one ——— Wenning acted as clerks of election at said election in said 30th precinct, and neither said Finehart nor said Wenning was an elector in or of said 30th precinct; that in said said 18th precinct, during the progress of said election, the said Elias R. Barton, as a candidate for said office of mayor, presented to one of the judges of election in said precinct, and who was then receiving ballots thereat, a written request, addressed to the judges of election at said precinct, that J. N. Douglas, a friend of said Barton, be permitted to be present within the polling place while the ballots were being received and counted, and said judge peremptorily refused and denied such request."

Civil Code Colo. § 173, provides: "An issue of law shall be tried by the court, unless it be referred, as provided in the title in regard to references. In actions for the recovery of specific real or personal property, with or without damages, or for money claimed as due on contract, or as damages for breach of contract, or for injuries, an issue of fact must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial is waived or a reference is ordered, as provided in this Code. In other cases, issues of fact must be tried by the court, subject to its power to order any such issue to be tried by a jury, or to be referred to a referee, as provided in this Code." Section 289 provides: "An action may be brought by the district attorney in the name of the people of this state, upon his own information, or upon the relation and complaint of a private party, against any person who usurps, intrudes into, or unlawfully holds or exercises any public office, civil or military, or any franchise, within his district in the state; and it shall be the duty of the district attorney to bring the action whenever he has reason to believe that any such office or franchise has been usurped, intruded into, or unlawfully held or exercised by any person, or when he is directed to do so by the governor; and, in case such district attorney shall neglect or refuse to bring such action upon the complaint of a private party, such action may be brought by such private party upon his own relation, in the name of the people of the state."

Lucius P. Marsh and L. C. Rockwell, for plaintiff in error. Pence & Pence and Sam P. Rose, for defendant in error.

HELM, C. J., (after stating the facts.) The extraordinary conclusions of fact embodied in the findings of the trial court were predicated upon a solemn, fair, and extended judicial investigation, and are in substantial accord with the answers of the jury to questions propounded. We are bound to regard them as amply sustained by the proofs—First, because only a small portion of the evidence is before us, and inquiry on our part into its sufficiency is therefore precluded; and, second, because this sufficiency is admitted, the record reciting that "respondent makes no point, and does not claim, that the verdict of the jury is contrary to the evidence." The findings mentioned refer to frauds perpetrated in three specified election precincts within the city of Denver. The following is a brief epitome of these findings in so far as they bear upon one branch of the subject in hand: That the conduct of the election judges was neither fair nor faithful; that they knowingly, willfully, and deliberately received, counted, and returned illegal votes for respondent; that they purposely disregarded challenges offered against fraudulent votes; that they refrained from challenging or swearing, as required by law, persons tendering ballots, after reasonable and credible notice that such persons were not entitled to vote, or that they were voting on the names of other citizens, or that they had voted before, and were therefore repeaters; that they refused to permit persons entitled thereto to inspect the registry list for the purpose of preparing a challenge book; and that, in defiance of statute, they deliberately denied the request of relator, who was a candidate, to have a friend admitted into the polling place to witness the receiving, depositing, and counting of votes; that the police officers of the city, acting in the interest of respondent, conspired at the casting of illegal votes; wrongfully interfered, and by force or threats prevented the challenging of illegal voters; boarded up one of the polling places so that persons offering their ballots, and citizens immediately in front, could not see the ballot-box, or know the disposition made of the ballots when handed to the election judges; tore down and took away the preparation of challenge books; and otherwise obstructed an honest election. In addition to the foregoing, it further appears from the findings in question that although "about" 350 votes were shown to have been fraudulently cast for respondent by individuals upon the registered names of other persons, yet it was not possible to estimate or calculate with reasonable certainty the whole number of illegal ballots which, through the official misconduct mentioned, were deposited and counted, or the number thus received and returned for respondent. Upon the record thus made, the court declined to consider the returns from the precincts in question; and, respondent's election being thereby defeated, a judgment of ouster followed.

If it be proper under any circumstances to reject the entire poll of an election precinct, this would seem to be a case justifying such action. In large cities illegal votes will frequently find their way into the ballot-box, despite the utmost vigilance and honesty of election officials; but, with strict integrity in the management of elections, the danger in this regard may be reduced to the minimum, and a reasonably fair expression by the qualified electors be secured. When, however, the men whose sworn duty it is to superintend and conduct the receiving, depositing, counting, and returning of votes become active participants in a conspiracy to secure dishonest and fraudulent results, confidence in the potency and purity of the ballot can no longer exist. Considered with a view to the public weal, this offense cannot be characterized with sufficient severity, nor can the magnitude of the threatened danger be fully realized. The crime of the illegal voter is venial, and his act harmless, in comparison. Such conduct renders futile the attempt to express the popular will through the ballot-box. Elections thus conducted become the medium whereby corrupt and designing men, almost with impunity, carry out their conspiracies against the rights of the people and the public interests. The exigency calls for a more radical and effective remedy than is furnished by provisions for punishing the corrupt officials. If, despite serious and discouraging difficulties, convictions be sometimes secured, the public injury inflicted is not repaired, and the menace to the public welfare loses but a small part of its gravity. The existence of the power to discard the entire return is a public necessity, and its exercise under proper circumstances is sanctioned by the overwhelming weight of judicial authority. But since the employment of this power always results in the nullifying of legal, as well as illegal, votes, unless the legality be shown by proof outside the return it should be invoked with caution, and as a dernier resort. The injury suffered by the legal voter is tolerated for the public good alone; and then, only, when the integrity of elections cannot be otherwise assured. The presumption that officers charged with the duty of conducting elections have in good faith fulfilled the resulting obligation, always obtains until the contrary is shown; and the fact that illegal ballots have been cast, or that irregularities in the management of the election have taken place, does not ordinarily warrant the application of this remedy. But when it is clearly established that frauds subversive of the purity of the ballot-box, and tending to nullify the popular will, have been perpetrated by election officers, or have been perpetrated by others with their knowledge, connivance, and consent, and the extent of such frauds cannot be disclosed with reasonable certainty, the integrity of the entire return is destroyed, and it should be rejected. Judge McCrary states the proposition even more broadly. He says: "The safe rule, probably, is that where an election board are found to have willfully and deliberately committed a fraud, even though it affect a number of votes too small to change the result, it is sufficient to destroy all confidence in their official acts, and to put the party claiming anything under the election conducted by them to the proof of his votes by evidence other than the return." McCrary, Elect. (8d Ed.) § 541 et seq., and cases cited. And he declares the same rule applicable when the integrity of returns is destroyed by misconduct of the officials, consisting in "a reckless disregard of the law, or in ignorance of its requirements," though no corrupt purpose be affirmatively shown. Id. § 540. "The returns will not be rejected until they have been shown to be so tainted with fraud, or so radically defective or incomplete, that the truth cannot be deduced from them. Where this is shown, however, the returns will be ignored." Mechem, Pub. Off. § 227, and cases cited.

It is not necessary, after what has been said, to further comment upon the sufficiency of the facts before us to justify the application of the foregoing rule. In consulting authorities upon the subject, including decisions not cited by McCrary or Mechem, we have found no instance where the extent of the official misconduct surpasses that disclosed in the case at bar. But the rejection of the returns from the three precincts named did not necessarily defeat respondent's election. The burden of proof then shifted, and it devolved upon him to establish, by evidence allunde, that, notwithstanding the illegal voting and other frauds proven, a sufficient number of legal ballots were cast for him to insure his success. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 229; McCrary, Elect. § 535. We are not advised, however, that he offered any extrinsic proofs whatever for the purpose of discharging this burden.

Counsel for respondent, both in their printed brief and in oral argument, assert that respondent is not shown to have been in any way connected with the illegal and disgraceful conduct disclosed in this case. The assertion is not controverted by opposing counsel. And in justice to respondent we should state, before leaving this branch of the case, that there is nothing in the 75 answers of the jury to as many questions prepared by counsel for relator, or in the 27 findings of fact by the court, or in the pleadings, or in any other part of the record before us, which shows that he himself assisted in or sanctioned the frauds proven, or that he had any knowledge thereof. Although these frauds were perpetrated in his interest, so far as it appears from this record, he may have believed, until the contrary was proven at the trial, that his election was conducted in a fair and honorable manner, and that he had received the legal majority appearing on the face of the returns. But these facts, while tending to establish a personal vindication, cannot change the result of the judicial inquiry; for the impeachment and repudiation of the returns do not depend upon the guilt or innocence of the candidate. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 227.

But counsel for respondent earnestly and ably contend that, by virtue of certain irregularities and rulings precedent to and connected with the trial, their client's interests were so prejudiced as to render necessary a reversal of the judgment. We shall consider these objections as briefly as may be consistent with a fair response to the arguments adduced in their support. Before the trial commenced, respondent filed a motion asking that petitioner be required to furnish a list of the names of those persons, in each of the precincts mentioned, alleged to have illegally voted for him. This motion was sustained, and an order accordingly entered. In response thereto, relator furnished the names of persons, legally registered, upon which ballots for respondent were cast by men falsely personating the voters thus registered. During the trial, testimony was admitted, over respondent's objection, showing that "about" 350 of the votes polled for him in those precincts were received from this class of fraudulent voters. It is claimed that this was error; that the notice given was not in compliance with the court's order, and was wholly insufficient to justify the admission of these proofs. If counsel's contention in this regard be correct, such frauds as the one in question might be perpetrated with impunity; for, when the illegal voter has cast his vote in the name of a legally registered elector, it will generally be impossible to learn his true name. In elections like the one now under consideration, where thousands of votes are polled, and where most of the men who perpetrate frauds of this kind belong to the criminal class, or are transients, and have no regular place of abode, it is practically impossible to discover their whereabouts and make known their identity. The purpose of the court's order in the premises was to inform respondent what particular votes were regarded by relator as fraudulent, so that he might prepare himself with the requisite testimony, if existing, to disprove the averment; and, when the names upon which illegal votes had been polled were given, the information was as complete as the nature of the particular fraud reasonably allowed. With this notice, respondent could not have been greatly surprised, and his facilities for investigation were but little, if any, inferior to those of relator. The order was sufficiently complied with; and, had the court refused to receive the evidence in question, error would have been committed.

"do forthwith yield and deliver up to the president of the board of supervisors" the said office of mayor, together with all books, papers, keys, furniture, etc., belonging thereto. This mandate is challenged as erroneous. It was undoubtedly made in obedience to the supposed requirement of section 11, p. 90, Sess. Laws 1885, which reads: "In case of a vacancy in the office of mayor, or in case the mayor shall for any reason be temporarily unable to perform the duties of the office, the president of the board of supervisors shall act as mayor." The charter of Denver provides that the mayor shall hold his office for the period of two years. Sess. Laws 1885, p. 88; Sess. Laws 1887, p. 85. It contains no clause directing that he continue until his successor qualifies. Counsel for respondent are mistaken in assuming that section 1, p. 98, Sess. Laws 1885, applies to the case in hand. The language therein, providing for the holding over of municipal officers, is expressly limited to those serving or elected in 1885. The constitution (article 12, § 1) is, however, broad enough to include this position. It says, inter alia: "Every person holding any civil office under the state or any municipality therein, shall, unless removed according to law, exercise the duties of such office until his successor is duly qualified." Under this constitutional provision, the incumbent of the office at the time of respondent's installation was entitled to remain until his successor was "duly qualified." It appears that respondent was by the proper canvassing board declared duly elected; that he filed his oath of office, took all the formal steps necessary to constitute the prescribed "qualification," and entered upon the discharge of his official duties. It may be that thereupon the constitutional requirement was satisfied; but if the fact, since revealed, that respondent was not duly elected, vitiates, by virtue of the constitution, the alleged "qualification," still we cannot say that the judgment of the court in the premises is fatally defective. The preceding mayor is not a party to this action, and is not complaining. The record affirmatively shows that he not only voluntarily issued to respondent the proper certificate attesting his election, but also, in like manner, vacated the office, and turned over to respondent all papers, books, documents, furniture, etc., belonging thereto. Relator, who was the opposing candidate, could not be installed. People v. Londoner, 13 Colo. 303, 22 Pac. Rep. 764. Under these circumstances, there is, in our opinion, no question but that upon entry of the judgment of ouster, upwards of a year later, the clause of the charter above mentioned became operative. A vacancy, within the meaning of this provision, then existed, to be filled, for the time being, at least, by the president of the board of supervisors. Had the outgoing mayor been a candidate for reelection, and had he refused to turn over the office or recognize his successor until forcibly dispossessed, the situation would perhaps have been different, and a different question might be presented. But even under such circumstances this case would not be parallel to that of U. S. v. Addison, 6 Wall. 291, relied on by respondent; for it appears in that case that the relator, Crawford, was found to have been duly elected by the proper canvassing board, and that the city council of Georgetown, in violation of law, refused him recognition, illegally assumed to examine or recount the vote, declared Addison, his opponent, elected, and installed him into the office; whereupon Crawford instituted the proceeding in which the decision was rendered, by information in the nature of quo warranto. It appears, further, that the statute thereunder consideration not only provided that the incumbent should hold until his successor had qualified, but contained also the further declaration that he should remain until his successor was "duly elected." Had the court rendered a judgment of ouster simply, the statute would have supplied an incumbent. The fact that the judgment mentions the statutory successor does not destroy its validity. Relator cannot complain; and, if one not a party to the record believes himself injured, he is not estopped from asserting his claim in the proper legal forum. The objection now under consideration must be declared invalid.

Relator was a resident, a tax-payer, and an elector within the city; and upon refusal of the district attorney to institute this proceeding, when requested by him, relator was undoubtedly authorized to do so himself. Civil Code, 289. The subsequent discovery of the fact that he could not be installed into the office did not render him incompetent to continue the suit as relator, or permit such continuance. It is true, he admitted upon the trial that he was not then employing counsel or advancing costs, and did not expect to incur any further liability in the case, but, in response to a question, he indicated that he was still interested personally "as any other citizen." And it does not appear that he requested a discontinuance, declined to allow the further use of his name, or in any legal way attempted to relieve himself from the responsibility connected with his position as the original moving party, or from the financial liability resulting. The motion interposed, after the former judgment by this court, to dismiss the action on the ground that there was no proper party complaining, and hence no warrant or authority of law for its further prosecution, was correctly denied.

Respondent objected to the calling of the jury, and insisted upon a trial by the court. The court ultimately, as we have seen, made his own findings of fact, and entered judgment accordingly. It is doubtful, therefore, if respondent could have been so prejudiced by the participation of the jury as to justify us in now listening to his complaint in this regard. Pfeiffer v. Riehn, 13 Cal. 643. But we do not consider the court's action in the premises improper. Our constitution does not declare that a jury may either be demanded or denied as a matter of course in the trial of civil cases; hence this is a proper subject for statutory regulation. The present proceeding clearly belongs to one of the classes of actions referred to in the last clause of section 173, Civil Code. This Code provision expressly recognizes the power to refer any specific issue or question of fact to a jury for trial. To this extent those proceedings at law covered by the statute are thus made similar to suits in equity; and the court possessed authority to invoke the assistance of a jury.

A special venire for jurors was issued, and respondent challenged the array on the ground that the regular panel was not exhausted, and there remained in attendance "more than sufficient" to try the cause. This challenge was overruled, though no issue of law or of fact was formally tendered in writing. We must regard the ruling as based upon a demurrer ore tenus to the petition, and as predicated upon the issue of law thus raised. In considering the sufficiency of the petition, the court doubtless took judicial notice of the statutes pertaining to the subject involved, and also that relator, one of its officers, was the sheriff. Coon v. Rigden, 4 Colo. 275. The record recites that, "the sheriff of said county being relator herein, the court ordered an open venire to issue to the coroner," etc. By statute, the sheriff is required to assist in drawing from the box provided the names of jurors to constitute the regular panel. It is also, in like manner, made his duty to serve the regular venire then issued, as well as special venires under which his choice is generally uncontrolled. By statute, also, the coroner is directed to serve all processes when the sheriff is a party to the cause. Had respondent, under the circumstances, objected to the regular panel, and moved for a special venire, the court might properly have sustained the objection and motion; though we do not say that, had he overruled the same, his action, in the absence of fraud or misconduct, would necessarily have been error. But the order in question was calculated to secure a more impartial investigation; and the people, being a party to the record, and profoundly interested in the result, were entitled to consideration as well as respondent. It must be remembered that the jurors were not called upon to try the case, as in ordinary legal actions. Their findings, as already indicated, were simply advisory, and did not control the decision. Moreover, the fact is perhaps worthy of mention in passing, though of course not decisive, that there is no averment in the petition, nor any pretense otherwise, that respondent was in the slightest degree prejudiced by the issue of the special venire. We shall decline to reverse the judgment upon this objection.

The jurors were summoned "for the trial of such issues as might thereafter be submitted to them by the court;" but the ordinary oath, "to well and truly try the matters at issue, * * * and a true verdict render, * * *" was administered. This oath is prescribed by statute, and under it a general or special verdict may be returned; or, in cases where general verdicts are rendered, special findings of fact may also be required, the latter controlling the general verdict, if inconsistent therewith. Civil Code, §§ 198, 199. "The usual oath taken by jurors includes any issue between the parties submitted to them on the trial of the cause." Thomp. & M. Juries, § 292. There was in the present case no amendment of the pleadings after the trial began; hence the issues were not changed, and no necessity existed under any of the decisions, so far as we have examined them, for reissuing the jury. Id. and cases cited. The cases of Kerschbaugher v. Slusser, 12 Ind. 453, and Hoot v. Spade, 20 Ind. 328, mentioned by counsel for respondent, differ from the one at bar in this important particular, and therefore have no application.

The complaint upon which the trial took place unquestionably states a cause of action. The averments are sufficient to sustain the findings and judgment. If a few of its numerous paragraphs incidentally allege conclusions of law, or contain matters touching relator's eligibility and his claim to the office, such matters may be regarded as surplusage. They did not affect the substantial rights of respondent; and, while they might have been stricken out, we do not deem their presence of sufficient importance to warrant interference by us at this stage of the proceedings. The case seems to have been tried with unusual care, and we find nothing in the record that justifies a reversal. The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

CARPENTER V. INNES.

REPLEVIN—AGAINST OFFICER—JURISDICTION.

Replevin will lie in any state court of competent jurisdiction, in favor of the owner of goods seized by an officer on a writ against a third person, in an attachment suit pending in any other court of the state.

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Mesa county.

Bucklin, Staley & Saffey and Byron Millett, for plaintiff in error. Richard A. Thompson, for defendant in error.

BISSELL, C. This was an action begun in June, 1885, in the county court of Mesa county, to recover of the defendant Innes the possession of certain personal property said to have been wrongfully taken by him and withheld from the plaintiff, with damages for the taking and detention. The defense interposed was a justification by the defendant under a process of attachment issued out of the county court of Arapahoe county, in a suit by W. A. Hover & Co. against one J. C. Kennedy. The goods in controversy were in the possession of the plaintiff Carpenter, but had been seized by the sheriff under the attachment issued against defendant Kennedy in the other suit. Upon the trial in the county court the issues were found for the defendant sheriff, and from that judgment an appeal was taken to the district court. When the case came on for trial in that court a stipulation was filed by the attorneys for the respective parties setting up the doubt that existed as to the jurisdiction of the court in an action of replevin brought against an officer who had taken goods under a writ issued against a third person, and stipulating that the sole question which should be tried at that time should be the one relating to the jurisdiction. The stipulation reserved all other questions for ultimate determination. Under this stipulation the hearing was had, and testimony was introduced which established the pendency of the other suit, the seizure by the sheriff of the goods claimed by the plaintiff, and evidence was tendered to show the plaintiff's ownership and title. The record was permitted to be offered, but proof of title was rejected. The decision was rendered upon the hypothesis that the property was in custodia legis, and followed what was erroneously supposed to be the rule laid down in Parks v. Wilcox, 6 Colo. 489. Since this decision by the district court, however, the precise question involved has been adjudicated by this tribunal. The rule has been established that replevin will lie in any state court of competent jurisdiction in favor of one who is the owner of goods which had been seized by the sheriff, or any other officer, upon a writ against a third person, where the suit in which the writ issued has been brought in any other of the courts of the state. The decision proceeds upon the principle that the taking by the officer is without authority, and wrongful, and that the process will afford him no justification if the proof establishes that he has taken property which did not belong to the person against whom the process runs. Wilde v. Rawles, 13 Colo. 563, 22 Pac. Rep. 897. Under this authority it is evident that the decision of the court, holding that it was without jurisdiction, was erroneous, and that the case must be reversed for further proceedings.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

In re HOUSE BILL NO. 165.

(Supreme Court of Colorado. March 12, 1891.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—QUESTIONS SUBMITTED TO SUPREME COURT.

As a general rule questions submitted under section 3 of article 6 of the constitution should be specific, and when the inquiry concerns the constitutionality of a bill the provision or provisions of the constitution supposed to be in conflict therewith should be indicated.

The opinion of the court is in response to the following communication from the honorable the house of representatives: "Whereas, there has been introduced in this body a bill known as 'House Bill No. 165,' entitled 'A bill for an act to provide for the creation of districts to be benefited by certain public improvements, and of a bonded indebtedness for the purpose of making such improvements,' a copy of which is hereto attached: Therefore be it resolved by the house of representatives that the supreme court of this state be requested to give its opinion of the constitutionality of said bill."

PER CURIAM. The bill of which the opinion of the court is requested, contains 18 sections, several of which are quite lengthy, and much involved. Its provisions are novel, and out of the ordinary channel of legislation in this state. If the bill should be adopted by the general assembly it would doubtless give rise to controversies involving various constitutional questions. The request for the opinion of this court by the vote of the house implies the existence of doubt in the minds of members as to the constitutionality of the proposed measure, and yet neither the preamble nor resolution gives any intimation as to what provision or provisions of the bill and of the constitution are supposed to be in conflict. We are not informed, therefore, of the particular matter to which our attention is invited; nor can we determine the direction in which to pursue an investigation. The points of contact, and perhaps of conflict, between a bill of such proportions and peculiarities and a constitution containing hundreds of sections may be numerous. It would be quite impossible for us to anticipate, much less to decide, all of them upon a general question submitted ex parte. See senate resolution, In re Irrigation, 9 Colo. 621, 21 Pac. Rep. 470. Should we attempt to give our views upon the constitutionality of the bill submitted, without more specific inquiry, we might devote a great deal of time and space to matters about which the honorable members of the house have no doubts, and still omit to consider the very question or questions upon which our opinion is desired. When the constitutionality of a statutory enactment is challenged in this court in ordinary litigation our attention is uniformly directed to some specific constitutional provision, and our opinion is limited accordingly. For these reasons we respectfully request that the honorable house favor us by indicating the particular provision of the constitution which they desired considered in connection with the bill submitted.

In re HOUSE BILL NO. 165.

UNIFORMITY OF TAXATION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

When the principal provisions of a bill with which the remaining provisions are inseparably connected in substance cannot be upheld as constitutional, the bill as a whole must be held invalid. A bill providing for public improvements by special taxes levied upon districts having territorial limits different from the municipal corporation levying the tax, and without limiting the rate of taxation or amount of indebtedness for such purposes, held unconstitutional. Quere, whether certain duties and responsibilities contemplated by the bill can be properly devolved upon district courts.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

STATEMENT AND OPINION UPON FURTHER INQUIRY.

Upon the announcement of the foregoing opinion the honorable house of representatives made further inquiry concerning the constitutionality of house bill No. 165, designating the following provisions of the constitution as bearing upon the subject, to-wit: Section 3 of article 10, section 8 of article 11, section 35 of article 5, and section 1 of article 7. The following synopsis of the bill is necessary to an understanding of the opinion: The bill provides, among other things, that the board of public works, city council, or board of trustees of any incorporated town or city, or the board of county commissioners of any county, may establish and define the territorial boundaries of a district of lands to be benefited by any public improvement, such as the establishing, widening, grading, paving, or otherwise improving any road, street, or alley, or the constructing, enlarging, or completing of any bridge or viaduct, or the establishing or improving of any public park, of peculiar benefit to the lands lying within the territorial jurisdiction of such board or council, and in the vicinity of the proposed improvement. That the district court of the county in which such district or proposed improvement or any part thereof is to be situated, shall upon petition of such board or council, or of any persons interested, declare and constitute such district, or several contiguous districts lying in different towns, cities, or counties, a single public improvement district for the purposes in said order expressed, and shall give the same a suitable name or number. That the district court shall call an election of certain property holders residing within said district for the purpose of voting upon the question of creating a bonded indebtedness wherewith to make the proposed improvement; the court to designate the time, place, and judges of said election. Provision is made for giving notice of the election and the manner of conducting the same; that, if a majority of the votes shall be cast for the bonds, then the bonded indebtedness shall be considered as duly authorized; that the judges shall make a verified report of the proceedings of said election to the district court; and that the court may approve or disapprove the report of the judges, and, in case of disapproval, may order a new election. Provision is also made for protesting against the approval of such report; but that, if it shall appear to the court, from such report or otherwise, that the proceedings at such election were substantially regular and fair, the court shall approve of said proceedings, and declare the location, nature, character, and uses of the proposed improvement, and further declare what amount of bonded indebtedness, if any, was duly authorized at said election; and in case the improvement district includes territory lying within the corporate limits of different towns, cities, or counties, the court is required to apportion the indebtedness between them. The bill also provides for the issue of district improvement bonds by the town, city, or county in convenient denominations, payable out of revenues to be derived from special taxes to be levied and assessed on all the taxable property in said improvement district by the proper board or boards of county commissioners; that such bonds shall constitute a lien upon such of the lands lying within such public improvement district as are also within the territorial jurisdiction of the corporate body issuing the same; and that it shall be the duty of the board of county commissioners of such county, and of each county in which said public improvement district, or any part thereof, is situated, annually to levy and assess a special tax on all the taxable property within said county and district for the payment of the interest or principal to accrue during the next calendar year according to the tenor and effect of said bonds. The collection of said special taxes for the use aforesaid by the county treasurer is also provided for.

PER CURIAM. Upon further request for an opinion as to the constitutionality of house bill No. 165, specific inquiries relating to several sections of the constitution in connection with the proposed enactment have been submitted. We have been favored with a brief argument ex parte in support of the constitutionality of the proposed measure. Upon consideration of the various matters involved in the questions submitted, we are of the opinion that the principal provisions of the bill, with which the remaining provisions are inseparably connected in substance, cannot be upheld as constitutional; and hence the answer to the legislative inquiry must be that the bill as a whole is unconstitutional. Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 178. In addition to the constitutional objections indicated by the specific inquiries, it has been suggested as doubtful whether certain of the duties and responsibilities contemplated by the bill can properly be devolved upon the district courts. See Const. arts. 3, 6.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—UNAUTHORIZED ACT—RATIFICATION—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY.

1. A contract, made by an agent without authority or subsequent ratification, to cancel a debt due from the firm, of which defendant was formerly a member, in consideration of his buying goods for his present employer from plaintiff, was not a defense to an action for the debt.

2. Where it was shown that a former member of a firm offered to pay one-half of the partnership debt for an individual release from the other portion, but there was no evidence of a legal tender of the amount, it was erroneous and misleading to charge that a tender was an offer to pay the amount due in cash.

Commissioners' decision. Error to Fremont county court.

A. Macon, for plaintiffs in error. Joseph H. Maupin, for defendants in error.

BISSELL, C. This action was originally brought before a justice by Burlock & Co. against the defendant Cross, to recover $265 for goods sold and delivered in the state of Wisconsin. The trial resulted in a judgment, from which an appeal was taken to the county court of Fremont county, where judgment was again rendered for plaintiffs for $122. The action was tried without written pleadings, and simply upon the statement of the cause of action which was originally made before the justice. There was no contention whatever concerning the substantial facts out of which the plaintiffs' cause of action grew. As already stated, the action was brought to recover the price and value of certain goods sold by Burlock & Co. to Cross & Hambright. The sale of the goods, and the amount and value, were conceded. The principal defense rested on an agreement said to have been made years after the sale with a traveling agent who represented Burlock & Co. Substantially, it was that, if the defendant Cross would purchase for the house in which he was then clerking what his employers needed in the line of goods carried and sold by the plaintiffs, the debt of Cross & Hambright would be forgiven. Cross testified that, in pursuance of the agreement, he gave an order for goods to be furnished to his firm, and subsequently, when he went into business for himself, continued to purchase goods from the same parties. Whether such an agreement, without more, can be said to be based upon a sufficient consideration to support it as a release of an existing debt, is a thing which in this opinion need not be determined. According to the proof in the case, the agreement was of no value for the purposes of a defense. It was made with a traveling salesman representing Burlock & Co., and as such he would be without authority to enter into any convention of that description which would bind his employers. In order to make the defense available, it was incumbent upon the defendant to show original authority in the salesman, or else a subsequent ratification of the act or agreement by the firm. It was conceded that there was no original authority. In order to support an agreement made by an agent who possesses no original authority, the ratification proven must be of the agreement originally entered into, and it must be shown to have been made with full knowledge of the thing to be ratified, and the intention of the principal must either be proven or necessarily inferable from the language and terms of the transaction between the parties. Nothing of this sort appears in the record. It is therefore apparent that this agreement, as originally made with the salesman, was not good as a defense, nor was it sustained by the proof offered of a subsequent ratification. An equally fatal error was committed by the court in the instructions which it gave to the jury. During the progress of the trial some testimony was offered by the defendant tending to show an offer on his part to pay one-half of the debt due from his firm, providing he could be released individually from the obligation to pay the other portion. On this testimony the court attempted to instruct the jury upon the law of tender. The court told them, in substance, that a tender was an offer to pay the amount due, and an offer to pay over the amount in cash. It should not have been given to the jury, for there was no evidence in the case that the plaintiff ever made any tender. It was not an accurate statement of the law, for the obligation to keep the tender good is as essential to the legal efficacy of a tender as the offer of the money itself. Neither having been done by the defendant, he was not entitled to have any instruction on that subject given to the jury. Evidently, the instructions must have misled them, and they must have regarded the offer to pay as the equivalent of a payment, for upon no other hypothesis could they have rendered the judgment for plaintiffs for less than one-half of the sum admitted to be due as principal on the original debt. The want of evidence to support the recovery, and the error committed by the court in its instructions to the jury, render it impossible to sustain the judgment. It should be reversed, and the cause remanded.

WILLIAMS V. HACKER.

RES JUDICATA—IDENTITY OF ISSUE.

Plaintiff brought an action against defendant for damages resulting from the forcible removal of a boundary fence, alleging in his complaint that he was the owner in fee of the ground from which the fence had been removed, and of that on which it had again been placed, and that the premises were then in possession of his tenant. Defendant admitted the doing of the acts charged, but denied plaintiff's title, and tendered issue of title in himself. Held, that a judgment in plaintiff's favor was conclusive as to the title of the disputed strip, as the issue of title in fee was indispensable to enable plaintiff to recover for the removal, and that in ejectment subsequently brought by him for the same land the judgment in the former action was admissible to show title in himself.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Boulder county.

O. F. A. Green, for appellant.

BISSELL, C. In September, 1886, Benjamin M. Williams brought this action against Rudolph H. Hacker to recover a strip of ground on the east side of lot 5, in block 147, in the town of Boulder. This block was bounded on the north by Hill street, and on the west by Fourteenth street. The strip was about seven feet wide, and ran the length of the north half of lot 5 as the town was originally platted. The defendant claimed that it was a portion of lot 4. The strip adjoined lot 4 on the west, and lot 5 on the east, and was a part of one or the other according to the determination of the lines or boundaries of the two lots. The town was laid out in the early days of the history of Colorado, and the monuments by which the exact location of the various lots and blocks might be determined had disappeared, and at the date of the trial could neither be found nor located. Neither side was able to introduce proof which would establish with certainty the boundaries or lines of either of the lots according to the original survey, and which would exactly determine the locus of the strip which both claimed. Testimony was offered by both parties upon the subject, but it is unnecessary to decide what the facts may be, in order to reach a satisfactory conclusion. The application of a well-established principle to the ascertained facts of this controversy will settle the rights of the parties.

During the progress of the trial, and at a proper time to maintain the issue on his part, the demandant offered in evidence the record in a case previously tried in that court between these parties. The testimony was rejected, and upon this ruling error is assigned. Whether it was error for the court to refuse to admit the testimony rests solely upon the conclusion which may be reached concerning the identity of the parties to the two actions, and concerning the subject-matter of the issue joined in the other suit. In the accurate and forcible language of Lord ELLENBOROUGH in the Outram Case, it is the law that a recovery in any one suit upon issue joined on matter of title is conclusive upon the subject-matter of such title. According to that learned authority, it was of little concern in what sort of a suit the issue might be presented. If the issue was tendered, accepted, tried, and determined, the adjudication was conclusive. The rule was based on the broad ground of estoppel; not an estoppel proceeding from the recovery, but growing out of and created by the matter alleged by the party, and upon which the recovery proceeded. The estoppel was the legitimate fruit of the tree which the pleader had planted and cultivated. The only inquiry was as to the identity of the parties and the issues. Whenever it was apparent from the record that they were one and the same, the record afforded conclusive evidence in relation to the title in any subsequent litigation over the original subject-matter of controversy. They were adjudged concluded from contending to the contrary, because the fact had been once distinctly put in issue, and solemnly adjudged. Outram v. Morewood, 3 East, 346; Small v. Haskins, 26 Vt. 209; Burt v. Sternburgh, 4 Cow. 559; Dunkle v. Wiles, 6 Barb. 529, 11 N. Y. 420. In nearly all the cases which uphold this rule the former action was in trespass, and much learning was employed to establish either the universality of the rule, or its right application to the facts of the particular controversy. Whether the former suit and judgment were pleaded in bar, or offered as evidence of title, the result was the same, and it was competent testimony in either case. They were all agreed that the estoppel arose, and furnished conclusive evidence of title, wherever the title was at issue. Of course, it was conceded that in an action of trespass the question of possession, or rather the right of possession, was often the only basis upon which the right of action rested; and that the title, therefore, was not necessarily concerned. But, as Lord ELLENBOROUGH said, this fact makes no difference whatsoever in the application of the doctrine to cases in which the title was involved. He held, broadly, that the judgment in every species of action was final for its own proper purpose and object; and that every species of judgment, from one in an action of trespass to one upon the right of property, was equally conclusive upon its own subject-matter by way of bar to future litigation for the thing decided. If the issue in the suit raised the question of title, and the fact was found against them, this finding created an estoppel which bound the parties and their privies.

It remains, then, to determine whether the record which was offered showed that the issue of title had once been tried between the parties, and that the plaintiff, therefore, had the right to tender it as evidence, or as conclusive evidence, upon the question. The record of the former action, according to the offer as preserved, contained the complaint, answer, replication, and the judgment. The offer as made by the plaintiff was broad enough to include the tender of proof of the identity of the premises in controversy, regardless of the issue raised in the record itself. In the case before us the identity of the premises is clearly apparent from the papers themselves. That suit was brought by Williams, the plaintiff in this action, against the present defendant, Hacker, to recover the damages resulting from the forcible removal of the boundary-line fence previously erected along the eastern boundary, which was thus made a new eastern boundary for lot 5. Williams set up in his complaint that he was the owner in fee of all the ground from which the fence had been removed, and of that upon which it had again been placed. He deraigned his title from the United States by a chain of mesne conveyances ending in himself. He averred that, at the time of the injury complained of, the premises were in the possession of one Snell, who was his yearly tenant in its occupation. After setting out the method of the removal, the digging of the post-holes, the injury to the freehold, and the waste committed thereby, he prays damages. The defendant, Hacker, accepted the issue, denied Williams' title, but admitted the doing of the acts which the plaintiff alleged as his particular injury. Not content with this, the defendant tendered a further issue of a title in himself to the particular strip of ground, which belonged to either one lot or the other, and therefore either to Hacker or to Williams, as the line might be found to run. The replication took issue upon Hacker's title thus asserted. Upon these issues there was a finding for the plaintiff, Williams, and a judgment followed in his favor, which stands unreversed. That this judgment adjudicated the title to the strip of ground can scarcely be disputed. The boundaries of the strip are given by metes and bounds in the complaint in the original suit, and these are identical and concurrent with the description of the same ground which is contained in the complaint in the present action. Further proof of the identity of the locus in quo in the one suit would hardly have been necessary, though under the offer it might have been made, had it been deemed at all essential; but the identity is so far apparent to the court from the inspection of the two records that it is impossible to do otherwise than hold that the trial court committed error in the refusal of these proofs. Had it been permitted to go to the jury with such proofs as might have been requisite to establish the absolute identity of the locus in quo, it would have been conclusive upon the question of title. That the plaintiff had the right to use the judgment as evidence of his own title is apparent from the authorities heretofore cited.

It is wholly unnecessary in this opinion to further refer to the elaborate discussions which have resulted in the establishment of the doctrine that estoppel will arise even in an action of trespass, provided the question of title has therein been made the subject-matter of an issue. Trespass would not have lain in favor of the plaintiff, Williams, when he brought his action against Hacker to recover for the damage which he had sustained by reason of the removal of the line fence. It is apparent from the record in that case that at the time of the institution of the suit the property was in the possession of a tenant under lease for a term. Under these circumstances the rule is that the landlord cannot maintain trespass against a stranger for an entry upon the property. The only injury for which the landlord may recover against a stranger is an injury to the inheritance; and his action must be an action of waste, or an action upon the case for the injury to his freehold. 2 Wat. Tresp. p. 392, § 948; Davis v. Nash, 32 Me. 411; Smith v. Felt, 50 Barb. 612; 2 Wat. Tresp. § 950, note. It is thus apparent that not only was the issue of title in fact made as between the parties, but also that this issue was indispensable to the recovery. It should therefore not have been permitted to be again litigated between them, but the judgment should have gone to the jury as conclusive evidence of the plaintiff's title. For the errors committed by the court with respect to this matter the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

RICHMOND and REED, CC., concur.

STATE FISCAL YEARS—REVENUES—APPROPRIATIONS.

1. The fiscal year of 1891, in Colorado, began December 1, 1890, and will end November 30, 1891.

2. The general assembly may properly appropriate to the support of the state government for the fiscal years 1891 and 1892 any surplus remaining after the payment of previous appropriations, and all revenues coming into the state treasury for those years, including taxes for such years to be hereafter levied.

Three questions are embraced in the resolution. The first has reference to the fiscal years from the revenues of which the appropriation for the support of the state government for the next two years may properly be made. The second relates to the right of the state treasurer to credit county treasurers with moneys paid out by the latter for scalps, under "An act for the destruction of wolves, coyotes, bears, and mountain lions, and providing a premium therefor," approved April 18, 1889. By the third, information is asked in reference to the salary of the state treasurer, the house being in doubt as to whether or not the present treasurer is entitled to the increase in salary provided by an act of the general assembly approved January 18, 1891.

PER CURIAM. The present fiscal year, which in our judgment may appropriately be called the fiscal year of 1891, commenced on December 1, 1890, and will end on November 30, 1891. The general assembly may properly appropriate to the support of the state government for the fiscal years 1891 and 1892 any surplus remaining after the payment of previous appropriations, and all revenues coming into the state treasury for those years, including the amounts to be derived from the taxes hereafter to be levied for said years, as provided by that body. For example, the taxes to be levied for the present fiscal year may be applied to the payment of appropriations for the fiscal year of 1891, although such taxes will not be delinquent until the year 1892. An answer to either the second or third inquiries would involve a determination of constitutional questions in reference to existing laws. Private rights are based upon these laws, which ought not to be determined upon an ex parte application such as this is. As a general rule, such rights should only be decided in the course of litigation, after the parties to be affected by the result have been accorded a full hearing. In re District Attorneys, 12 Colo. 466, 21 Pac. Rep. 478. Under the circumstances, we do not feel at liberty to express an opinion upon the matters embraced in such questions, and therefore respectfully request your honorable body to withdraw the same.

COLLINS v. BURNS.

COMPETENCY OF JURORS — ATTACHMENT—WAIVER OF DEFECTS—DISSOLUTION.

1. Where a juror heard "some of the facts," and formed "a slight opinion" at the time, but afterwards forgot even the facts, and another "heard of the case," and formed a conditional opinion, not, however, on the merits, and each swore on his voir dire that he thought he could try the case fairly and without regard to his previous opinion, it was not error to disallow challenges thereto, inasmuch as such opinions were not "unqualified * * * as to the merits of the action" within Civil Code Colo. § 182.

2. A writ of attachment was issued at the commencement of an action, and, the affidavit being traversed, the attachment was sustained in the county court. On appeal to the district court appellant allowed the case to be tried on its merits, without insisting on a disposition of his attachment traverse. Held, that the attachment issue was thereby abandoned.

3. An appeal-bond does not operate to release property taken on attachment.

Appeal from district court, Pitkin county.

Markham & Dillon, for appellant. Aaron Helms, for appellee.

HELM, C. J. The court did not err in overruling the challenges for cause to the jurors Hewitt and Tourtelotte. Hewitt had heard "some of the facts." Tourtelotte had "heard of the case." Hewitt, at the time he learned of the matters involved, formed "a slight opinion," but had since forgotten even the statements made to him. Tourtelotte formed and expressed a conditional opinion, which, however, did not concern the real merits of the controversy. Each swore upon his voir dire that he thought he could try the case fairly upon the evidence introduced at the trial, regardless of the opinion previously entertained. The statute does not make the forming, or even the expressing, of an opinion a decisive test as to the juror's competency, unless such opinion be "unqualified * * * as to the merits of the action." Civil Code, § 182. The object of the law in this as in all other respects is to secure fair and impartial trials. Intelligent citizens are sure to hear of cases, both civil and criminal, involving the public interest or welfare; and they are equally certain to base some sort of an opinion upon what they hear. It would be a travesty upon the administration of justice if every intelligent man were thus disqualified from sitting as a juror in such cases. The law fortunately does not involve this absurdity. It takes notice of the fact that intelligence, even when coupled with preconceived impressions, may award more impartial justice than ignorance, too often swayed by impulse or prejudice, and perhaps incapable of logical discrimination. Hence a large discretion, to be carefully exercised for the purpose of insuring equitable results, is lodged with the trial judge in the selection of jurors,—a discretion that must be governed largely by the characteristics of the juror and the special circumstances connected with each particular challenge; and where no positive provision of the statute is disregarded, unless there appears to have been a gross abuse of discretion in determining the question of enmity or bias, courts of review will not interfere. Railroad Co. v. Moynahan, 8 Colo. 56, 5 Pac. Rep. 811.

A writ of attachment was duly issued at the commencement of the action, and levied upon certain property of defendant. Plaintiff's affidavit in attachment was traversed by defendant, and an issue thus made, as permitted by law. This issue was tried by the county court, and judgment was rendered sustaining the attachment. When the cause was afterwards appealed by defendant to the district court, it stood for trial from the beginning de novo. The application to dissolve the attachment upon the traverse of the affidavit might have been first retried, but the record before us is entirely silent upon the subject, and from this silence we must presume that the attempt to dissolve the attachment was not renewed. It was not the duty of the judge to retry this collateral issue, unless requested to do so; and for aught we know he may not have been aware of its existence. By appearing in the district court, and retrying his cause on the merits without insisting upon a disposition of his attachment traverse, appellant must be held to have abandoned the dissolution proceeding. He cannot now be heard to complain because the court below did not formally dispose of the attachment issue. When the present appeal was taken, the act (Sess. Laws 1889, p. 78) authorizing a review of judicial orders subsequent to final judgment was not in force. But, had it been, the objection in this case, predicated upon a subsequent ruling, is not well taken. Attachment proceedings are purely statutory, and must throughout substantially conform to the statutory requirements. As we have already seen, the act prescribes a method for procuring the dissolution of attachments and a return of the property taken. Civil Code, §§ 96, 113. It also provides for the release of personal property attached, and its redelivery to defendant upon the giving of a forthcoming bond. Id. §§ 111, 112. If these remedies be not invoked, there seems to be no legal alternative but for the levy to remain in force, and for the sheriff to retain possession of personal property taken under his writ. We find nothing in the statutes giving an appeal undertaking the force or effect of a forthcoming bond, or permitting such an instrument to otherwise alter the status of attached property. The district judge ruled correctly in denying appellant's petition for a discharge of the attachment, predicated upon the undertaking on appeal from the county court. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

EQUITY—EFFECT OF FEIGNED ISSUE—LOST DEED—EVIDENCE.

1. The verdict of a jury on a feigned issue out of chancery is not binding on the chancellor, and he may disregard it, and decide the cause according to his own judgment.

2. The record title to a homestead, occupied by a mother, was in some of her children. After her death her other children filed a bill against those having the record title, alleging that defendants had conveyed the homestead to the mother during her life; that the deed had never been recorded; and that after her death they had destroyed it. Two of the complainants testified to having seen the deed, but neither of them could give its date, its language, its manner of execution, nor swear definitely as to the description of the land. Defendants denied the execution of the deed, and testified that they had permitted the mother to occupy the premises from filial affection. No declarations by the mother indicating that she ever claimed to be the owner were shown, nor was any reason given why the deed, if in existence, was not recorded during her life-time. Held, that a finding by the chancellor against the execution and existence of the deed would not be disturbed, as the rule is that the proof as to execution of a lost conveyance and its contents must be clear before the record title of the alleged grantors will be divested.

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Arapahoe county.

RICHMOND, C. This action was brought on a complaint in the nature of a bill in equity to restore a lost deed. Plaintiffs in error and complainants below allege that they are the heirs at law of one Mary A. Thompson, and interested as heirs at law in the estate of said Mary A. Thompson, who died intestate. That Emma G. Speed, daughter of said Thompson, did by her deed of conveyance transfer all her interest in the real estate of said Thompson to said Sarah E. McDonald. That on the 18th day of February, 1875, Salathiel Thompson, father of the plaintiffs and defendants, except William C. Clows, executed and delivered to the defendants a mortgage on the north one-half of the undivided one-half of the center one-third of lot No. 11 in block No. 2 in the west division of the city of Denver, to secure the payment of his promissory note. Said note being unpaid, defendants filed a bill in chancery in the county court of Arapahoe county to foreclose said mortgage. That on the 21st day of March, A. D. 1876, a decree was entered of record in said cause in said court against Salathiel Thompson for the sum of $1,508.08 and costs, and for the sale of the said property. That the special master in chancery made sale of said property on the 4th day of May for the sum of $1,545.80 to the defendants, and by his deed of the 7th of February, 1877, the master conveyed to defendants the said premises. That some time after the date of the master's deed, about the latter part of the year 1879, the defendants conveyed for a valuable consideration the property above described to Mary Ann Thompson, and delivered the deed of conveyance to her, but that she failed to record the same. That said Mary Ann Thompson remained in possession of the premises for two years after date of deed, continuing to collect the rents up to the time of her death, December 7, 1885. That at the time of her death she had possession of the property and of the deed of conveyance, and that said deed was deposited with Mary C. Cullen for safe-keeping, and has been, with other valuable papers, abstracted and carried away without her knowledge and consent, and is either lost or destroyed. That after the abstraction of said deed the defendants pretended to be the owners of said premises in fee, and are and have been exercising acts of ownership over the same, and refuse to supply said lost deed, and thereby establish title to said premises in the estate of said Mary Ann Thompson. To the complaint defendants answer, denying that they ever made a deed of conveyance, or ever in any manner conveyed the property described in the complaint, or any part thereof, to said Mary Ann Thompson; or that at the time of her death, or at any time, she ever had any such deed of conveyance; or that such deed was ever deposited with Mary C. Cullen, or any other person; or that said deed has been abstracted, carried away, or destroyed. They admit that said Mary Ann Thompson, with her husband, Salathiel Thompson, resided in and upon the premises mentioned in the complaint, and enjoyed the use thereof during their lifetime, together with the rents and profits thereof; but aver that this occupation and enjoyment of the rents and profits of the premises was by consent of the defendants in consideration of love and affection which they bore to them as their parents. From the foregoing it will be seen that the issue in the court below was whether or not the defendants had ever executed a deed of conveyance of the premises to Mary Ann Thompson. The cause was tried to the court in the first instance, and, at the time being unable to reach a conclusion, the court directed the trial of the issue to a jury, to whom was submitted the following questions: "First. State whether, on December, 7, 1885, there was in existence a deed conveying in fee all the north one-third of lot No. 11 in block No. 2 in the west division of the city of Denver, in Arapahoe county, Colorado, from William N. Thompson and George A. Thompson to Mary Ann Thompson. Second. If such a deed was in existence, state whether it has been delivered by the grantors to the grantee Mary Ann Thompson." The jury answered both of these questions in the affirmative. The court thereupon, notwithstanding the verdict, entered judgment in favor of the defendants, and dismissed the complaint. To reverse this action of the court this writ of error is prosecuted. The errors assigned are that the court erred in setting aside the verdict and dismissing the complaint; that the finding of the court is contrary to the evidence, and contrary to the law.

Plaintiffs in error urge—First, that the findings of the jury on the issues of fact were binding on the judge; second, that the evidence was sufficient to entitle them to a decree. Upon the first proposition we are inclined to think that the law in this state is well established. In Abbott v. Monti, 3 Colo. 562, it is said: "Whether the chancellor shall direct or refuse an issue rests wholly in his discretion, and we fail to discover any valid reason why it should not so rest. If an issue be directed, the verdict of the jury thereon is not binding upon the chancellor's conscience. He is not only at liberty to disregard it, but it is his duty to decide the cause according to the dictates of his own judgment, and the convictions of his own conscience. In an action at law, the verdict of the jury is of higher and more solemn import. It is the foundation upon which the judgment of the court must rest. In a suit in equity, the verdict is not necessarily the foundation of the decree. It is merely incidental, and may be, and, if the chancellor's conscience is not satisfied with it, must be, wholly unheeded." The same doctrine is laid down in McGan v. O'Neil, 5 Colo. 58; Hall v. Linn, 8 Colo. 264, 5 Pac. Rep. 641; Kirtley v. Mining Co., 8 Colo. 279, 6 Pac. Rep. 920; Tabor v. Sullivan, 12 Colo. 136, 20 Pac. Rep. 437.

Accepting, then, the doctrine in this state to be that the verdict of the jury in such a case is not binding upon the chancellor, the sole question remaining for consideration is: "Was the evidence sufficient to warrant a decree as prayed for by the complainants, or was it insufficient, and the court therefore warranted in dismissing the complaint, and rendering judgment accordingly, notwithstanding the findings of the jury?" We think it may be said that if the court had accepted the verdict of the jury, and entered judgment in accordance with such verdict, we should not have disturbed such judgment; but it does not follow from this that the judgment as rendered ought to be disturbed.

There is some conflict in the testimony of the witnesses on behalf of the plaintiffs and defendants. The two defendants positively swear that they never executed the deed to the property, as claimed by the plaintiffs; and, in opposition to this positive assertion of the two defendants, the testimony on the part of the plaintiffs' witnesses is not very definite and certain. The testimony of Mary C. Cullen is to the effect that she received several deeds, with other papers, from her sister, Mrs. Speed, and was told that they pertained to the estate of Mary Ann Thompson. She never examined the deeds, or compared them with the numbers of the lots; did not know what lots they had reference to, and did not know even the number of the home place, but that she noticed that the deeds were signed by William and George,—recognized the handwriting. In her cross-examination she says: "I saw the deed from defendants to mother among the papers left in my charge by Mrs. Speed. Can't remember how many deeds there were. Know they were deeds with brothers' names to them, because I recognized the handwriting. Do not remember the notary; but know it was a deed by the shape it was in. Do not remember if the face of the deed was blank, like Exhibit A. All I do remember is their names inside, both together,—down here somewhere." Mrs. Speed claims that she saw the deed purporting to convey this property to her mother. She does not give the language of the deed, or its date, or its manner of execution, but in an indefinite way testifies positively that she saw the deed to this property. Her testimony, however, was by deposition, and that of the other witnesses was before the court. There is no reason given why this deed, if in existence, was not placed upon the record in the life-time of Salathiel Thompson or Mary Ann Thompson. There is no conversation detailed by any of the witnesses on the part of the plaintiffs which indicates that Mary Ann Thompson ever claimed the property as her individual property. The occupation and possession of the property with the enjoyment of the rents during the life-time of the father and mother are certainly consistent with the declarations of the defendants in their answer and in their testimony. The rule as laid down in such cases is that "a title to land duly authenticated by written evidence ought not to be set aside on the assumption of a previous lost conveyance, except upon clear proof by the claimant of the execution and existence of the supposed deed, and so much of its contents as will enable the court to determine the character of the instrument." Metcalf v. Van Benthuyzen, 8 N. Y. 424; Edwards v. Noyes, 65 N. Y. 125. Under this rule we can readily see how the chancellor trying the cause, having before him the witnesses and the depositions, and twice having heard all the testimony, could readily say that the existence of the alleged lost instrument, notwithstanding the finding of the jury, was not sufficiently established by the testimony. The defendants' testimony, excepting so far as it conflicts with that of Mrs. Speed and Mrs. Cullen, stands entirely unimpeached. They positively swear that they never executed the instrument, and never intended in any manner or form to part with the title; and, in reality, there seems to have been no necessity for their doing so, inasmuch as they, in consideration of the relation of parents and sons, permitted the father and mother to enjoy during their life-time the possession and rents and profits of the property. This, coupled with the failure to record the deed, and the inability of any of the witnesses who are interested in establishing the existence of the deed to satisfactorily prove that they had ever examined the deed to ascertain whether or not it contained an accurate description of the premises, and the additional failure of Mrs. Cullen to deliver the deed of the property to the administrator, and the fact that there were several deeds in existence pertaining to the estate, and one in particular relative to mining property in Boulder county, which had been executed by one of the defendants, renders it a matter of extreme doubt as to whether any such deed as is described in the complaint was ever in existence, and, in our judgment, was sufficient to create in the mind of the chancellor a well-founded belief that such a deed had never been executed and delivered. Accepting the doctrine that the chancellor must act upon the convictions of his own judgment and conscience, and that it is his province ultimately in cases of this kind to find the facts, pass upon the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses, we feel convinced that this court would not be warranted in disturbing the action of the court below. The judgment should be affirmed.

REED and BISSELL, CC., concur.

COBY V. HALTHUSEN.

APPEAL FROM COUNTY COURT—WAIVER OF NOTICE.

The presence of appellee's counsel in the district court at the first term after a case has been appealed thereto from the county court, when he objected to proceeding to trial, and procured a continuance for two terms, during all of which time his name appeared on the docket as attorney in the cause, without objection, constitutes an appearance in the district court, and is a waiver of all objections to appellant's failure to give written notice of the appeal within five days after it was perfected, as required by Sess. Laws Colo. 1885, p. 159, and such waiver will be recognized, though the appearance is shown by extrinsic evidence, and does not affirmatively appear on the record.

Error to district court, El Paso county.
T. A. McMorris, for plaintiff in error.

J. L. Williams and A. E. Pattison, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. The present writ of error is prosecuted for the purpose of reversing the action of the court below dismissing an appeal thereto from the county court. The appeal in question was not taken during the day on which the judgment was rendered, nor was a notice in writing served upon appellant's attorney of record within five days after the appeal was perfected. The action of the district court in dismissing the same was had in pursuance of the statute. Section 4, p. 159, Sess. Laws 1885. The statutory right in question is a personal privilege, which may be waived by appellee. Robertson v. O'Reilly, 14 Colo. 441, 24 Pac. Rep. 560. But, unless such waiver in some way took place, the judgment of the district court should be sustained. The record proper before us does not recite all the orders and proceedings of the trial court after the taking of the appeal, and prior to the motion to dismiss. We find nothing in the portion presented decisive upon the question of waiver. The bill of exceptions, however, contains affidavits by each of the two opposing counsel. The affidavit of counsel for appellant recites certain facts relied upon by him as showing an abandonment of the right to dismiss the appeal. Among the matters thus recited are a number tending to establish a general appearance in the court below by counsel for appellee, and participation in proceedings connected with the cause, before interposing his motion to dismiss. The counter-affidavit of appellee's counsel contains no positive denial, specific or general, of these matters. It simply states that his first appearance in the district court was when he filed his motion to dismiss the appeal. This is merely counsel's legal opinion as to what constituted an appearance,—the very question the court was to consider and determine upon the proofs. For the purposes of the present review, we must therefore assume that the specific matters in question stated by appellant's counsel are true. Acting upon the foregoing assumption, we find that at the first term of court subsequent to the taking of the appeal counsel for appellee was present, and objected to proceeding to trial, on the ground that it was not the custom of the court to try causes at the term at which they had been docketed; also that thereupon, in deference to counsel's further declaration that he did not want to try the cause at that term, it was continued; that at the second term subsequent to the appeal, when the cause was called, counsel for appellee stated to the court that it would be for trial in its order when reached, but, since no civil actions were reached for trial, it went over that term. Again, that at the third term, and prior to interposing his motion to dismiss, counsel for appellee stated to the court, when interrogated with reference to setting the cause for trial, that it would not require a jury, and by consent of counsel for appellant it was thereupon left to be tried by the court before its adjournment. We also find that during all this time the name of counsel for appellee stood upon the judge's docket as attorney in the cause without objection. The foregoing admitted facts unquestionably establish such an appearance in the court below as constituted a waiver of the right to insist upon a motion to dismiss, under the statute. It would no doubt be more regular and satisfactory if matters relied upon as showing a general appearance were in some way evidenced by the record proper or files of the cause; but we cannot say that the absence of such authentication should in all cases be held decisive of the question. Some of the facts above stated, touching the conduct of counsel for appellee in open court before interposing his motion, and others that might be mentioned, are of such a nature that they would not necessarily appear upon the judge's docket, the clerk's record, or the files. The judge himself cannot be expected always to remember the conduct relied on as constituting a waiver. And this is especially true where, as in the present case, the participation of counsel for appellee extends through different terms of court. If, therefore, it is clearly shown by extrinsic proofs that an unqualified appearance in open court was made and action taken or participated in, or rules or orders submitted to by counsel for appellee without interposing his motion to dismiss, we think the waivers should be recognized, though the fact of the appearance, participation, or submission does not affirmatively appear of record. In the present case, counsel's laches in failing to interpose his motion, until towards the close of the third term of court after the appeal was taken, is an important additional consideration. Such motions as the one in question must be presented at the earliest reasonable opportunity. Counsel does not deny that he knew of the appeal, and also knew that his name appeared for appellee upon the docket, and he gives no valid excuse for not sooner submitting his application to dismiss. The judgment of the district court is reversed.

RIGHTS OF MINORS—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT—NE EXEAT.

1. Courts should, so far as possible, in cases before them, protect the rights of minors, although such rights may be but imperfectly claimed.

2. The jurisdiction of the county courts of this state in matters of probate, settlements of estates, appointment of guardians, and settlement of their accounts, is not made exclusive by the constitution.

3. Under section 1604, Gen. St., authorizing the district courts of the state to remove guardians upon the complaint of any person in behalf of the minor, and to make all orders necessary in the premises to compel the guardian to account, etc., the writ of ne exeat may be issued, if necessary, to protect the rights of such minor.

4. It appearing that the sole surety upon the bond of the guardian had become insolvent; that the guardian had squandered, misappropriated, and embezzled the trust-estate; that he had failed to comply with the statute requiring him to file a report; and that he is about to depart from the state for the purpose of cheating and defrauding his ward,—a proper case for the issuance of the writ of ne exeat is presented.

Application for habeas corpus.

The petitioners, Hercules S. Porteus and Denyse Rose Porteus, were required by order of the district court of Arapahoe county to furnish bail upon a writ of ne exeat republica, and, upon failing so to do, were placed in custody of the sheriff of Arapahoe county. For the purpose of testing the legality of the imprisonment, they now apply to this court to be discharged upon habeas corpus. There are two separate applications. The causes, however, were consolidated for the purposes of argument and determination. The admitted facts, so far as the same are necessary to a proper understanding of the present controversy, may be briefly stated as follows: On the 12th day of the present month of February, Clara E. Bostwick, a minor of the age of 11 years, by her next friend, filed a complaint in the district court of Arapahoe county against Hercules S. Porteus and Denyse Rose Porteus, defendants. In this pleading it is alleged, inter alia, that the mother of said minor departed this life in Denver, Colo., on the 24th day of July, A. D. 1885, intestate, leaving as her sole heirs at law the plaintiff and the defendant Hercules S. Porteus, her step-father; that in the month of October, 1886, said defendant was by the county court of Arapahoe county, Colo., duly appointed guardian both of the estate and person of the plaintiff, and that letters of guardianship were accordingly to him issued, and the bond of such guardian fixed at the sum of $60,000. It is also alleged that the court accepted as the sole surety upon such bond one William Porteus, who was then well worth the amount of the penalty named therein, but that he has since become, and is now, insolvent. It is further alleged that by order of said district court certain lands of which the intestate died seised had been sold by the said guardian some time in the year 1886; and the proceeds thereof, to the amount of about $13,000, belonging to the plaintiff, the defendant Hercules S. Porteus had appropriated to his own use. And plaintiff further charges the fact to be that said Hercules S. Porteus has squandered, embezzled, and misappropriated the said sum of $13,000, the property of plaintiff, derived from the sale of the real estate as hereinbefore set forth, and that he has never at any time made any report to any court whatever of the state of Colorado of his acts and doings as such guardian, although required by the laws of this state to make such a report at least once in each year. Plaintiff further shows that the defendant Denyse Rose Porteus, the present wife of Hercules S. Porteus, has received from him, and has now in her possession and under her control, personal property of the plaintiff's, from the estate of the said Margaret L. Porteus, of the value of $5,000. The insolvency of the defendants is shown, and plaintiff charges that the said defendants, being so indebted to the said Clara E. Bostwick, are about to depart from the state of Colorado, and from the jurisdiction of the court, and take up their permanent residence in the kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, taking with them out of the jurisdiction of this court the moneys and property of the plaintiff. It is also alleged that the defendants, in departing from the state of Colorado, do so for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the plaintiff out of her inheritance. The prayer of the complaint is for the issuance of a writ of ne exeat republica, directed to the defendants, detaining them, and each of them, within the jurisdiction of the court until such time as they shall give bond, with sureties to be approved by the court, and for general relief. Upon this complaint a summons and writ of ne exeat were issued in the usual form, the bail upon the writ being fixed at $13,000. The defendants, failing and refusing to give bail, were detained by the sheriff of Arapahoe county, from whose custody they seek to be discharged upon the present application.

T. B. Stuart and C. P. Butler, for petitioners. Sullivan & May, for respondent.

HAYT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) Plaintiff's case, as made by the bill filed in the court below, presented a strong appeal for the exercise in her behalf of the chancery power of that tribunal to its utmost limit. The case of an orphan child of tender years seeking the aid of the court to preserve to her the estate descending from her deceased parent is certainly one in which a chancellor should be diligent in endeavoring to extend all relief proper in the premises. The settled policy of the law requires this to be done even in cases in which the guardian or prochein ami does not properly claim such rights. Hutchinson v. McLaughlin, 16 Colo. —, 25 Pac. Rep. 317. Petitioners, upon this application to be discharged upon habeas corpus, contend, however, that the district court was without jurisdiction to issue the writ of ne exeat republica for the following reasons: First, as the acts of which complaint is made relate to the settlement of an estate, it is claimed that the county court had exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine the same; second, because of the constitutional inhibition against imprisonment for debt; third, because the writ of ne exeat, it is said, cannot be issued in any case before final judgment. It must, of course, be admitted that the matters of which complaint was made in the district court arose out of the settlement of the estate of the deceased parent; but counsel are in error in assuming that the county court has exclusive jurisdiction of all such matters. Section 23, art. 6, of the state constitution does not so provide. It reads as follows: "County courts shall be courts of record, and shall have original jurisdiction in all matters of probate, settlement of estates, appointment of guardians, * * * and settlement of their accounts. * * *" It is not provided, however, that such jurisdiction shall be exclusive. Had this been intended, we have no doubt language would have been employed that would have placed the matter beyond controversy.

Crain v. Barnes, 1 Md. Ch. 151; Darling v. McDonald, 101 Ill. 370. So far as legislative construction bears upon the question, it may be said that the legislature has never treated this provision as conferring exclusive jurisdiction upon the county courts; for, while it has enacted a very complete system of procedure to be followed in the administration of estates, appointment of guardians, and settlement of their accounts, etc., and has generally provided that such matters shall be adjudicated in the county court, many exceptions to such general rule are made by statutes expressly conferring jurisdiction upon the district courts. See Gen. St. §§ 484, 1594, 1604. In the case at bar the guardian came into possession of the trust fund as the result of the sale of the lands of the ward made by order of the district court; and it would be strange indeed if the power of the district court in the premises was exhausted in making the order of sale. By section 20 of the chapter of the statutes entitled "Guardian and Ward," it is expressly provided that guardians appointed under the provisions thereof shall be subject to removal by the district court of the proper county upon the complaint of any person on behalf of the minor. See Gen. St. § 1604. The guardian in this case was most certainly appointed under the provisions of said chapter. By the sections referred to, the district court is given ample power not only to remove him, but to appoint another in his stead, and to make all such orders in the premises as may be necessary. This section disposes of the claim of exclusive jurisdiction in the county court, and, as it does not appear to be obnoxious to any constitutional objection, it must control here.

This brings us to the objection based upon the constitutional provision in reference to imprisonment for debt. The section reads as follows: "That no person shall be imprisoned for debt, unless upon the refusal to deliver up his estate for the benefit of his creditors in such manner as shall be prescribed by law, or in cases of tort, or where there is a strong presumption of fraud." Article 2, § 12, Const. The facts stated in plaintiff's complaint, upon which the ne exeat proceedings are based, certainly show a strong presumption of fraud on the part of both respondents; thus bringing the case within the exceptions expressly made by the constitution. Aside from this, by the weight of authority, although a contrary doctrine has been announced in Illinois, and perhaps some other states, an arrest and detention upon a writ of ne exeat to prevent a person from going out of the state until he shall give security for his appearance is held not to constitute imprisonment for debt, within the meaning of the constitutional inhibition. Dean v. Smith, 23 Wis. 483; Brown v. Haff, 5 Paige, 235; McNamara v. Dwyer, 7 Paige, 239; Fuller v. Emeric, 2 Sandf. 626; Bushnell v. Bushnell, 15 Barb. 399; Malcom v. Andrews, 68 Ill. 100.

The objection founded upon the fact that the writ in this case was issued before final judgment is not well taken. The writ of ne exeat regno, from which authority for our present writ is derived, was at first only applied to great political objects and purposes of state, and no doubt had its origin in the fact that every male subject was bound to defend the king and his realm, and therefore the king might at his pleasure command him to stay within the realm; and although, at a later date, it was resorted to in cases where purely private rights were involved, it has been said by English chancellors that it should be applied to such cases with great caution and jealousy. In this country, however, it seems to have been regarded from the first as writ of right in those cases in which it is properly grantable; and, wherever used, it has always been regarded as a mesne, rather than a final, process. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. pp. 716, 717; Adams v. Whitcomb, 46 Vt. 708; Myer v. Myer, 25 N. J. Eq. 28. While, in general, the writ lies only upon equitable demands and claims, there are some exceptions to the general rule, as in actions for an accounting or for alimony; and with us these matters are also regarded as of equitable cognizance. Porter v. Spencer, 2 Johns. Ch. 169, is authority for the use of the writ when an action at law was pending for a balance of an account in which the defendant has been held to bail, the plaintiff in his bill in chancery alleging these facts, and also that in the action at law the defendant had pleaded the general issue for delay merely, and that he and his bail were both preparing to leave the state, neither leaving any property behind; and Chancellor KENT, upon allowing the writ of ne exeat, said, among other things: "In the present case, I have some doubts whether the bill states a matter of account on which the jurisdiction of the court can attach. To sustain a bill for an account, there must be mutual demands, and not merely payments by way of set-off. A single matter cannot be the subject of an account. There must be a series of transactions on one side, and of payments on the other. I place my interference on the necessity of the case. From the facts charged and sworn to, it appears to me that the remedy in the suit pending at law would be absolutely defeated without the interposition of the court. The books assume and admit principles that will justify the allowance of the writ under the peculiar circumstances of the present case. The remedy sought is indispensable to prevent a failure of justice; and this creates a marked difference between this and the ordinary cases. I should think it would reflect discredit on the administration of justice if the plaintiff could find no relief from the impending mischief arising from a failure of the remedy at law by the immediate removal of the defendant and his bail." The case of McNamara v. Dwyer, supra, is authority for requiring a foreign administrator to give equitable bail upon a writ of ne exeat issued in a suit pending against him in chancery, brought to compel him to account for the trust funds which he had received abroad, and brought with him into the state of New York. In Samuel v. Wiley, 50 N. H. 353, it was held that independent of statute, and as an incident to the power of enforcing the orders and decrees of the supreme court, any justice thereof was empowered to issue an order, in the nature of a writ of ne exeat, upon evidence satisfactory to him of a party's intention to leave the state. In the case at bar, unless the authority of the district court in issuing the writ can be sustained, the infant plaintiff will be practically remediless. If the facts stated in her complaint are true,—and for the purposes of these applications they must be so taken,—of what benefit to her would the ordinary citation, requiring the respondents to appear and show cause, etc., at a future day, be? Before the return-day the defendants might be without the jurisdiction of the court, and well on the way to Great Britain. As said by Chancellor KENT in Porter v. Spencer, supra: "It would reflect discredit on the administration of justice if the plaintiff could find no relief from the impending mischief." In the opinion of this court the district court, with its enlarged jurisdiction, had ample power in carrying out the provisions of section 1604 to issue the writ of ne exeat upon which respondents are held.

In answer to the argument of counsel based upon alleged defects in the prayer of the complaint filed in that court, we are of the opinion that all proper relief may be afforded under the prayer for general relief contained in the petition. In addition to this, it should be remembered that the complaint may be amended in this as in other causes; and under our practice the writ of habeas corpus cannot be substituted for a writ of error. Bassett v. Bratton, 86 Ill. 162; Ex parte Brandon, 49 Ark. 143, 4 S. W. Rep. 452; Ex parte Parks, 93 U. S. 18. The demurrers to the separate returns of the sheriff will be overruled, the writ of habeas corpus discharged, and the prisoners remanded.

MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY—ANCIENT ORDER OF UNITED WORKMEN—CERTIFICATES—VESTED RIGHTS.

1. The society known as the "Ancient Order of United Workmen," so far as it is engaged in the business of life insurance, must be treated in law as a mutual life insurance company.

2. The certificate of insurance is to be regarded as a written contract, and, so far as it goes, it is the measure of the rights of all parties.

3. It is the policy of the law to favor vested, rather than contingent, estates.

4. A policy of life insurance is in the nature of a testament, and, although not a testament, in construing it the courts will so far as possible treat it as a will.

5. Under a certificate providing that upon the death of a member the insurance shall be paid to his wife, and in case of her death to his children, the right to the fund vests in the surviving wife immediately upon the death of the husband, and upon her death the fund passes to the administrators as a part of her estate.

ELLIOTT, J., dissenting.

Appeal from district court, Boulder county.

It appears from the record in this case that in September, 1886, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, a secret society organized and established for the purpose, among other things, of insuring the lives of its members, issued to one Sterling D. Rouse, a member of the order, a certificate of insurance in the following words and figures, omitting the formal parts, to-wit: "This certificate, issued by the authority of the Supreme Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, witnesseth, that Brother Sterling D. Rouse, a master workman degree member of Centennial State Lodge, No. 8 of said order, located at Boulder, in the state of Colorado, is entitled to all the rights and privileges of membership in the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and to participation in the beneficiary fund of the order to the amount of two thousand dollars, which sum shall at his death be paid to his wife, Ella A. Rouse, and, in case of her death, to Mary E., Clara D., and Anna L. Rouse, children. This certificate is issued upon the express condition that said Sterling D. Rouse shall in every particular, while a member of said order, comply with all the laws, rules, and requirements thereof." On December 30, 1886, said Sterling D. Rouse died, leaving his said wife and children him surviving. In less than one month thereafter, January 28, 1887, and before any portion of the insurance money had been paid to the wife, she also died. Appellee, Brace, having been appointed administrator of said Ella A. Rouse, commenced this suit in the county court against the Order of United Workmen, to recover the insurance, as part of said Ella's estate. The children named in the certificate also claimed the benefit of the insurance. The defendant appeared, and requested to be permitted to deposit said sum of $2,000, "subject to the order of the court, according to the very right of the case;" and it was accordingly so ordered, and the defendant was dismissed as a party. Mary E. Chartrand, formerly Mary E. Rouse, Clara D. Rouse, and Anna L. Rouse, minors, (said last two appearing by John H. Nicholson, their guardian,) were substituted as parties to the action in place of defendant, for the purpose of enabling them to assert in this action their claim to the insurance money. Judgment having been rendered in the county court, the action was appealed to the district court, where an amended answer was filed in behalf of said children and their guardian, claiming the insurance money. The amended answer shows, inter alia, that the children named in the certificate of insurance are the children of said Sterling D. Rouse by his first wife, who died many years before; that they were his only children, and with his said wife, Ella, were the only members of his family dependent upon him for support; that his said wife, Ella, was, and had been for years, an invalid, and left no surviving children. The amended answer further shows: "That said Grand Lodge of the A. O. U. W. is a voluntary beneficiary association, not incorporated; that its constitution and laws in force at the time said Sterling D. Rouse became a member, and when he died, provided, among other things, that the beneficiary or beneficiaries named in the certificates issued to members should be confined to one or more of the family of the members, or some person or persons related to him by blood, or who shall be dependent upon him; that the amount of the beneficiary certificate upon the death of its members shall be collected by assessments upon its members, the assessment to be made upon the first day of the next month after receiving notice from the recorder of the lodge of which the deceased was a member, and payment by the members is voluntary, and cannot be enforced, except by suspension of the members; that notice of the death of said Sterling D. Rouse was received by the grand recorder of the said Grand Lodge of the A. O. U. W., January 11, 1887; that the assessment to pay the beneficiaries named in his certificate was not in fact made until and on March 1, 1887, and the money to pay the same was not collected and in the treasury of said grand lodge, and proper officers ready to draw warrant and pay the same, until the 27th day of March, 1887." Upon motion of the administrator, the district court rendered judgment upon the pleadings in his favor, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

Chas. M. Campbell and James M. North, for appellants. O. F. A. Green, for appellee.

HAYT, J. (after stating the facts as above.) The amended answer admits, by failing to deny, the facts as stated in the complaint, and, for the purposes of this appeal, the new matter set up in this answer must also be taken as true. Upon these facts, the position of appellee is that upon the death of the insured the right to the fund vested absolutely in the wife, Ella A. Rouse, and that upon her death the right to the uncollected fund passed as part of her estate to her administrator, to be by him disposed of as other assets of the estate. The contention of appellant is that, as the fund had not been paid over or collected at the time of the death of the wife, the right thereto became vested in the children, under the terms of the policy. The certificate is, in legal contemplation, a policy of life insurance, and to be construed as such. That the amount can only be collected by assessment upon members of the association, after due notice of death, and the payment of such assessment is purely voluntary, can make no difference. The association, so far as it is engaged in the business of life insurance, must be treated in law as a mutual life insurance company. The certificate is to be regarded as a written contract, and, so far as it goes, it is the measure of the rights of all parties. Bolton v. Bolton, 73 Me. 299; Com. v. Wetherbee, 105 Mass. 149; State v. Association, 18 Neb. 281, 25 N. W. Rep. 81; Wiggin v. Knights of Pythias, 31 Fed. Rep. 122; Knights of Honor v. Nairn, 60 Mich. 44, 26 N. W. Rep. 826; Insurance Co. v. Horner, 14 Colo. 391, 23 Pac. Rep. 788.

Turning to the policy executed in this case, we find the disposing clause to be couched in the following language: "Which sum shall, at his death, be paid to his wife, Ella A. Rouse, and, in case of her death, to Mary E., Clara D., and Anna L. Rouse, children." It would be difficult to find language to more clearly and definitely fix the time at which the right to this money vested in Ella A. Rouse than the words "at his death." It is claimed, however, that the words following, "in case of her death, to Mary E., Clara D., and Anna L. Rouse, children," qualify the words immediately preceding, and that, when construed together, they give to the children a right to the fund so long as the same is capable of practical identification and control, and has not been otherwise appropriated by the wife, although the wife in fact survives the husband. But the plain intent of the language of the policy is against such construction. The words, "which sum shall at his death," fix the time at which the right to the fund is to be determined, and the words following provide for the payment to the children in case the wife shall not be living at that time. The children were only to receive the money upon the happening of certain contingencies. The risk taken by the association was upon the life of the assured. By his death the policy became fixed, and the right to the fund vested. The wife having survived the husband, her right became absolute by the express terms of the policy. This construction finds support not alone in the language of the contract, but is also in accordance with the settled policy of the law, which is to favor vested, rather than contingent, estates; the first, rather than the second, taker. King v. Trick, (Pa.) 19 Atl. Rep. 951; Smith's Appeal, 23 Pa. St. 9; Womrath v. McCormick, 51 Pa. St. 504; Felton v. Sawyer, 41 N. H. 202; 2 Redf. Wills, *253; Association v. Montgomery, 70 Mich. 587, 38 N. W. Rep. 588.

A policy of life insurance is in the nature of a testament, and, although not a testament, in construing it the courts will so far as possible treat it as a will. Bolton v. Bolton, supra. In King v. Trick, supra, an absolute devise was made by a father to his son, followed by a proviso to the effect that, in case the devisee should die without children, grandchildren, or wife, living, the estate should go over. The words "die without children," etc., were held to refer to the death of the son in the life-time of the testator, and the son, having survived the testator, was declared the owner of the fee. The case of Association v. Montgomery, supra, is in some respects quite analogous to the case at bar. It was provided by the certificate issued in that case that the insurance should be paid to the son and daughter of the insured equally, if living, and, if not living, to his heirs; in case of the death of either the son or daughter, the full amount was to be paid to the survivor; and the court held the provision as to survivorship related to the time of the death of the donor. And it appearing that both beneficiaries were living at that time, although one had died before the payment of the benefit, his executor was entitled to the share, and not the survivor. In the course of the opinion the court said: "The scheme of the corporation is to raise a fund which shall pass to designated beneficiaries at the death of a member. The right, which before was inchoate and contingent, becomes upon the death of the member fixed and certain in the beneficiary. * * * The time of payment provided for, namely, 90 days after the death of the member, has no reference to who shall take as survivor." So, in the case at bar, we are of the opinion that, by the express terms of the policy, the right to the fund became vested in Ella A. Rouse upon the death of her husband. Consequently, upon her death, the fund should pass to the administrator as a part of her estate. There is nothing in the constitution or by-laws of the association, as pleaded, to change this result. Whatever rights, if any, may have been reserved to the society by these instruments, have been waived by it, and the fund deposited subject to the order of the court. While we feel that our conclusion as to the party entitled to the fund must necessarily follow as a matter of law, in answer to the argument of counsel based upon the duty of the deceased father to provide for his children, it may be said that it was equally his duty to provide for his invalid wife. She was the person having the strongest claim upon his estate and bounty. If the construction contended for by counsel be adopted, the wife could not use the fund, no matter to what extremity she may have been driven in the final sickness intervening between the death of her natural and legal protector and her own death. She could not, by anticipating the payment of the legacy, surround herself with the things that might have been absolutely necessary to sustain her life from day to day. In addition to this, it would place the beneficiary primarily entitled to the fund to a great extent within the power of the insurer. For instance, by withholding payment, the beneficiary would be compelled to bring suit for the money, the ultimate decision of which might be delayed for years; and if, during the time, the wife should die, others would receive the reward of her endeavors without sharing the expense. Under such circumstances, it is easily to be seen that the insurance corporation or association could compel the wife in many instances to accept less than the face of the policy, rather than institute a suit, no matter how clear her right of recovery might be. We think the judgment of the district court is right, and it is accordingly affirmed. The former opinion of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice ELLIOTT, is withdrawn.

ELLIOTT, J., (dissenting.) I cannot concur in the foregoing opinion. In the original investigation of this case the various questions involved in the record were carefully considered. By the reargument nothing essentially new has been presented. Hence I now feel constrained to refile the former unanimous opinion of this court as an expression of the reasons for my present dissent. The part relating to the construction of the certificate was as follows: "While the certificate is to be construed as a contract, nevertheless, it being in the nature of a policy of insurance,—a post mortem provision for the benefit of those dependent upon the assured for support,—it is, like the provisions of a will, to be liberally construed in favor of those who may naturally be presumed to have been the objects of their father's bounty. In order to correctly understand and give effect to the contract over which this controversy has arisen, certain rules for the interpretation and construction of written instruments will be noticed. Primarily to be considered is the intention of the husband and father in effecting the insurance, and this is to be ascertained from the language of the certificate itself, construing its words according to their common and reasonable signification, so as to give effect to the entire instrument as far as practicable; secondly, the language of the instrument is to be construed in the light of extrinsic circumstances attending its execution, considering the situation and relations in life of the several parties therein mentioned, and the objects and interests to be thereby secured. We are not unmindful of the rule which excludes the proof of contemporaneous oral language to vary the terms of valid written instruments. 2 Bl. Comm. pp. 379-381; 1 Redf. Wills, pp. 421, 663; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 275-277; Mining Co. v. Tierney, 5 Colo. 582; Ballou v. Gile, 50 Wis. 614, 7 N. W. Rep. 561; Clarke v. Boorman, 18 Wall. 502, 503; McDermott v. Association, 24 Mo. App. 73; Walker v. Douglas, 70 Ill. 445; Society v. Fletsam, 97 Ill. 474. What, then, was the intent of the assured in causing to be inserted in the certificate of insurance the provision that the money should, 'at his death be paid to his wife, Ella A. Rouse, and, in case of her death, to Mary E., Clara D., and Anna L. Rouse, children?' It is claimed by counsel for the administrator that by the terms of the certificate the right to the insurance money vested in Ella A. Rouse immediately upon the death of her husband. This claim is based upon the words of the certificate that the money shall 'at his death be paid to his wife, Ella.' But these are not the only words of the instrument relating to that subject. It also contains the words, 'case of her death'; that is, it is further provided that in case of the death of the wife, Ella, the money shall be paid to Mary, Clara, and Anna, children of the assured. In argument, however, counsel have sought to maintain the administrator's claim by construing the certificate—First, as though the children were not named therein as beneficiaries; and, second, as though they were only entitled to the insurance in case the wife should die before the death of the assured. The argument is not well founded. It violates an elementary rule for the construction of contracts, in that it does not give effect to the whole language of the instrument. In the first instance it omits, and in the second adds, important words. The effect of the addition, as well as the omission, is to defeat the clearly expressed intention of the assured. It is true the certificate was framed so that the wife's right vested immediately upon her husband's death, but such right was not indefeasible. On the contrary, it was subject to be divested by her own death. The certificate expressly provides that, in case of the wife's death, the insurance shall be paid to the children; and thus provision was made for the vesting of the children's rights just as surely as for the vesting of her own. This last provision is in no way limited or qualified as to the time of her death; it is direct and unequivocal to the effect that, in case of the wife's death, either before or after the death of the assured, the money shall be paid to the children named in the certificate. The intention is clear that, in the event of the wife's death at any time while the insurance money should be unpaid, so as to be capable of practical identification and control, it should be paid to the children; thus giving them the greatest advantage that could arise from such a contingency, so long as the fund should not be otherwise appropriated by the wife. Thus effect is given to the entire certificate without doing violence to its obvious meaning or to any of its words; and thus a construction is reached in accordance with well-settled legal rules, as well as in harmony with the dictates of reason and humanity. The adjudicated cases cited in behalf of the administrator's claim do not necessarily militate against the foregoing construction. In the case of Richmond v. Johnson, 28 Minn. 447, 10 N. W. Rep. 596, the wife only was named as the beneficiary in the certificate. In the case of Insurance Co. v. Burroughs, 34 Conn. 305, the policy was made payable to the children only in case the wife should die before her husband's death should occur; and in Chapin v. Fellowes, 36 Conn. 132, the policy contained a similar provision. In each of the Connecticut cases the wife died before the husband. In the former case the wife had made an absolute assignment of her interest in the policy for a valuable consideration, but the children nevertheless were allowed to recover against the claim of the assignee. In the latter case the children were protected against the claims of the creditors of the husband. Thus it appears how jealously the rights of beneficiaries of such insurance, even in the second degree, are guarded by the courts. Our attention has not been called to any case where the provisions of the policy or certificate of insurance were identical, or so nearly analogous to the one under consideration as to affect our conclusion. It is always safer to be guided by legal principles, founded on justice and equity, than to attempt to follow case precedents based on facts or circumstances not strictly analogous or controlling. In this connection we quote the language of an eminent author upon the construction of instruments of this character: 'Precedents ought never to be allowed an arbitrary and unbending control of any case not precisely analogous; we might say, not strictly identical. And while all analogies, however remote, must be, and should be, allowed to have their just and proper weight, and the more weight, in proportion to the nearness of the analogy, in determining future cases, we ought never to forget that mere analogies never rise above the character of assistants. We should not, therefore, allow ourselves to become slaves to them.' Again, after adverting to the fact that the English courts follow precedents in matters of this kind more strictly than do the American tribunals, the same author adds: 'But, at the same time, when cases occur, as will always be the fact in regard to the largest proportion, which have to be determined upon their peculiar circumstances, the English courts manifest no reluctance to grapple with the difficulties which present themselves, however formidable or embarrassing, and to place all cases upon their proper basis of truth and justice, without regard to the entire want of precedent to maintain them.' * * * And the same tendency is observable in decisions of the American courts.' 1 Redf. Wills, p. 423. Reading the certificate in the light of the extrinsic circumstances as shown by the amended answer, and considering the condition of the assured and of the different members of his family, and the relations they sustained to each other at the time of effecting the insurance, no one can doubt for a moment that it was the father's intention that the insurance money should be paid to his infant daughters in case his invalid wife should die either before his own death should occur, or before the money should be paid to her. These children were his legitimate heirs, dependent upon him for support, and, next after his wife, the natural objects of his bounty. They were not the children of his wife, Ella, and could not inherit from her; hence we perceive his prudent foresight, as well as fatherly care, in causing their names to be inserted as beneficiaries in the certificate, contingent upon his wife's expected death. If anything further were needed to strengthen the construction we have given this instrument, the objects, purposes, rules, and regulations of the benevolent order from which this certificate of insurance emanated might be considered. But it is scarcely necessary to invoke cumulative authority to confirm the view that it was the father's intention, in case of his wife's death, that the insurance money should go to his doubly orphaned minor children, instead of the administrator of the deceased wife, either for the payment of her debts, or for the benefit of her heirs, who were to him as strangers, having no special claim upon his fortune, his benevolence, or the fruits of his labor." Henry v. Thomas, 118 Ind. 27, 20 N. E. Rep. 519.

In the opinion on the rehearing, the majority of the court place great reliance upon the case of Association v. Montgomery, 70 Mich. 587, 38 N. W. Rep. 588. That case, to use the language of Judge Redfield, quoted in the former opinion, is neither "precisely analogous" nor "strictly identical" with the one now under consideration. In that case the certificate was for $1,500 upon the life of Edward C. Franklin, payable 90 days after satisfactory proof of his death, and the concluding clause was as follows: "The said Union Mutual Association agrees to pay to his son and daughter, N. Lyon and Charlotte A. Franklin, equally,—in case of death of either, full amount to go to the survivor,—one thousand five hundred dollars, if living; if not living, to the heirs of said member." Both beneficiaries were living at the death of the assured. Satisfactory proofs of the death of the assured were made, and both beneficiaries claimed payment of their respective moieties; but before the money was paid one of the beneficiaries died leaving a will by which his interest in the certificate was disposed of. The court held that the words "if living" and "if not living" refer to living at the time of the assured's death; and that the share of each beneficiary vested absolutely at the death of the assured, for the reason that the policy of the Michigan statutes favors vested estates in preference to contingent, unless an intention appears to the contrary, and that the share of the deceased beneficiary could be disposed of by his last will.

It is unnecessary to question the correctness of the Michigan decision in construing the instrument before us. In that case it was necessary to construe the words "if living" and "if not living" with reference to some particular date or event connected with the vesting of the fund specified in the certificate. No such necessity exists in the case before us. The certificate does not contain the words "if living" or "if not living," or other equivalent words; but, as was said in the former opinion, the provision in regard to the children's interest, "is in no way limited or qualified as to the time of the wife's death;" so that, whether the wife be living or not living at the death of the assured, the direct and unequivocal provision of the certificate is that, "in case of her death," the money shall be paid to the children named therein. It does not appear in the record before us that the wife, either by will or otherwise, ever attempted to dispose of the insurance money, or of her interest in the certificate. If she had needed the fund to provide for her necessities while living, and had actually disposed of or hypothecated it for that purpose, as indicated in the present opinion of the majority of the court, and such fact had been properly pleaded, perhaps the claim of the children might have been defeated in whole or in part for that reason. But it is vain to speculate as to matters not set forth in the record.

Much stress is laid upon the rule that the law favors vested estates in preference to contingent, unless an intention appears to the contrary. It will be noticed that the rule thus stated is pregnant with two very important and significant admissions: First, that contingent estates may be created; and, second, that the intention of the parties creating an estate is to be considered in determining its character. Let us test the certificate in the light of this rule. It cannot be denied that a contingent estate is contemplated by its express terms; indeed, a series of contingencies are contemplated. In the first place, the very object of procuring the certificate of insurance was to provide for the family of the assured in the contingency of his own death while they, or some of them, were living. The first contingency was that the insurance money should be paid to his wife. Thus far there is no dispute. It is also undisputed that in a certain contingency the insurance should be paid to his children. What was the latter contingency? It is plainly stated in the certificate to be the contingency of the wife's death,—no more, no less. There are no other words limiting or qualifying the latter contingency. First, then, the husband, anticipating his own death, procures the insurance for his wife's benefit. Second, knowing that his wife, according to the course of nature, must certainly die some time, he provides that, in case of her death, the insurance shall be paid to his children. The wife being an invalid, and presumably older than his minor children, it is reasonable to presume the assured expected them to survive her death. In the light of such facts and circumstances, what intention is conveyed by the terms of the certificate? The entire operative words have been considered. Nothing has been added thereto or subtracted therefrom. Legitimate facts and circumstances only have been taken into consideration in construing the language of the written instrument. The reasonable legal inference to be drawn from such language, under the circumstances, is that the father intended the insurance should go to the invalid wife for her use while living, with remainder to his own children in the contingency of the wife's death whenever it should occur; and so he used the unlimited words, "in case of her death to be paid to the children," inasmuch as they could not inherit from their step-mother. Words might have been inserted in the certificate providing for the payment of the insurance to the children only in the contingency of the wife's death before the death of the assured. If such words had been inserted, they would necessarily have controlled the interpretation of the instrument. But such words were not inserted, and they certainly should not be supplied by implication, when, from all the facts and circumstances legitimate to be considered in construing the instrument, the obvious effect of supplying them, as contended by appellee, would be to defeat, not to effectuate, the intention of the assured.

In the many elaborate briefs and arguments of counsel for the administrator it is nowhere claimed that Sterling D. Rouse could or did have any intention of making provision for strangers to the exclusion of any member of his own dependent family. But the contention is that a certain "formula of words" used in the certificate has been construed by the courts to have a certain and definite signification, and that this court should feel itself bound by such precedents. As heretofore shown, no case has been cited in which the language was "precisely analogous" or "strictly identical" with the certificate under consideration; nor has any case been cited where the circumstances and relation of the parties to be affected by the instrument were either precisely or substantially analogous to those under consideration. It has been before observed, and it can scarcely be made clearer by repetition, that the courts, especially the American courts, will not allow themselves to become slaves to "arbitrary and unbending" precedents, when the effect of such servility is to do manifest injustice. But they will rather "grapple with the difficulties which present themselves, however formidable and embarrassing," in each particular case, and determine the same with reference to its "peculiar circumstances," placing the decision "upon the proper basis of truth and justice, without regard to the entire want of precedent." 1 Redf. Wills, supra. The law is not, and in the nature of things cannot be, an exact science, like mathematics. Long ago able jurists gave up the idea of formulating specific rules adapted to the exigencies of each particular case. At the best, the law is but a rational science, founded on general principles of right and justice. Experience has shown that these principles, when intelligently and conscientiously applied, insure substantial justice in the larger proportion of litigated controversies. In mere matters of procedure, which are but the means to the end, specific rules of comparative uniformity may be formulated, and many precedents may be thereby established, though, even in this branch of the law, much must necessarily be left to sound judicial discretion. But in the great field of jurisprudence, relating to rights of persons and rights of property, arbitrary and unbending precedents have ever been found too narrow for the multitude of vexatious and complicated controversies arising from the varied transactions of an enlightened and progressive people. Precedents are valuable aids to those who can utilize them with intelligent discrimination; but to those who are dependent upon such assistants, precedents are liable to become uncertain and misleading guides.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — SPECIAL LEGISLATION — RAILROAD COMPANIES — REGULATION OF CHARGES.

Const. Colo. art. 15, § 7, provides that no railroad company in existence at the time of the adoption of the constitution shall have the benefit of any future legislation without first filing with the secretary of state an acceptance of the provisions of the constitution. The C. C. R. Co., incorporated in 1865 under a special charter, which provided that the legislature might, after 25 years, prescribe the rates to be charged for transportation, never accepted the provisions of the constitution. Held, that it is not entitled to protection under the constitutional provision against special legislation, and senate bill No. 69, prescribing freight and passenger rates for the road, is constitutional.

The following statement sufficiently explains the question propounded: The Colorado Central Railroad Company was incorporated in 1865 under a special charter, and at once proceeded to the construction and operation of its railroad. One section of the special charter provided that "the legislative assembly * * * may, after the expiration of twenty-five years from the passage of this act, and at the expiration of each period of twenty years thereafter, prescribe rates to be charged and collected by said corporation for transporting passengers and freight over said road and the branches thereof."

The 25 years mentioned having expired, the bill submitted to the court for its opinion was introduced for the purpose of prescribing rates for the carriage of freight and passengers in accordance with the power expressly reserved by the provision mentioned.

PER CURIAM. The court is asked, generally, if the bill referred to in the interrogatory propounded be constitutional. The question is indefinite, in not specifying some particular provision or provisions of the constitution under which the honorable senators doubt the validity of the contemplated legislation. But upon oral argument by counsel, amici curiæ, the following sections of that instrument were alone relied on, viz.: 2 and 3 of article 15, and 25 of article 5. Our answer is accordingly limited. The special legislative charter of the Colorado Central Railroad Company remained in force after the adoption of the constitution; and we are advised that the company has never signified its acceptance of the provisions of the constitution in the manner specified by section 7, art. 15, of that instrument. The proposed legislation is undoubtedly special; but, under the circumstances here presented, we do not think its validity will be affected by the constitutional inhibitions mentioned, two of which deal with this subject. The question propounded is therefore answered in the affirmative.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — RIGHTS OF CREDITORS — ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE.

1. Though, under the Colorado statutes, the surviving husband inherits half of the estate of his wife, he takes it subject to the payment of her debts, and where the estate is insolvent the purchaser of land belonging thereto under an execution against the husband acquires no title as against a creditor of the wife who purchases at the administrator's sale.

2. Where the only personal estate left by a wife is $100 in money, appraisement thereof, as required by the laws of Colorado, is not essential to the validity of proceedings to sell her land for the payment of debts.

3. The purchaser of such land under execution against the husband is not a necessary party to proceedings to sell the land for the payment of the wife's debts.

4. Gen. St. Colo. 1883, § 8577, provides that "whenever, after inventory and appraisement, * * * it shall appear that the personal estate of any decedent is insufficient to discharge his debts, * * * resort may be had to the real estate." Held, that inventory and appraisement are not conditions precedent to the resort to the real estate.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Weld county.

An action in ejectment to recover the undivided one-half of certain property in the town of Greeley. In January, 1879, Henry W. Lee, appellee, recovered a judgment against Edward T. and William A. Nichols in the county court of Weld county for the sum of $93.50. Execution issued, and returned, with indorsement of $18 and some cents, as having been made, and no further property found. The transcript of the judgment was filed in the office of the county clerk, and by proper proceedings the judgment was kept alive and operative, but remained unsatisfied. On the 15th of November, 1883, Sarah A., wife of Edward T. Nichols, died intestate, owning in fee a lot with a dwelling-house upon it in the town of Greeley, which was incumbered by mortgage to the extent of $1,000, drawing interest at 12 per cent. per annum, being a balance of a larger sum formerly obtained on the property. Sarah A. left as heirs her husband, Edward T. Nichols, Lottie Nichols, (appellant,) Edward T. Nichols, Jr., and two married daughters, Laura N. Hill and Sarah M. Gumaer. On the death of Sarah A., appellee, assuming that Edward T., under the statute, became as heir of his wife entitled to one-half of the estate, and that his judgment was a lien upon it, sued out a pluries writ of execution, had it levied upon the undivided one-half of the property in controversy, caused it to be advertised, and at the sale bought it for the sum of $149, and afterwards received a sheriff's deed for the same. On the 26th of March, 1884, Edward T. was appointed administrator of the estate of his deceased wife, qualified, and entered upon the duties of the office. An inventory of the property of the deceased was made and filed by the administrator, stating that there were no personal assets of any kind whatever, except $100 in money. Claims were filed against the estate for debts of deceased, and on the 5th of May, 1884, established by proper proofs, and allowed by the court as follows: To appellant, $2,322.69; to Wilbur H. Hill, $720.04; and to Laura N. Hill, $561.37; all as claims of the fourth class, aggregating $3,604.10. On the 14th of June following the administrator filed a petition duly verified naming the heirs, stating that he had filed an inventory of the estate, which had been approved; that there were no personal assets, except $100; that no appraisement of the personal assets had been made or ordered; stating the aggregate amount of claims proved and allowed to be $3,604.10, the personal assets to be of the value of $100, the deficit $3,504.10; asking that the premises be appraised, and he be ordered to sell at public or private sale so much of the real property as was necessary to pay the deficiency. Writs of summonses were issued, returnable to the term to be held on the first Monday of July, 1884, which were returned unserved. A warrant for the appraisement of the estate was issued and an appraisement had on the 19th of June, in which the personal estate was valued at $100, and the real estate at $1,980 over the incumbrance. On the 19th of June an affidavit was filed with the clerk of the court, and an order prayed that publication of summonses be made as to appellant and the two other non-resident sisters, and copies of summonses be mailed to them at their places of abode, and that an alias summons be sent to the sheriff of Lake county in this state to be served upon Edward T., Jr., all of which writs were served and the acceptance of service indorsed upon each, which writs were properly returned. On the 18th of November following, judgments by default were entered, and a decree of sale of the real estate made. At the sale appellant became the purchaser at the appraised price, and on the 5th of January, 1885, the sale was approved and confirmed by the court, and on the 21st of January a conveyance of the property was made. She entered into the possession, retaining the same, making payments upon and largely reducing the incumbrance, paying taxes, and for necessary repairs, and receiving the rental and income of the property up to the time of the institution of this suit. Upon the trial appellant verified an account, showing that during the time she had been in possession her expenditures, including payment on the principal and interest of the mortgage, exceeded the amount received by her by $643. A cross-complaint was filed in this case by appellant, setting up the proceedings to subject the real estate to sale for the payment of the debts; the insufficiency of the property to discharge the indebtedness; and the title of appellant by the purchase at the sale, etc. The case was tried to the court without a jury, resulting in a judgment for appellee "that he have and recover the undivided one half of the property upon payment of $321.54, being one-half of the excess of money paid by appellant over the amount received by her, and that the costs be equally divided," etc. The cross-complaint was adjudged "wanting in equity and insufficient, except as to the excess of expenditures above rents and profits." A large number of errors were assigned by appellant and cross-errors by the appellee.

J. E. Garrigues and Wells, McNeal & Taylor, for appellants. Haynes, Duuning & Annis, for appellee.

REED, C., (after stating the facts as above.) There is no troublesome conflict of testimony. All important facts are established by undisputed evidence, and seem to have been conceded. There are no charges of fraud or circumvention. The established facts are: First, that at the time of the death of Sarah A. Nichols appellee had a valid existing judgment against the husband, Edward T., and another, amounting to something over $100; second, that Sarah A. died intestate, seised in fee of the property in controversy subject to the incumbrance; third, that the value of the real estate over the incumbrance was $1,980, and the personal assets $100, making the aggregate value $2,080; fourth, that at the time of her death she was indebted in various sums, amounting in the aggregate to $3,604.10, and exceeding the value of the estate $1,524.10; consequently, that the estate was insolvent. These facts having been established or conceded without question, the issues to be determined were not issues of fact, but questions of law applicable to the facts; the theory of appellee being that there was an inheritance; that the husband, under the statute, immediately upon the death of the wife became the heir to one-half of the estate in gross, and that one-half of the estate at once vested in him regardless of the financial condition of the estate as to solvency; and that the inheritance cast at once became available for the satisfaction of the judgment, and took precedence to the exclusion of creditors of the estate. This theory is erroneous, and cannot be maintained. In our view of the case, all supposed errors assigned may be disregarded except the general one that "the court erred in finding that the plaintiff [appellee] was the owner of the undivided half of the premises, and had been since July, 1884, and that defendant [appellant] unlawfully detained the premises, and that the matters in the cross-complaint of defendant are wanting in equity and insufficient to afford relief, except as to the excess of expenditures paid above the rents by her received." We think the entire case can be satisfactorily disposed of by the application of primary and fundamental principles of law to the admitted and established facts.

1. That during the life of the intestate the husband had no interest in the estate in controversy that he could make available for the payment of appellee's judgment, or that appellee could reach under execution. Upon her death, the judgment creditor could only take the distributive share of the estate going to the husband; in other words, the creditor could take no greater interest in the estate than the husband took by inheritance in the estate of the wife upon her death. These propositions are so self-evident and elementary that no authorities are needed in their support.

2. Both in England and in this country, lands held in fee are subject to the debts of the owner while living and after death, and this is the case whether the debt be due upon matter of record, by specialty, or by simple contract; and, if the lands descend to the heir, or go to a devisee, he holds them subject to be taken for the payment of the debts of the ancestor, according to the laws of the state in which they are situated. 1 Washb. Real Prop. (4th Ed.) 87; Watkins v. Holman, 16 Pet. 63; 1 Greenl. Cruise, 60, note.

3. The only title or interest in the estate that could be taken at the sale under execution was the distributive share of the husband in the estate of the wife after the payment of all debts. The regularity and legality of the appointment of the administrator, and the validity of the claims against the estate and the legality of their allowance by the court, having been unquestioned, and no objection made to the valuation of the estate and aggregate value found, and these proceedings being conceded to have been regular, the appellee to that extent is concluded by them. Under our statutes, as at common law, the lands of the intestate descend to the heir subject to the payment of debts, if the personal estate be insufficient; and when there is a deficiency of personal estate neither the heir nor one holding under him by deed or by operation of law can retain the estate as against creditors, except by the payment of the debts. "Heirs, devisees, and distributees are liable to creditors * * * to the full amount of the property received by them, whether real or personal." 2 Woerner, Adm'n, 1265. In Borer v. Chapman, 119 U. S. 587, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 342, it was held that after the settlement and distribution of the estate and discharge of the administrator, a creditor of the estate could proceed in equity in the state of the domicile to which the assets had been removed, and subject such assets in the hands of an heir or devisee to the payment of the debt. The estate being insufficient to pay the debts, it follows that an action could not be maintained by appellee without paying or contributing to their payment to the value of the property claimed. Many questions, technical, and of minor importance, are raised in regard to the proceedings in subjecting the property to the payment of the debts. The first, and one of the most important, is that there was no appraisal of the personal estate. The object of appraisal is to inform the court of the value of personal property as a guide and aid in the adjustment of the affairs. It is not contended that the petition did not contain and set forth the amount and value of the personal property, nor that the inventory was not correct; it showed the only personal property to be $100 in money. The contention is that the proceedings were irregular and illegal because three disinterested persons had not duly appraised the value of $100 in money. The value of that item being known, and it being the only one, there was no personal estate to be appraised. The law does not require unreasonable, unnecessary, nor superfluous acts to be performed. The failure to cause such appraisal under the circumstances cannot avail to vitiate the proceedings. It is urged that the service of summons was defective. We do not so regard it. The proceedings appear to have been regular; service was acknowledged by all to whom the writs were directed, and they were properly before the court. If they had not been, it was a defense that could only be interposed by the parties, or some of them; it was personal to them, and could not avail appellee.

It is also contended that the proceedings were faulty in not making appellee a party. Whatever title or supposed title appellee had was not by virtue of descent cast, but was derivative. As already shown, if he had any interest, it was that coming through the heir. The proceedings were to settle the estate. Appellee was neither heir nor creditor, and was not an indispensable party. If he had wished to intervene, he could have done so. His failure to do so should not prejudice the result. It follows that the general assignment of error should be sustained. The finding and judgment were erroneous—First, in finding the title in appellee, and that appellant unlawfully detained the premises; second, in finding that the averments in the cross-complaint were insufficient. The title of appellant was shown to be that acquired by purchase as creditor,—the only title that could prevail. The minor irregularities supposed to have existed in the proceedings could in no way affect appellee when the insolvency was established and conceded. There being no allegations of fraud, and it being obvious that under no possible manipulation could the estate have shown a residue for distribution, it becomes apparent that the only interested parties who would have a legal right to complain of such irregularities, if they existed, were the creditors who had not been and could not be fully paid. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

RICHMOND and BISSELL, CC., concur.

ON REHEARING.

BISSELL, C. The judgment is clearly right, and there can be found in the statute a perfect answer to all the contentions of counsel. While this opinion is probably not indispensable to a clear expression of the general law determining the rights of the parties, it will serve to construe the various statutory provisions on this subject, and demonstrate the correctness of the judgment thereunder. The law in this country seems to be that upon the death of the ancestor the title to real property immediately vests in the heir who inherits under the statutes of the state where the property is situate; that the heir takes an absolute title, unincumbered by any claims of the administrator or of creditors, in the sense that the rights and claims of either are liens upon the property. In other words, in the absence of affirmative action by either the administrator to subject the property to the payment of debts, or similar action by the creditor to enforce his claim, the heir has a good title, which he may dispose of by contract, or which may be taken by his creditors. It is undoubtedly true that this title, whether it be that of the heir, or the derivative title of the vendee, or of his creditor, may be divested in the manner designated by statute. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 414; Wilson v. Wilson, 13 Barb. 252-264; Chubb v. Johnson, 11 Tex. 470. This general doctrine is not understood to be controverted by the appellant. According to the positions assumed upon the argument, the claim is that the heir succeeded to the estate, which thereupon became immediately subject to the judgment against him and available to process, and only liable to a defeasance if the representative or creditor should proceed in the authorized way to appropriate it. Conceding, ex gratia, that the heir took a legal estate, there can certainly be no question but that it was subject to execution, and might be levied upon by the judgment creditor. Pitts v. Hendrix, 6 Ga. 452; Black v. Steel, 1 Bailey, 307. It is entirely unimportant to discuss or adjudicate this proposition, since the vital question is whether what was done by the administrator was a sufficiently substantial compliance with the statute to be operative to divest the heir's title. The answer to this inquiry will dispose of the controversy. That there is ample statutory authority to subject real property to the payment of debts admits of no question. In the absence of a power conferred by will, action may be taken by the representative under the provision of section 3577, etc., of the General Statutes of 1883. This section 3577 commences: "Whenever, after inventory and appraisement therein, as herein provided, it shall appear that the personal estate of any decedent is insufficient to discharge the just debts, * * * resort may be had to the real estate." This section evidently refers to an antecedent statutory provision for the making of an inventory of the personal property, and its appraisement by individuals designated by order of the court for the purpose. All this is to be done within 30 days after the administrator's appointment, and, together with one or two similar duties, is among the earlier things to be done by him in the settlement of the estate. Since the petition in this case fails to show the making of an inventory, and does not state that there was an appraisement, and the record affirmatively shows that nothing of the sort was done, it is contended that it could not serve as a basis for proceedings to sell real estate. This can only be contended for on the hypothesis that the making of the inventory and the appraisement are conditions precedent to the exercise of the right by the administrator to resort to the real estate for satisfaction of the debts. This contention cannot be supported by the phraseology of the statute, for it does not provide that it shall appear by the inventory and appraisement that the personal estate is insufficient, but the right to resort to the realty is given whenever it appears that the personalty is insufficient for the purpose. The words "after inventory and appraisement" can properly be taken only as a designation of the time at which, or before which, the administrator may not make his application. It is simply a statutory method of fixing the order of the proceedings, and in no sense can be so held to be a condition precedent as to make a failure to observe that statutory provision necessarily fatal to the proceedings. The reasoning of the principal opinion on the lack of the necessity for an inventory and appraisement under the facts existing in this case is entirely satisfactory and conclusive.

The subsequent section relates to the form and contents of the petition which the petitioner must present to the court. It specifies the court in which it shall be filed, and directs that the petition must set forth the amount and value of the personal estate "according to the inventory and appraisement." This phraseology the appellee contends necessitates a statement in the petition that the inventory and appraisement were had. No such construction is at all necessary, but in this regard the section as a whole simply requires the petition to show the amount and value of the personal estate. The primary purpose of the limitation is that, if there be an inventory and appraisement, the petition shall be in accord with its terms. If it be adjudged that an inventory and appraisement are not necessary, then the purpose of the statute is accomplished when the amount and the value of the personal estate are shown by the petition. The section further continues to prescribe what shall be done in case any sale has been made of a portion of the estate; requires the amount of debts and claims allowed and disallowed, and the amount of the legacies, if any, to be stated; and likewise requires it to contain a description of the whole of the real estate of which the decedent died seised, the nature of the title, the nature and value of the several parcels, and the nature and amount of the incumbrance. This is the substantial phraseology of the section under consideration. In the case at bar the petition set forth the amount and value of the estate, and the debts and claims, described the property in controversy as that of which the ancestor died seised, stated her estate to be that of a fee-simple, set out the incumbrance, and prayed the aid of the court. It did not state in so many words that this was all the real property, nor did it attempt to specify the value of the realty described. These defects, it is claimed, are jurisdictionally fatal. Many cases in California contain much that is apparent authority for the contention; but when this section is construed, as it must be, in connection with the subsequent provisions of the statute, whereby the statutory scheme for subjecting the property of a decedent to the payment of his debts is completed, they cannot be held conclusive of the present controversy. It is not universally true, even in California, that a failure to comply with some of the statutory requirements is absolutely fatal. The doctrine there only goes to the extent of establishing the rule to be that where there is a total failure to observe them it is fatal, because those requirements are of necessity jurisdictional in many particulars. But, as was said in Stuart v. Allen, 16 Cal. 501: "It is not necessary, in order to exercise jurisdiction, that there shall be a literal compliance with the directions of the statute; a substantial compliance is sufficient. The main fact required is the averment of the insufficiency of personal assets, and mere formal defects in the mode of statement would not affect the jurisdiction." Under that rule, the petition in this case is abundantly sufficient. The lack of assets, the existence of the debts, that the ancestor died seised of real property, the nature of her title, and the fact of the incumbrance, were all set out. These were the fundamental requirements. The failure to state that this was all the real property of which she died seised, and the neglect to set up its value, would be purely formal defects, available to the persons who are parties to the proceedings, if they sought to take advantage of them by either demurrer or motion, but entirely ineffectual to deprive the court of jurisdiction in the premises. A principal phase of this question received consideration in California, where the court says, in Townsend v. Gordon, 19 Cal. 208: "It may be that the omission of a portion of the real estate would not affect the proceedings or the sale of another portion described." The court then proceeded to discuss the question whether the heir could be divested of his title to any property for the sale of which there was no petition, and the necessity for the petition as a jurisdictional foundation for the proceeding; but conceded that the want of a statement in the petition that that was all of the estate would not be destructive of the validity of the sale, provided only that thing was sold which the petition described. This is in accordance with reason and sound sense. This is the only construction consistent with the subsequent statutory provisions. It is evident that the petition is nothing more, so far as its effect and position in the proceeding are concerned, than that of a complaint in an ordinary suit; and, if enough is contained therein to call upon the heirs who are made parties to respond, it is sufficient, because the action of the court does not rest upon the petition itself. This is a very strong reason for disregarding the binding force of the authorities which hold slight defects fatal to the jurisdiction of the court. By the provisions of sections 3585 and 3588, the court is bound to proceed according to the principles of courts of chancery in like cases, and it is enacted that an issue shall be formed, heard, and determined, and that the court must hear proofs touching the matters alleged in the petition. Whether the petition be taken as confessed, or the hearing is had upon an issue framed under the statute, the court must take the testimony, and decide the matter upon the proofs. It is thus evident that under our statute, after service of process, all that is essential to confer upon the court jurisdiction to proceed in the premises is a petition which shall substantially contain what the statute points out. The petition in this case contains everything that the statute specifies, with the solitary exception of the words "the whole," and a statement of value; things not of the substance, but of the form, which must of necessity have been cured by the hearing which the statute provides for. There seems to be a strong statutory support for the position taken in the main opinion that the creditor was neither a necessary nor an indispensable party. This is found in sections 3578 and 3587, in the first of which it is provided that the widow or husband, the heirs or devisees, shall be made defendants; and in the second of which it is enacted that any creditor or person interested in the estate may appear; thus, upon the doctrine of exclusion by expression, making it plain that the creditor of the heir was in no sense a necessary party to the proper settlement of the controversy. For the reasons above assigned, as well as those expressed in the main opinion, the exceptions should be overruled, and the judgment follow as originally recommended.

REED and RICHMOND, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion and in the principal opinion prepared by Mr. Commissioner REED the judgment is reversed.

CALDWELL v. WILLEY.

CONTRACT FOR LEASE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for breach of contract to lease a mine plaintiff testified that defendant contracted to lease him the mine for five years. The evidence for defendant showed that he was not the owner of the mine, but had a lease thereof for a year, and that he agreed to allow plaintiff to mine coal therein for that period. He denied having made any other agreement, his testimony being supported by other witnesses; and introduced a letter from plaintiff recognizing the agreement under which he was then working, and asked defendant to send him a "bogus contract" for a longer time to be used to induce a railroad to put in a side track for plaintiff, and then to be returned to defendant. Held, that the evidence would not support a verdict for plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Fremont county.

Geo. C. Norris and R. H. Gilmore, for appellant. John G. Taylor and A. Macon, for appellee.

REED, C. This was an action brought by appellee to recover damages for a failure to execute and deliver a lease to a certain coal mine in Fremont county. The issues were made by cross-complaint and answer. In some former litigation, which appears to have been between the Caldwell Coal & Oil Company, — a corporation of which appellant was president, — some other corporation, and appellee, the nature and result of which are not disclosed in this record, it appears a stipulation was filed under which an agreed judgment was entered, and that by such document it was agreed that this action should be prosecuted by the appellee against Caldwell individually. In making up abstracts of records counsel unfortunately, frequently, well knowing the premises themselves, forget that this court is not equally well informed in regard to proceedings in the trial court, and cause much labor and trouble by not stating full and sufficient facts, and we are compelled to grope about, and, by inference from the meager facts stated, to arrive at some conclusion in the premises.

The case in some respects is quite peculiar. The allegations in the cross-complaint are that on June 15, 1884, Elder, Jones, Delano, Cole, and appellant were the owners in fee and in possession of certain lands, and that they, "desiring to have the same prospected for coal, agreed with appellee that he [appellee] should explore for coal, and, in case of discovery of a vein, said Elder, Jones, Cole, Delano, and Caldwell, for certain considerations, which included payment of royalties * * * should and would execute to him (Willey) their certain lease and demise in writing of the whole of said premises for a term of five years," etc. "That in and about the making of the said agreement with appellee the said Elder, Jones, Cole, and Delano were represented by the said Caldwell, who, in making the said agreement, acted and agreed for and on behalf not only of him, the said Caldwell, but of the said Elder, Jones, Cole, and Delano; and that Caldwell was * * * authorized so to agree," for the others. This is the only agreement alleged, — a joint agreement of all the owners; the consideration moving them being to have "the land prospected for coal." It is also alleged that, after the agreement was made, Elder, Jones, Cole, and Delano were fully informed, and ratified it, and permitted him to go to work upon the land; that, relying upon the agreement, appellee entered into possession, expended large sums of money, and on his part complied fully therewith; that Caldwell, Jones, Cole, and Delano delayed and finally refused to execute a lease, and that appellee sustained great damage; prays that all the last-named parties be made defendants, for a decree compelling a lease, for an injunction, damages, etc. The complaint was verified by appellee. There was no joint answer, and neither Elder, Cole, Jones, nor Delano answered. Appellant answered individually, denying that he, individually or in connection with others, at any time made an agreement to lease the land or the mine for five years, or any other time; denied that at any time before November 21, 1884, he was the owner of any part of or had any interest in the land; denied that he desired to have the land prospected for coal, or that he, individually or in connection with others, entered into an agreement with appellee to explore the land for coal; denied that he, for himself or in connection with others, was to execute any lease whatever; denied that he ever represented Elder, Jones, Cole, and Delano, or either of them, in any agreement with appellee as agent; admitted that on June 15, 1884, he was in possession of the premises, but alleged it to have been under a lease from the owners, that expired on the 15th of November, 1884; admitted that appellee mined and took coal from a vein on the premises, but denied that it was under any agreement with him, or with his authority, etc. The answer was verified. It is evident that there is not a full transcript of the cross-complaint in this record. It appears inferentially that certain corporations were made co-defendants. Who they were, and for what purposes joined, we are not informed. It is stated that "the corporations answered the cross-complaint, but no issue concerning them was tried." The answers of the corporations are not given. The trial was to a jury, resulting in a verdict for appellee for $3,345, and a judgment upon the verdict.

It appears to have been conceded, or at least not disputed, that at the time of the alleged making of the agreement appellant owned no interest in the property, and that he first acquired an interest in November following. It is also conceded, or not disputed, that at the date of the alleged agreement for a lease neither appellant nor the corporation of which he was president had any interest in the property, except a lease from the owners, expiring on November 15th of the same year; and that at the expiration of such lease the owners went into possession, and retained it until January 1, 1885, when a new lease was made to appellant for one year.

Numerous errors are assigned, many of which it will not be necessary to discuss. It is urged that the damages allowed were excessive. Nearly all of the evidence in the record upon the question of damage was that of appellee. Apparently no effort at reduction was made by appellant. If the finding upon the other issues was correct, and can be sustained, the assessment must stand. The amount was warranted by the evidence, and seems reasonably moderate under the proof. A party cannot let such questions go by default upon the trial, and urge them here, when the only question is as to the amount awarded, and the verdict does not exceed the proof.

Upon the trial there was no evidence introduced nor attempt made to establish a joint agreement by the owners to make a lease, nor of any desire to have the land explored or prospected for coal, which was alleged as the incentive or consideration for the supposed promise. It was shown and conceded that Caldwell was not an owner; that he was in possession under a lease from the owners; consequently, that the owners had no control of the property for the purposes supposed at the time, nor the possession of the property as alleged in the cross-complaint. No effort was made to in any way connect the owners with the transaction. No proof was made or attempted in support of the allegation that Caldwell acted as the agent of the owners; and, although the only agreement alleged was a joint one, where all the owners were parties, appellee (Willey) testified to an agreement with Caldwell alone, stating in his evidence that he supposed him (Caldwell) to be the sole owner of the 3,000 acres of land, and that he never knew that he was not the sole owner until November 15, 1884.

The testimony is very voluminous and contradictory. The only person testifying directly and positively to a contract for a lease for five years, is the appellee. J. C. Bansemer's testimony was taken on behalf of appellee. He says that Willey entered upon the land, and commenced opening the mine, July 8, 1884, "by permission, and with the expectation of getting a lease from Caldwell. I became interested with Willey, holding one-half interest; I furnishing what cash means were needed and credit to buy other materials. * * * After the expiration of the Caldwell Coal & Oil Company's lease, November 15, 1884, Willey desired me to get a lease from Mr. Jones, who represented the largest portion of the property." In answer to an interrogatory he says: "Mr. Willey stated that he had no doubt that he could get a lease, but that it always ended in failure. Twice he represented that he had a lease from Caldwell, but was never able to produce it." In answer to the interrogatory: "Did you ever purchase from Mr. Willey his claim or interest in the Willey mine, and, if so, when?" he said: "Mr. Willey sold me his entire interest in the mine April 21, 1885, with the positive assurance that I should have a lease." This assignment was in writing, and was put in evidence as Exhibit A. In answer to the interrogatory: "Did you ever have any conversation with Mr. Caldwell on the subject of the five-years lease?" he said: "Yes; during the first week in July, 1884. Question. In that conversation, did you ascertain from Mr. Caldwell that he had agreed with Willey to give you and Willey a five-years lease upon the coal vein? Answer. Mr. Caldwell left me under that impression." On re-direct examination he was asked: "Did Mr. Caldwell ever tell you himself that he would give Mr. Willey a five-years lease, or did he state that fact to Mr. Willey, and did Mr. Willey report it to you? A. He did not tell me personally, but told Willey, and Willey reported it to me." The witness further testified that in November or the first of December, 1884, he knew Caldwell's lease had expired; that at the request of Willey he went to see Jones, to secure a lease from the owners; and that several times Jones promised them a lease. This rather equivocal and uncertain testimony of Bansemer's is all the testimony supporting Willey. Caldwell positively and directly denies that he ever agreed with Willey to make a lease for five years; states that it would have been impossible for him to have done so—first, for the reason that he was not an owner of any share of the property at the time the alleged promise was made; second, that all the control he had of the property, or interest in it, was that of the Caldwell Coal & Oil Company, which was a lease to expire in four or five months. Caldwell's testimony is sustained by that of Mr. Jones, one of the largest owners of the property. He testified that in July, 1884, Willey had a conversation with him. "He said * * * he had got permission to mine on section 18 until the expiration of Caldwell's lease, which expired the 15th of November, 1884;" and on cross-examination, when asked in regard to Willey's knowledge of the time that Caldwell's lease expired, said: "He did know, for I told Willey,—so had Caldwell,—how long Caldwell's lease was to run. Question. When did you tell him this? Answer. Previous to the time he commenced work on section 18 he was there working by the day at what was called the 'Canfield' mine." On November 15, 1884, the Caldwell lease expired, and possession was taken by the owners. Willey, by license or permission of the owners, continued to mine until January 1, 1885, paying royalty to Mr. Jones. At that time a new lease was made by the owners to Caldwell for one year. Mr. Jones says: "After the lease was made to Caldwell, I told Willey that he must stop mining coal there, but that he could go to Caldwell, and see if he could get Mr. Caldwell's consent to mine coal. Mr. Willey said he would go to Caldwell about it. Question. Did Willey claim at that time that he was there under a lease or promise of a lease from Caldwell? Answer. No; he said that he wanted to get a lease from Caldwell." Willey had paid Caldwell no royalty whatever for the coal taken out between the time of his entry and the expiration of the lease on the 15th of November previous. It is shown that Willey went to Caldwell to get a lease after Caldwell got the new lease from January, 1885, to January, 1886; and Mr. Jones further says: "I was in Caldwell's office about March, 1885, and Caldwell read a memorandum to Willey. Willey wanted to get a lease, but did not pay the royalty. Caldwell insisted it should be paid; not only all back royalty, but for all coal he should mine in the future. Willey said he would see Caldwell again." He further testified that the memorandum for a lease made by Caldwell to Willey was to expire December 31, 1885, and that Willey made no objection to the time mentioned. "I never heard of a five-years lease until a short time before this suit was commenced."

C. P. Elder, one of the owners, testified, in answer to the question whether he had ever had any conversation with Willey regarding a lease: "I had several conversations with him in my room; also in George C. Norris' room; and he made certain statements in which he said Mr. Jones had given him a lease, and that Mr. Caldwell had given him a lease, etc. Afterwards Mr. Jones and Mr. Caldwell met him in my room, and together they said that they had never made such a lease. Mr. Willey was present when the statement was made, and that they had never made or promised a lease. When this statement was made Mr. Willey did not contradict it. This was during a conversation with Willey, and he heard it."

Although the former owners of the land and the Caldwell Coal & Oil Company were by stipulation dropped out of the litigation, and it was continued against appellant alone, an examination of the entire evidence shows that whatever was done or attempted by Caldwell, if not done on behalf of the corporation of which he was president, was done through and by advising with or with the co-operation of Mr. Norris, the secretary of the corporation. Mr. Norris testified that on the 8th or 9th of July, 1884, he was at the office on Coal creek, and Mr. Caldwell showed him a statement or proposition for a lease to Willey for five years in the handwriting of Mr. Bansemer, that Caldwell said Willey had left there the night before. It appears the matter was by Caldwell submitted to Norris for his action or consideration, and he testified: "Immediately after, I went over to see Mr. Willey. His house was probably twenty rods from the office. Before I arrived at the house, he, being in the yard, came to meet me. I spoke to Mr. Willey about the memorandum he had left at the office for the lease. I at once said to Mr. Willey that it was impossible to think of such a lease as that, because we only had an option on the property that would only run about four months from that time, or ending the 15th of November, 1884; and, while we expected to take the property, yet we could not execute a lease for longer than that time under any circumstances. Neither would I advise him to take a lease for any length of time, on account of the uncertainty. Mr. Willey said he was not particular about that; that that was written by Mr. Bansemer, and he had put in five years, but he was willing to take it for any length of time, but he did not like to take it for a short time, because it would be necessary for him to get some other parties to furnish him the money. I told him that was a matter he must decide himself, but it was utterly impossible for us to execute a lease longer than the 15th of November, 1884. Question. Was there anything said at that time to Mr. Willey about a promise? Answer. He said nothing whatever about a promise being made. * * * I then said to Mr. Willey that I would draw up for him a permit, if he wished something in writing, to go on and mine coal up to the time our lease expired,—the 15th of November, 1884. I immediately went over to the office, and drew up a rough sketch of a license or permit for him to mine, and handed it to Willey, [which he identifies as the one in evidence.] I told him that was the utmost that we could do. He then said he was satisfied with that, but he wished to send it to Mr. Bansemer. * * * He told me he was perfectly satisfied with this, but said he would have to submit it to Mr. Bansemer; and, whether Mr. Bansemer agreed to it or not, he would execute it when it came back. I then and there distinctly told Mr. Willey I would not advise him to do anything whatever with this property; it was so short a time; and it would be foolish for him to go on and go to any expense mining coal under this agreement. He said he could get coal almost from the surface, and the expense of opening the mine would be very small, and that he was willing to take the risk."

The testimony of John S. Palmer in regard to conversations had by him with Willey also sustains the other evidence given on the part of the appellant. It is clear that the only written instrument given appellee was the unsigned draft of the license or permit drawn and delivered by Norris. It also appears from the testimony of appellee, as well as that of others, that during the occupation of the mine by Willey he was in treaty with the Denver & Rio Grande Railway Company, or with some of its officers, to secure a side track and switches at the coal-bank, to facilitate shipping; and on October 19, 1884, he wrote the following letter, which was in evidence, and marked "Exhibit C:": "Coal Creek, Colo., 10-19-1884. Mr. Caldwell & Norris—Dr. Sirs: Since my return from Denver I have Bin thinking what is Best to do when Mr. Danforth loms up here and wants to see my contract Before contracking with me for my coal. Don't you think it will Bee Best for you to Draw up a Bogus Contract and send it to me, with the understanding that i will return the same to you after the D. & R. g. Puts a Switch in at the mine; If i show the one i have got they want do Enny thing, you Bet. Please let me here from you at once what is Best to do. the miners all hot yet. yours Respectfully, H. WILLEY." In this there is no assertion of any promise to him by Caldwell to make and execute a bona fide contract of lease, and asking a fulfillment of a promise, no complaint that it has not been done, but a tacit admission that the unsigned draft of a license was the document under which he held, and his authority for mining. He says, if he shows the authority he has, the railroad company will do nothing; and with an exhibition of moral obliquity that should discredit him in any court he asks that a "bogus" contract of lease be sent to him, by which he can impose upon the railroad company, and afterwards return it. It is unnecessary to comment upon Willey's testimony, or his want of moral integrity, as evinced by his own evidence and in his correspondence. It is sufficient to say that his testimony is not only not supported by that of any other witness, but is overwhelmingly contradicted and overthrown by that of several others. The letter above given, when identified and admitted in evidence, was alone sufficient to render his entire evidence insufficient if it had been uncontradicted.

Leaving out of consideration the fact that there is no evidence whatever to sustain the allegations of the cross-complaint, as before shown, and the fact of the assignment of Willey to Bansemer of all his interest by a writing of April 21, 1885, which should have precluded him, if he had had a lease, from claiming damage after that date, and basing our conclusion only on the ground of a want of evidence to sustain the verdict, we think the judgment should be reversed. On examination, it is obvious that the verdict was the result of mistake and misapprehension, or of bias and prejudice. It was certainly unwarranted, and should have been set aside. This court, like others of last resort, is loth to interfere with findings of fact by a jury, and has in several instances carried the rule of non-interference to the fullest extent allowable; but where, as in this case, the verdict is clearly the result of misapprehension or bias, there should be no hesitation in setting it aside. We find no error in the instructions of which appellant can complain. That they were not properly considered and followed by the jury is apparent. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed.

EMINENT DOMAIN—PROCEDURE—JURY—BENEFITS.

1. A jury of 12, called from the general panel in attendance in term-time, is not a legal jury, in condemnation proceedings, under Civil Code Colo. § 243, providing that the land-owner may demand "a jury of six freeholders," to be drawn as provided in the succeeding sections.

2. As such statute requires the jurors to be freeholders, it is error to overrule a challenge to one who testified that he owned personal property, but no mining property nor any house or land.

3. In proceedings to condemn a right of way for a railroad, it is error to withdraw from the jury evidence as to benefits to the property from the proposed railroad, as Civil Code Colo. § 253, expressly provides that the value of benefits shall be deducted from the amount of the damages.

Commissioners' decision. Appeal from district court, Gilpin county.

This was a proceeding in condemnation on the part of appellant to acquire a right of way 10 feet in width across a piece of ground occupied as a mill-site, and on which there was a mill for the reduction and treatment of ores on North Clear creek, at Black Hawk. The proceedings were instituted in the county court, and by agreement the venue was changed to the district court, where a trial was had to a jury, resulting in a verdict for $1,500, the value of the land taken having been found to be $500, and the damage to residue of property not taken, $1,000. Motion for a new trial made and overruled, and a judgment on the verdict, from which the appeal was taken. The further facts necessary for a proper understanding of the case appear in the opinion.

Teller & Oranhood, for appellant. Chase Withrow and Morrison & Kohn, for appellee.

REED, C. (after stating the facts as above.) A large number of errors are assigned. It appears that the case was tried at a regular term; the jury was a jury of 12 persons, called from the general panel in attendance. It was objected that the jury was not a proper one in this proceeding, and a challenge and objection was filed, which was overruled by the court, and exception taken. The ruling of the court is assigned for error. Condemnation proceedings under the acts relative to eminent domain are special proceedings, purely statutory, unknown to the common law. Such proceedings, to be valid, must be substantially conformable to the law conferring the right to condemn. Any serious departure vitiates and renders the proceeding void. The right to condemn and appropriate is derived from the constitution and the statutes. The constitutional provision is as follows: "That private property shall not be taken or damaged for public or private use, without just compensation. Such compensation shall be ascertained by a board of commissioners, of not less than three freeholders, or by a jury, when required by the owner of the property, in such manner as may be prescribed by law." In section 23, art. 2, it is declared that "a jury in civil cases in all courts * * * may consist of less than twelve men, as may be prescribed by law." Under these constitutional provisions, the legislature provided in section 242, Civil Code 1883, for commissioners, and in section 243 for a jury, as follows: "Any person, persons, or company, whose estate or interest is to be affected by the proceeding, may demand, at the time of any hearing of such petition, and before the appointment of the commissioners, a jury of six freeholders, residing in the county where such petition is filed, to ascertain, determine, and appraise the damages or compensation to be allowed therefor; and thereupon said court or judge shall make an order for the drawing of such jury, as herein provided." Section 244 provides for a jury and a trial in vacation. It is evident, from an examination of section 246, that the jury shall be the same in number, and selected in the same way, whether the trial occurs in term or vacation. The proceeding being statutory and special, a substantial compliance with its provisions is necessary and imperative. If by statute a new power or right is conferred, and a particular form or manner of proceedings in connection therewith is provided, it is an exclusion of any other mode. In such cases the maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, applies. Potter's Dwar. St. 275; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 30, 31. "Where a statute gives a new power, and at the same time provides the means of executing it, those who claim the power can execute it in no other way." Turnpike Co. v. Gould, 6 Mass. 40; Glass Co. v. White, 14 Mass. 286; Potter's Dwar. St. 275; Smith v. Lockwood, 13 Barb. 209; Thurston v. Prentiss, 1 Mich. 193; Bassett v. Carleton, 32 Me. 553; Renwick v. Morris, 7 Hill, 575; Lang v. Scott, 1 Blackf. 405; Almy v. Harris, 5 Johns. 175; New Haven v. Whitney, 36 Conn. 373; District Tp. v. Dubuque, 7 Iowa, 262; Adkison v. Hardwick, 12 Colo. 581, 12 Pac. Rep. 907. It follows that a jury of 12 was not a legal jury, and that the jurors were not drawn in the manner, and did not possess the qualifications, required. The challenge should have been sustained.

Had the jury been of the proper number, and properly drawn, it would have been error to overrule the challenge for cause to the juror Parcell. The eminent domain statute declares that the jurors shall be freeholders. In answer to questions, he said: "I own, yes, sir, some personal property. Question. Do you own any lode property,—mining property? Answer. No; I do not. Q. Any house or property? A. No; none whatever." It will readily be seen that he did not possess the qualifications required by the statute, and was incompetent.

The court also erred in holding and declaring, during the progress of the case, that no evidence of benefits to the property could be considered. The judge said: "I am going to hold, for the purposes of this trial, * * * that the benefits to this property, by virtue of the increased transportation, will not be considered in this case at all. * * * The ruling is, any benefits you might tender this party are not to be considered as a set-off." It is expressly provided in section 253, Civil Code 1883, that benefits shall be considered. The language is: "In estimating damages occasioned to other portions of claimant's property, or any part thereof other than that actually taken, the value of the benefits, if any, may be deducted therefrom." And in states where there is no statute, the great weight of authority is in favor of the reception of testimony of benefits, such as the evidence here rejected tended to show, as well as injury; and it is clear, on principle, that the damage could only be the balance after deducting such benefits. Whether there were benefits, and of what value, were questions of fact for the jury. Several witnesses testified that the property was benefited by increased facilities for transportation, in connection with the mill business, by the construction and operation of the road. To withdraw such evidence we think was error. We do not find it necessary to examine and discuss each of the supposed errors herein. There are several palpable errors in the admission and rejection of testimony, and in the charge to the jury, which will probably not occur upon a retrial. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

RICHMOND and BISSELL, CC., concur.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed.

GRAND JURY—CHALLENGES—CONTEMPT.

1. The last clause of section 7640, Rev. St. Idaho, which reads, "and no other person must be permitted to be present during the expressions of their opinion or giving their votes upon any matter before them," means no person except members of the grand jury, and does not refer to any member of the panel.

2. In case a challenge to an individual grand juror is allowed, he should not be present during the consideration of the charge as to which he is challenged.

3. If, notwithstanding the injunction, he is present, he is liable to punishment for contempt; but the indictment should not be set aside for that cause.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, Custer county.

J. W. Daniels, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Roberts, for the Territory.

MORGAN, J. The defendant was indicted by the grand jury of the third judicial district in and for the county of Custer, and charged with the crime of assault with intent to murder. He had not been examined before a committing magistrate before indictment, and was not in custody. Upon being arraigned upon the indictment on the 10th day of May, 1890, the defendant moved the court to set aside the indictment for the reasons: (1) That Parley Gould, a member of the grand jury which found the indictment, was also a witness against him before the grand jury; (2) that said Gould had expressed the opinion that said defendant was guilty of the crime charged; (3) that J. G. Finnell and Enos Watson, also members of the grand jury, had such prejudice against him (the defendant) that they could not act impartially. As evidence of these facts defendant filed his affidavit, stating that said Parley Gould had on the 6th day of May, 1890, used the following language to the defendant, to-wit: "I want you to stay away from my premises, and from around my house. You were down here, doing a lot of shooting, last night,"—and filed the affidavit of Henry Edward Miller, showing that said Gould acted with the grand jury, cross-examined witnesses in the jury-room, and manifested his interest in the case in other ways. On the 13th day of May the said motion to set aside the indictment was heard by the court, and denied, to which ruling the defendant excepted. Thereafter, on the said 13th day of May, 1890, the defendant was placed upon trial for the offense charged, and, under the instructions of the court, was convicted of the crime of "assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon," and judgment of the court entered thereon. From the said judgment the defendant takes an appeal to this court, and assigns for error, substantially as follows: (1) That the court erred in refusing to set aside the indictment because members of the said grand jury—J. G. Finnell, Enos Watson, and Parley Gould—were in such a state of mind in reference to this case and this defendant as would satisfy the court that they could not and did not act impartially and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. (2) That the said Parley Gould expressed the unqualified opinion that the defendant was guilty of the crime charged, in the following language, used on the 6th day of May, 1890, to defendant: "I want you to stay away from my premises, and from around my house. You were down here, doing a lot of shooting, last night." It is claimed by counsel that the court should have set aside the indictment under clauses 3 and 4 of section 7730, Rev. St. Idaho. Clause 3 is: "The indictment must be set aside when a person is permitted to be present during the session of the grand jury, and when the charge embraced in the indictment is under consideration, except as provided in chapter 3, tit. 4." Clause 4 is: "When the defendant had not been held to answer before the finding of the indictment on any ground which would have been good ground for challenge either to the panel or to any individual grand juror." The reference to chapter 3, tit. 4, refers to the latter clause of section 7640, which reads: "The district attorney of the county may at all times appear before the grand jury for the purpose of giving information or advice relative to any matter cognizable by them, and may interrogate witnesses before them whenever they or he thinks it necessary; but no other person is permitted to be present during the sessions of the grand jury, except the members and witnesses actually under examination, and an interpreter, when necessary; and no other person must be permitted to be present during the expressions of their opinions, or giving their votes upon any matter before them." This clause means no person except members of the grand jury, and does not refer to members of the panel. People v. Colby, 54 Cal. 38. It does not appear whether the three grand jurors to whom objection is made were present during the expressions of their opinions by the grand jury, nor when giving their votes, and therefore we have no evidence that there was any violation of the statute to which the defendant could object. Upon examination of the words spoken by the juror Gould, it will be seen that they do not constitute an expression of an opinion that the defendant is guilty of the crime charged. He says: "I want you to stay away from my premises, and from around my house. You were down here, doing a lot of shooting, last night." This is not an opinion that defendant was guilty of the offense of "assault with intent to murder," even if the same occurrence was meant, of which there is no evidence. Section 7613 indicates what must be done in case a challenge to an individual juror is allowed on the ground that he is a witness, and has been served with process, or bound by undertaking as such, if he has formed or expressed an unqualified opinion or belief that defendant is guilty or not guilty of the offense charged, or if a state of mind exists on his part which satisfies the court that he cannot act impartially. Then the juror cannot be present, or take part in the consideration of such charge or the deliberations of the grand jury thereon, but he still remains a member of the grand jury. If, notwithstanding the injunction of the court, he does take part, he is to be punished for contempt; but the indictment is not set aside for that cause. Id.; People v. Hunter, 54 Cal. 65. Much of the argument in this case was had on the ground that the court erred in refusing a change of venue, but this point is not saved in the bill of exceptions, and is therefore not before the court. Judgment affirmed.

CREATION OF COUNTIES—REMOVAL OF RECORDS—LOCATION OF COUNTY SEAT—ELECTION.

1. Citizens who are residents, electors, and tax-payers of a county may bring a suit for injunction to prohibit the removal of the county records from a place alleged to be the county seat to a place claiming to be legally selected as the county seat of the county, and to test the legality of such selection, when there is no speedy and adequate remedy at law.

2. Section 6 of the act creating the counties of Elmore and Logan, approved February 7, 1889, was not repealed or abrogated by section 2 of article 18 of the constitution.

3. Said section 2, art. 18, was not intended to apply to the location of a county seat, consequent upon the organization of a new county.

4. A strained construction of the constitution is not required nor permitted, in order to work the repeal of statutes not clearly repugnant thereto. It is the duty of the court to give both the statute and the constitution such construction as will give effect to both, unless the statute is so clearly repugnant to the constitution as to admit of no other reasonable construction.

5. The election held in the state on October 1, 1890, was the general election for that year, and the county commissioners of Logan county were authorized to submit the question of the permanent location of the county seat for said county to the voters at said election.

Appeal from district court, Logan county.

P. L. Williams and V. Bierbower, for appellants. Arthur Brown and S. B. Kingsbury, for respondents.

MORGAN, J. Appellants, who were plaintiffs below, are residents, tax-payers, and qualified electors of the county of Logan, in this state. John Hailey, H. T. Smith, and J. S. Whitton, defendants, are members of the board of county commissioners of the said county of Logan. By authority of section 8, art. 21, of the constitution, the governor, on the 18th day of July, 1890, "ordered an election to be held by the qualified electors of the state of Idaho at the usual voting places, or in such places as may be provided in each precinct, on the 1st day of October, 1890, for the purpose of electing the following officers, namely: A representative in congress, a governor, lieutenant governor, secretary of state, state treasurer, state auditor, attorney general, superintendent of public instruction, and three justices of the supreme court; a district judge and district attorney for each of the five judicial districts of the state; for each county in the state, three county commissioners, a sheriff, county treasurer, a probate judge, a county assessor, a clerk of the district court, a county surveyor, and coroner; a justice of the peace and constable for each precinct in the state; eighteen senators and thirty-six representatives for the legislature,"—directing the board of county commissioners of each county to assemble at the county-seat on the 28th day of July, 1890, and proceed to order an election to be held on the said 1st day of October, for the election of all officers, state, district, and precinct; members of the legislature; a member of congress; and directing that notices be given of such election, in the manner, and for the length of time, provided by the laws of the territory in cases of general elections for delegate to congress, county and other officers; and directing that said election be conducted in all respects in the same manner as provided by the laws of the territory for general elections, including the registration of voters as provided by law. The board of county commissioners for Logan county, at the meeting held on the 28th day of July, 1890, made an order submitting to the voters of said county, at the election to be held therein on the 1st day of October, 1890, the question of the permanent location of the county-seat of said county, alleging that said action was provided for in section 6 of an act of the Idaho legislature entitled "An act creating and organizing the counties of Elmore and Logan, and defining the boundaries of Bingham and Alturas counties," approved February 7, 1889. Said special meeting was held pursuant to a notice published in the Shoshone Journal, a newspaper published in said county of Logan, and in accordance with the proclamation of the governor. The notice calling the said meeting of the board of commissioners contained no statement that the matter of the selection of a permanent location of the county-seat of said county would be acted upon. At said meeting the board of commissioners ordered that the question of the permanent location of the county-seat of Logan county be submitted to the voters of said county at the election to be held October 1, 1890. At said election a majority of all the votes cast for the permanent location of the county-seat of said county were in favor of the town of Bellevue, as appears by the canvass of votes made by said board on the 10th day of October, 1890. On the 7th day of October, 1890, the plaintiffs filed their complaint in this cause, and alleged, among other things, that the defendants were about to remove the county archives, records, and property from the county offices in said town of Shoshone to the said town of Bellevue, and threaten that they will make such removal; and further allege that, unless restrained by the injunction of the court, they will take and remove the books, archives, etc., from said town of Shoshone to the town of Bellevue, to the damage of the plaintiffs and other tax-payers, electors, and residents of said county; that said removal will be of great and permanent injury to all of the said residents, in that it will cost a large amount of the public revenue and moneys of said county to pay the expenses of the said removal, and will be of great and permanent disadvantage to the plaintiffs and other residents. Plaintiffs further allege that there was no petition whatever of a majority, or of any, of the qualified voters of said county ever made or presented at any time; allege that plaintiffs have no remedy at law; pray for temporary injunction until further hearing, and that it be made permanent on final hearing. To this complaint defendants demur, upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to entitle plaintiffs to any injunction, nor to entitle the plaintiffs to the interference of a court of equity. Filed October 21, 1890. On the same date the defendants filed their motion to dissolve the temporary injunction, and their answer; and deny that the county-seat was ever permanently located at Shoshone; deny that the vote was taken for changing the county-seat, but allege that the said vote taken on the 1st day of October, 1890, was for the permanent location of the county-seat, in accordance with the provisions of an act of the fifteenth session of the territorial legislature, entitled "An act creating and organizing the counties of Elmore and Logan, and defining the boundaries of Bingham and Alturas counties," approved February 7, 1889; deny that the removal of the books, records, etc., would be of any damage to plaintiffs; and allege that Bellevue received a majority of all the votes cast at said election, and thereupon Bellevue was, by said board of county commissioners, declared to be the permanent county-seat of Logan county. Various other matters were alleged, not deemed necessary to rehearse. On the 23d day of October, 1890, the hearing upon the motion to dissolve the injunction was had before the judge of the district court, which resulted in the dissolution of the injunction. From the order dissolving the said injunction this appeal was taken.

The first question necessary to be considered by this court is, can these parties bring an action of this kind? They allege that they are residents and electors of Logan county, and tax-payers therein. They also allege that the board of county commissioners, defendants herein, had no right to submit this question to the voters of Logan county at the election held October 1, 1890; that the constitution of the state required an affirmative vote of two-thirds of all the votes cast at said election to take the county-seat to Bellevue; that two-thirds of said voters did not vote in favor of said proposition; that said defendants threatened to remove the books, records, etc., of said county to Bellevue without authority of law; that said plaintiffs would be greatly damaged thereby; that they had no adequate remedy at law. Pomeroy on Remedies has the following: "Actions brought by a citizen and tax-payer or freeholder are permitted in many, and perhaps most, of the states, and are common forms of judicial proceedings to restrain the abuse of local legislative and administrative power by municipal officers." Pom. Rem. § 142. And when an act about to be committed by a municipal corporation is clearly illegal, and its necessary effect will be to impose heavy burdens upon the property of citizens and tax-payers, a court of equity is warranted in interfering by injunction for the prevention of such act. In such case a more prompt and efficacious remedy is demanded than is afforded by the tardy action of courts of law, and equity alone can administer the necessary relief by the exercise of its extraordinary power by injunction. 2 High, Inj. §§ 1236, 1247. The preventive jurisdiction of equity extends to the acts of public officers, and will be exercised in behalf of private citizens who sustain such injury at the hands of those claiming to act for the public as is not susceptible of reparation in the ordinary course of proceedings at law. Id. § 1308. To the same effect is the following: "To allow the taxable inhabitant to maintain a bill for an injunction to prevent illegal expenditures or appropriations of money, has the advantage of directness and simplicity, and notwithstanding its departure, or apparent departure, from technical principles, has the quite general, but not uniform, approval of the courts of this country; and practically this course has not had the effect to engender a multiplicity of similar suits by separate parties, but a few persons usually unite in one suit, which, when judicially determined, in effect settles the question in controversy." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 921. To warrant the relief, however, in any case, it must appear that the acts complained of are of such a character that full and adequate redress cannot be had at law. 2 High, Inj. § 1243. The record in this case does not show that there was any order entered upon the records of the county commissioners of Logan county directing the removal of the records or other property to the town of Bellevue, from which an appeal could have been taken to the court to test the legality of the election, or the threatened removal, nor does it appear that there was any other means for bringing the action of the county commissioners before the court for consideration and decision. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the plaintiffs had no adequate remedy at law, and that they were entitled to relief in equity. We do not understand the appellants to now seriously contend that the law passed by the fifteenth session of the legislature is void. We assume that the decisions of the courts have finally settled this question in favor of its validity. Section 6 of the act creating the county of Elmore is as follows: "The county-seat of said Elmore county is temporarily located at the town of Rocky Bar; the county-seat of Logan county is located temporarily at the city of Shoshone; and, at the regular election to be held in the year 1890, the county commissioners of said Elmore and Logan counties must submit the question of location of the county-seat, for their respective counties, to the voters of their said counties, and the places in each county receiving the highest number of votes for the county-seat is hereby declared to be the permanent county-seats for said counties." The authorities are numerous and conclusive that the legislature has the right and authority to submit to the vote of the people certain local questions, among which is fixing a county-seat. See Paine, Elect. § 268, and cases there cited.

The next question to be considered is, was section 6 of the act of the fifteenth session of the legislature, entitled "An act creating the counties of Elmore and Logan," etc., abrogated by the constitution? Section 2, art. 21, of the constitution, provides that all laws then in force in the territory of Idaho, which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall remain in force until they expire by their own limitation, or be altered or repealed by the legislature. Section 2, art. 18, of the constitution, is relied upon by the appellants as abrogating the section in question. It is clear from the reading of this section that the framers of the constitution had no such intention. It reads: "No county-seat shall be removed unless upon petition of a majority of the qualified electors of the county, and unless two-thirds of the qualified electors of the county voting on the proposition at a general election shall vote in favor of such removal. A proposition of removal of the county-seat shall not be submitted in the same county more than once in six years, except as provided by existing law," etc. The conditions apply to the removal of a county-seat once permanently fixed. The county-seat of Logan county had never been permanently fixed. The language of the section is: "The county-seat of Logan county is located temporarily at the city of Shoshone." The legislature, in effect, says it is necessary that we should designate some place in said county where the county business shall be done, until the people can by their votes designate the place they desire for the permanent county-seat. Therefore the act states the county-seat is located temporarily at the city of Shoshone. The balance of the section puts the meaning beyond question, as follows: "And at the regular election to be held in the year 1890 the county commissioners of said Elmore and Logan counties must submit the question of location of the county-seat for their respective counties to the voters of said counties, and the place in each county receiving the highest number of votes for the county-seat is hereby declared to be the permanent county-seat for said county." The language of the act is too plain for construction or argument. It was not the removal of the county-seat which was submitted to the voters, but the permanent location thereof. The said section of the constitution, therefore, was not intended to apply to the location of a county-seat, consequent upon the organization of a new county. A strained construction of the constitution is not required nor permitted in order to work the repeal of statutes not clearly repugnant thereto. It is the duty of the court to give both the statute and the constitution such construction as will give effect to both, unless the statute is so clearly repugnant to the constitution as to admit of no other reasonable construction. McCool v. Smith, 1 Black, 459; Bowen v. Lease, 5 Hill, 221; Ex parte Yerger, 3 Wall. 85, 105; Furman v. Nichol, Id. 44; Red Rock v. Henry, 106 U. S. 596, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 434. We must therefore conclude that the section of the constitution was not intended to and does not repeal section 6 of the act requiring the location of the county-seat of Logan county to be submitted to a vote of the people.

Had the board of commissioners lawful authority to submit the question of the permanent location of the county-seat of Logan county to a vote of the people at the election held October 1, 1890? The language of the act is: "At the regular election to be held in the year 1890 the county commissioners of said Elmore and Logan counties must submit the question of location of the county-seat to the voters of said counties." We accept the definition given to the word "regular" by the appellants, that it is, in this connection, synonymous with the word "general," and, as used, was intended to mean the general election, as provided for by section 465 of the Revised Statutes of Idaho. Rev. St. Idaho, §§ 465, 466, are as follows: "Sec. 465. There must be held throughout the territory on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November, in the year eighteen hundred and eighty-eight, and in every second year thereafter, an election to be known as the 'general election.' Sec. 466. At such election the following officers must be elected: One delegate to congress for the entire territory; members of the legislative council and house of representatives, according to the number apportioned by law to the county, or to counties jointly; one probate judge; one treasurer, who is ex officio public administrator; one sheriff; one district attorney; one recorder, who is ex officio auditor, and ex officio clerk of the board of county commissioners; one assessor, who is ex officio tax collector; one surveyor; one school superintendent and one coroner for each county, and one county commissioner for each of the three districts of each county; two justices of the peace and one constable for each precinct of each county." It is not a general election because the day on which it was to take place was fixed as the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November, 1888, and every second year thereafter, but because all the officers of the territory, of the districts, and of the counties and precincts were then to be elected. If the legislature, or any other competent authority, should in the mean time change the date on which the same officers should be elected, it would still be the general election for that year. McCrary, Elect. § 159. Congress might have at any time changed the date provided by this statute for the election of the same officers in the territory of Idaho, and it would have still been the general election. The constitution adopted by the people, and ratified by congress, did change the date for the general election for the year 1890, and fixed said time by the proclamation of the governor on October 1st of said year. At said time so fixed were elected all the officers named in section 466, above quoted, and many more. Such a general election never did occur in the history of the territory, and never will occur again in the progress of the state. The term "general election" is more clearly and completely defined by reference to the next section of the statute, which defines "special elections," as contradistinguished from "general elections," described in section 466, as follows: "Sec. 467. Special elections are such as are held to supply vacancies in any office, and are held at such times as may be designated by the proper board or officer." It was not the day on which it occurred, nor the authority which designated the day, but the character of the election, which made it the general election for that year. The statute making it the duty of the board of county commissioners to submit this question to the voters at the general election for the year 1890 rendered it unnecessary for the commissioners to give any notice, in their call for the meeting of July 28th, that such action would be taken. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the board of county commissioners had the authority, and it was their duty, to submit the permanent location of the county-seat of Logan county to the voters at said election; that they did lawfully submit said question to said voters; that said election resulted in the selection of Bellevue as the permanent county-seat; and that the board of county commissioners had lawful authority to remove the records to said town. The action of the judge of the court below, refusing the permanent, and dissolving the temporary, injunction, is approved, and the judgment affirmed. It is further ordered that the plaintiffs herein pay the costs of this action, and that execution issue therefor.

STATE ex rel. EVERDING v. SIMON.

CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—REVISION—ELECTIONS —OFFICERS—TENURE OF OFFICE—ELECTION OF SUCCESSOR.

1. In the construction of a statute the cardinal point is to ascertain the intention of the legislature, but this intention must be ascertained from the words used, in connection with surrounding circumstances.

2. Where a statute has been amended, resort may be had to the original act to explain any ambiguity which may exist in language of amended act, but not to supply omissions.

3. Statutes and parts of statutes omitted from a revision are to be considered annulled, and cannot be revised by construction.

4. An election, in order to be valid, must be held in pursuance of some law authorizing it, in force at the time.

5. The provision for the general election in the city of Portland does not authorize the election of any officer of the city, unless special provision is made by law, either directly or by implication, for the election of such officer for the particular time to which he is seeking to be elected.

6. Courts cannot, even in order to give effect to what they may suppose to be the intention of the legislature, put upon the provisions of a statute a construction not supported by the words.

7. When the legislature has omitted, by mistake or otherwise, to make the necessary provisions to carry out its intention, the court cannot by construction supply the omissions.

8. Where, while a person is rightfully in possession of a public office, the legislature abolishes the term and mode of electing his successor, the public necessities requiring that the office be in possession of some one with authority to discharge its duties, he continues to hold it until he shall be superseded by proper legislative action.

9. Under the provisions of section 1, art. 15, of the constitution a member of the board of commissioners of the city of Portland is authorized to hold the office until his successor is duly elected or appointed under some existing provision of the law.

W. L. Boise and John H. Hall, for appellant. A. F. Sears, Jr., for respondent.

BEAN, J. This case involves a controversy between the relator, Richard Everding, and the respondent, Joseph Simon, concerning the right to exercise the office of police commissioner of the city of Portland. The facts are these: In 1885, section 72 of the charter of the city of Portland was so amended as to provide that the police force of the city shall be appointed and organized by three commissioners, and prescribing the qualifications and duties of these officers. This act provides that the first three commissioners shall be appointed by the governor, and shall hold their office for one, two, and three years, respectively, from the first Monday in July, 1886; their respective terms to be determined by lot; and, commencing with the general election to be held in the city on the third Monday in June, 1887, there shall be elected, annually, one commissioner, who shall hold his office for three years, and until his successor is elected and qualified. That all vacancies shall be filled by appointment made by the mayor, with the consent of a majority of the common council; and that the commissioners shall take the oath of office required of other city officers, and enter upon their duties within 10 days after their appointment by the governor, or on the first Monday in July succeeding their election when elected by the people. The respondent was appointed, by the governor, one of the commissioners provided by the act, and in the allotment of terms secured the three-years term. In 1889, and before his term had expired, the legislature amended the act of 1885, by providing "that section 72 be amended so as to read as follows." This section, as amended, is substantially the same as former acts, except there is omitted therefrom all the provisions concerning the appointment by the governor, term of office, and time and place of election of these officers, and in lieu thereof the following inserted: "The police commissioners now in office shall hold their respective offices until their successors are elected and qualified." It also limits the mayor's power of appointment to vacancies caused by death or resignation. At the general election for city officers in June, 1889, the relator was a candidate for police commissioner, and as such candidate received all the votes cast for said office; there being no opposing candidate. He afterwards duly qualified, and demanded of respondent the possession of the office, which was refused; hence this proceeding. By the act of 1889 the office of police commissioner remained, with its duties clearly defined, but with no term fixed, and no provision for an election or appointment to the office except an appointment by the mayor in case of a vacancy occurring by death or resignation; but we are urged to supply these omissions by construction. It is claimed that the language of the act of 1889, "that commissioners now in office shall hold their respective offices until their successors are elected and qualified," and that "the commissioners shall take the oath of office required of other city officers, and enter upon the discharge of their duties on the first Monday in July succeeding their election," evinces an intention on the part of the legislature that the successors of the commissioners then in office should be elected by the people, and that, in order to carry out such intention, recourse should be had to the act of 1885 to supply the omission. The rule is unquestioned that in the construction of a statute the cardinal point is to ascertain the intention of the legislature; but it is just as well settled that this intention must be ascertained from the words used, in connection with the surrounding circumstances. For the purpose of explaining any ambiguity that may exist in the language of the act of 1889, resort may be had to the act of 1885, sought to be amended; but the parts of the former act omitted in the revision cannot be supplied under the guise of construction. The rule seems to be that statutes and parts of statutes omitted from a revision are to be considered annulled, and cannot be revived by construction. They cannot be read into the latter statute, so as to restrict its operation; and this, although it seems likely that the omissions were unintentional. End. Interp. St. §§ 202, 384; Woodbury v. Berry, 18 Ohio St. 456. All the provisions of the act of 1885 fixing the terms of office of police commissioner, and providing for an election for such office, are omitted from the act of 1889, and this court cannot assume that provisions of such vital and far-reaching importance were unintentionally omitted. State v. Clark, 57 Mo. 25. It seems more probable, from the manner in which the omissions occurred and the substituted language, that the legislative act was intentionally and deliberately done, with a design to insert the proper provisions in some other part of the statute.

The term of office is not fixed by the act of 1889, nor is there anything in the language from which the length of such term can be inferred. The three-years term provided by the act of 1885 has been omitted in the amendment, and must therefore be considered repealed. If the court should undertake, by any possible construction of the language "until their successors are elected and qualified," to ascertain the length of the term intended, what term would it declare? Not three years,—the former term,—because that has been expressly abolished, and the legislature has thereby indicated an intention to make some change in the length of the term, or at least we must conclude that it so intended. It will readily be perceived, then, that this omission cannot be supplied by the court without assuming the functions of the law-making power, and this a court cannot do. It is our legitimate province to interpret legislation, but not to supply omissions.

Nor do we think there is anything in the language of the act of 1889 that can be construed to authorize an election for the office in controversy. It is provided, it is true, "that commissioners now in office shall hold their respective offices until their successors are elected and qualified," and that "the commissioners shall enter upon the discharge of their duties on the first Monday in July succeeding their election;" but this does not in any way authorize an election. It may, and perhaps does, indicate an intention on the part of the legislature that such officers should be elected, but, unless some provision is made for carrying out such intention, it is of no avail. An election, in order to be valid, must be held in pursuance of the provisions of some law authorizing it, in force at the time. There is no inherent reserved power in the people to hold an election. People v. Bull, 46 N. Y. 67; State v. Jenkins, 43 Mo. 261; People v. Johnston, 6 Cal. 673; Matthews v. Commissioners, 34 Kan. 606, 9 Pac. Rep. 765; State v. Sims, 18 S. C. 460. This rule was recognized in the act of 1885, and the time and place of the election provided; but the act of 1889 contains no such provision, nor does it contain anything from which it can be inferred. Our attention has been called to section 11 of the charter of the city of Portland, which provides for the annual city election. This is only a provision for the general election, and certainly does not authorize the election of any officer of the city, unless special provision is made by law, either directly or by implication, for the election of such officer for the particular term to which he is seeking to be elected. Sawyer v. Haydon, 1 Nev. 75; McKune v. Weller, 11 Cal. 49. As we have already seen, there is no provision of law for the election of police commissioner. If the language of the act of 1889 should be so construed as to authorize an election, at what time must such election be held? At the time the relator claims to have been elected? If so, upon what theory? Certainly not because it was the general election for city officers. The act of 1885 provided an election for this office at the general election, and, as we have already seen, this provision was annulled or repealed by being omitted from the act of 1889. If any inference is to be drawn from this omission it must be that the legislature intended, if it intended that an election should be held at all, that it be held at some other time; else why should this provision have been omitted? And again, if an election could be had at all, it must have been immediately preceding the expiration of respondent's term of office; and when did his term expire? We look in vain to the law as it existed in June, 1889, for an answer. It is true, respondent was appointed at a time when the term was fixed at three years, but before the expiration of his term the legislature repealed that provision, so that at the time relator claims to have been elected no term for the office was fixed by law. That the legislature had the right to change the term of the office will not be denied. Territory v. Pyle, 1 Or. 149. These suggestions show the impossibility of so construing the law as to authorize an election, without interpolating into it express and positive provisions not inserted by the legislature. It may be admitted that the language of the act of 1889 shows that the legislature contemplated that the successor of respondent should be elected; and a comparison of the provisions of this act with the provisions of the section intended to be amended suggests the conjecture, if not convinces us of the fact, that the omission to provide for the term of office and election of these officers must have been unintentional; but, whatever may have been the intention of the legislature, it failed to carry it into effect. The inference we draw from the language of the act is not that the legislature thereby gave, even by implication, any power to the people to elect police commissioners, but rather intimated an intention to do so,—an intention which it failed to carry out. Courts "must not, even in order to give effect to what they may suppose to be the intention of the legislature, put upon the provisions of a statute a construction not supported by the words, even although the consequences should be to defeat the object of the act." Smith, Const. Const. § 714.

This is a case, it would seem, where the legislature has omitted, by mistake or otherwise, to make the necessary provisions to carry out its intention; but we cannot by construction supply these omissions. As was said by DAVIES, J.: "It is always competent for the legislature to speak clearly and without equivocation, and it is safer for the judicial department to follow the plain and obvious meaning of an act, rather than to speculate upon what might have been the views of the legislature in the emergency which may have arisen. It is wiser and safer to leave to the legislative department to supply a supposed or actual casus omissus than to attempt to do so by judicial construction." People v. Woodruff, 32 N. Y. 364. Courts cannot supply omissions in legislation, nor afford relief, because they are supposed to exist. To adopt the language of Mr. Justice Woods in Hobbs v. McLean, 117 U. S. 579, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 870: "When a provision is left out of a statute, either by design or mistake of the legislature, the courts have no power to supply it. To do so would be to legislate, and not to construe." "We are bound," said Justice BULLER, in Jones v. Smart, 1 Term R. 44, "to take the act of parliament as they have made it. A casus omissus can in no case be supplied by a court of law, for that would be to make laws. Nor can I conceive that it is our province to consider whether such a law that has been passed be tyrannical or not." And Mr. Justice STORY, in Smith v. Rines, 2 Sum. 338, 354, 355, observes: "It is not for courts of justice proprio marte to provide for all defects or mischiefs of imperfect legislation." See, also, King v. Burrell, 12 Adol. & E. 460; Lamond v. Eiffe, 3 Q. B. 910; Bloxam v. Elsee, 6 Barn. & C. 169; Bartlett v. Morris, 9 Port. (Ala.) 266. We have here, then, a case where the office of police commissioner of the city of Portland was created by a law fixing the term, and providing for the appointment of the first incumbents and the election of their successors, but before the expiration of respondent's term the law was so changed by the legislature, either by mistake or design, that no provision remains fixing the term of office or providing for the election of his successor, leaving him in possession of the office, with its duties devolving upon him; yet, despite this condition of things, the relator claims to have been elected at the expiration of respondent's term, as originally provided; and this brings the case squarely within People v. Mathewson, 47 Cal. 442. In September, 1871, Rosenfeld was by the state at large elected state harbor commissioner of the state of California for the term of four years from December 1, 1871, and served until May 23, 1873, when he resigned, and defendant, Mathewson, was duly appointed by the governor to fill the vacancy. On January 1, 1873, the Revised Code of California went into effect, from which in some manner the provision for an election of harbor commissioner was omitted. Yet the two political parties each nominated a candidate for the office, and at the general election in September, 1873, one Newinan received the greater number of votes cast for said office, to whom a commission was regularly issued by the governor, and, having duly qualified, he demanded possession of the office from Mathewson, the appointee of the governor. Mathewson refusing to surrender possession of the office, the attorney general commenced proceedings to oust him. In deciding the case, WALLACE, C. J., speaking for the court, says: "It is necessary to the validity of an election to office that it be authorized by some statute in force at the time. Here there was none. By the three hundred and sixty-second section of the Political Code it is provided as follows: 'Harbor commissioners are elected and appointed and hold their office as provided in title 6 of part 3 of this Code.' But, on referring to that portion of the Code, no provision for such election is found.

The defendant, Mathewson, having been regularly appointed by the executive to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Rosenfeld, his term continues by law until the next election by the people, (Pol. Code, § 999;) but, as we have said already, such election by the people cannot legally occur until authorized by a statute in force at the time." Again, by an act of the legislature of California approved April 1, 1878, the judges of the fourth, twelfth, and fifteenth judicial districts of the state were empowered and required to choose the members of the board of police commissioners of the city of San Francisco. No term of office for the commissioners was fixed by the act. The act prescribed the powers and duties of the board, and further provided that after the expiration of the official term of the then chief of police his office should "cease to be elective, and shall be filled by the commissioners." On the assumption that the act was unconstitutional, because the power thus conferred upon the judges was not judicial in its nature, an application was made to the courts for a writ of mandamus requiring the election commissioners to make suitable and legal preparation for the election of chief of police and police commissioner, but was denied on the ground that such officers were not elective. Staude v. Commissioners, 61 Cal. 313. By the constitution of 1879 the judges of the district courts were superseded by the judges of the superior courts, but an application for a writ of mandate commanding the judges of the latter court to appoint police commissioner was, assuming that the terms of office had expired, denied, because the power of appointment in question was not a judicial power, and did not devolve upon the superior judges by force of the constitution of 1879. Heinlen v. Sullivan, 64 Cal. 378, 1 Pac. Rep. 158. The governor of the state then, assuming that the office was vacant, under the constitution, on and after four years from the date of the original appointment, undertook to fill such vacancy by appointment, but the court held that there was no vacancy in the office which the governor was authorized by law to fill by appointment, and that the incumbent must discharge the duties of the office until succeeded by some person entitled by virtue of some existing law to supersede him. People v. Hammond, 66 Cal. 654, 6 Pac. Rep. 741.

We could safely rest the case before us here, but there is another question argued by counsel which we think proper to notice. It is contended that the act of 1889 invests respondent with an office, the tenure of which is longer than four years, and therefore in conflict with section 2, art. 15, of the constitution, which inhibits the legislature from creating any office the tenure of which shall be longer than four years. The fallacy of this argument lies in the fact that the act of 1889 does not create the office of police commissioner; nor did it invest respondent with the office; nor does it undertake to definitely fix the tenure. The office was created, by the act of 1885, with a fixed term, and defendant was regularly appointed, and while he was rightfully in possession of the office, and discharging its duties, the legislature abolished the term and mode of electing his successor, leaving the office, with its duties clearly defined, in the legal possession of respondent, with no mode provided for the election or selection of his successor, except in case of death or resignation. He does not hold the office by virtue of the provisions of the act of 1889, but under his original appointment, and the failure of the law to provide a mode for the election of his successor. The act of 1889 left him in possession of the office, and its duties are of a public character, and the public exigencies demand that they be discharged. He is simply locum tenens—holding the place—until he shall be superseded by some person authorized by law to be inducted into the office. It is claimed that the provision in the act of 1889, "that commissioners now in office shall hold their respective offices until their successors are elected and qualified," without any mode being provided for the election of such successors, is in effect a continuance of the commissioners in office by legislative enactment, and that respondent's title depends on this enactment. As we have said already, respondent's right to the office does not depend on the act of 1889, but upon the fact that he was in possession of it rightfully when the act was passed; and the public necessities requiring that the office be in possession of a person with authority to perform its duties, he continues to hold it until he shall be relieved or superseded by proper legislative action. Strictly speaking, respondent is not "holding over," for "to hold over," when applied to a public officer, implies that the office has a fixed term which has expired, and the incumbent is holding into the succeeding term. Here there is no fixed term, and therefore can be no holding over. But conceding that his term has expired, and he is holding over, he has a right to do so by force of the constitution; and the language above referred to is but a legislative declaration of the constitutional provision. Section 7, art. 6, of the constitution, authorizes the election or appointment, as may be prescribed by law, of such city officers as may be necessary; while by section 1 of article 15 it is provided that "all officers, except members of the legislative assembly, shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified." Whether or not, as a general principle of the common law, officers are entitled to hold over beyond their prescribed terms without some express provision, is not entirely settled upon authority; but, whatever the rule at common law may have been, it is clear that when by the constitution or law officers are elected or appointed for a term, and until their successors are elected and qualified, they are thereby authorized to hold and exercise their offices until their successors are duly elected or appointed under some existing provision of law. The right to hold over is derived from the same constitution that imposes the limitation upon the legislature in the creation of the office. The constitution permits a legislative tenure for a fixed term, not exceeding four years; and if, at the expiration of that period, from any cause, such as the failure of the legislature to provide for the election of his successor, (People v. Hammond, 66 Cal. 654, 6 Pac. Rep. 741;) or of the regular appointing power to make an appointment, (State v. Howe, 25 Ohio St. 588;) or of the electoral body to elect, (State v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 434, 16 N. E. Rep. 384; People v. Oulton, 28 Cal. 44; People v. Stratton, Id. 332; State v. Lusk, 18 Mo. 333;) or the death of the person elected to fill the office before he has qualified, (Com. v. Hanley, 9 Pa. St. 513.)—no successor has been elected or appointed under an existing law, the incumbent holds over, by virtue of the provisions of the constitution, until he is superseded by a duly-qualified successor, who shall have been elected or appointed in the manner provided by law, (People v. Woodruff, 32 N. Y. 355; People v. Batchelor, 22 N. Y. 128; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 397; State v. Davis, 45 N. J. Law, 390; People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. 614.) The reason of this rule is that public policy requires that the duties of the office be performed, and it is better that the incumbent should continue in the office and in the performance of its duties than an interregnum should occur. It conserves the public interests by preserving the methods and instrumentalities by which alone public business can be transacted; while the opposite rule, when pushed to its consequences, might result in the suspension of business in many of the departments of the public service. It was urged that the statute under consideration is harsh and oppressive in its character, and contrary to the genius of our institutions, in denying to the people of Portland the right to elect their own police commissioners. These are political considerations, fit to be weighed by and to influence legislators; but, if disregarded by them, their responsibility is to their constituents, and not to the courts. The impolicy, unwisdom, or unreasonableness of a statute, by themselves merely, are and ought to be urged to a court in vain. The functions of the judicial department are not adequate to the application of those principles, and not conferred for that purpose. If a change is desired in the law in this respect application must be made to the legislature, and not to the courts. The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

APPEAL—TRANSCRIPT—WANT OF CERTIFICATE.

In California an appeal will be dismissed where there is no certificate to the transcript.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDON, Judge.

G. H. Perry, for appellant. Pierson & Mitchell, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by J. J. Rauer from an order declaring H. Wierbitsky & Co. insolvent debtors, and appointing an assignee. A motion was made by respondent on November 28, 1890, to dismiss the appeal on the grounds, among others, that there is no certificate to the transcript, and nothing to show that the papers in what is called the "transcript" are copies of the originals filed in the superior court. On the same day appellant suggested a diminution of the record, and moved this court for an order directing the clerk of the lower court to attach to the transcript a proper certificate, which motion was on the same day granted. Since then no such certificate has been furnished, and no further step has been taken by the appellant. There being no certificate to the transcript, the said motion of the respondent is now granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

CONGRAVE et al. v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO.
(No. 13,395.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—PERSONAL INJURIES—FELLOW-SERVANTS.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 1970, providing that an employer is not bound to indemnify his employe for losses suffered in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer "in the same general business," unless he has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employe, a railroad company is not liable for the death of a brakeman in a collision caused by the negligence of the conductor on the same train in running his train ahead of schedule time, unless the company was negligent in selecting an incompetent conductor.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; B. F. MYERS, Judge.

D. M. Delmas and Robert F. Devlin, for appellants. Hale & Craig, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought by the widow and infant son of James W. Congrave, deceased, to recover damages for the death of the latter, who was killed by an accident on a railroad train of the defendant. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained by the court below; and, plaintiffs declining to amend, judgment went for the defendant. From this judgment plaintiffs appeal.

The plaintiffs aver that said Congrave, deceased, was a brakeman in defendant's employ upon a train which left the town of Truckee on March 19, 1888, and started westward, destined for Sacramento city. It is averred, in general terms, that the deceased, as such brakeman, was "placed by said defendant under the control and direction and subject to the orders of the conductor of said train;" but it is not averred that the accident which resulted in the death was caused, in whole or in part, by any order or direction given by said conductor to said deceased, or that any order or direction whatever was given. On the other hand, it appears affirmatively that the accident was not caused by any order or direction given by the conductor to said deceased. The complaint proceeds to state in detail the circumstances, facts, and causes which produced the accident by which the deceased was killed, and they are briefly as follows: The train, proceeding westward, had to pass a certain station called "Tamarack." "According to the rules and regulations, time-tables and schedules, made by said defendant to govern and regulate the movements of its trains upon its aforesaid roads, and the times of the arrivals and departures of said trains from said stations, and for the instruction and guidance of its conductors," said train ought to have left Tamarack at the hour of 55 minutes past 12 o'clock noon of said day, and not earlier; and it was "the duty of said conductor" not to have allowed the train to start before said time. But the conductor, "in disregard of the aforesaid rules, regulations, time-tables, and schedules of said defendant," "negligently and recklessly ordered, caused, and permitted said train to leave said Tamarack station, in its westward bound course, a long time before the expiration of the proper and schedule time as aforesaid," viz., at 46 minutes past 12 o'clock. "By reason of said negligence, recklessness, and breach of duty by said conductor, and the departure of said train from said Tamarack station before its proper and schedule time as aforesaid," the train collided with another train, and by said collision the deceased was killed. It is stated by way of recital that he was killed "while at his post obeying the orders and directions of said conductor, and performing his duties as such brakeman;" but there is no averment that any particular order was given, or that any such order contributed in the slightest degree to the accident or the death. The demurrer contained the general ground of want of facts, and also special grounds,—one being that the complaint was uncertain, etc., because "it does not appear therefrom what were the duties, or any of them, required of or to be performed by James W. Congrave, mentioned in said complaint, as brakeman on the train mentioned therein." We think that the demurrer was properly sustained, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

It is entirely clear on the face of the complaint that the deceased and the conductor were co-employees of defendant. It is also clear that the death was caused by the negligence and breach of duty of the conductor in starting the train before schedule time; no other cause of the accident is intimated in the complaint. There is no averment that the defendant was negligent in the selection of the conductor. And the general rule (whatever exceptions there may be to it) is well settled in England and the United States, and particularly in this state, that a master is not liable to his servant for damages sustained by the negligent act of a fellow-servant, unless the master was negligent in the selection of the servant at fault. It is hardly necessary to cite authorities on this point, as we do not understand counsel for appellant to contend against the general rule as above stated. The earliest cases upon the subject in this country in which the principle was applied to railroad companies and their employes are Murray v. Railroad Co., (decided by the supreme court of South Carolina in 1841,) 1 McMul. 385, and Farwell v. Railroad Corp., (decided in 1842 by the supreme court of Massachusetts, Chief Justice SHAW delivering the opinion,) 4 Mete. 59. These leading cases were generally followed in the United States. Very few cases can be found which deny the general rule. They were also followed in England. Hutchinson v. Railroad Co., 5 Exch. 343; Wigmore v. Jay, Id. 354; Coal Co. v. Reid, 3 Macq. H. L. Cas. 266. We need not allude further to authorities in other jurisdictions, as this court has frequently approved the rule. In Yeomans v. Navigation Co., 44 Cal. 71, the point was directly involved, and the court, among other things, say: "The defendants excepted to these instructions, and contended that the case is within the reason of the rule that an employer is not responsible to his employe for injuries resulting from the negligence, carelessness, or unskillfulness of a fellow employe engaged in the same general business. The rule itself cannot be questioned. It has been settled by a uniform series of both English and American decisions. The question comes upon the application of the principle to the present case." In that case it was held that plaintiff, who was an express agent, was a passenger, and not an employe of defendant. In Hogan v. Railroad Co., 49 Cal. 128, the court say: "In Yeomans v. Navigation Co. we announced the rule of law on this subject, and referred to many of the authorities by which it was sustained. The cases are very numerous,—many of them being cited by defendant,—and they are to the effect that the master is not liable for injuries suffered by a servant through the negligence of a fellow-servant, unless the master was negligent in the selection of the servant in fault. The early cases in Wisconsin, Indiana, and Ohio, relied on by plaintiff as sustaining his view of the law, have since been overruled or disapproved." Other cases to the same point are Collier v. Steinhart, 51 Cal. 116; McLean v. Mining Co., 51 Cal. 256; McDonald v. Hasletine, 53 Cal. 35; Brown v. Railroad Co., 72 Cal. 523, 14 Pac. Rep. 138; Fagundes v. Railroad Co., 79 Cal. 97, 21 Pac. Rep. 437.

It is true, however, that there has been some difference of opinion as to the meaning of the phrase "fellow-servant;" and a few of the cases have recognized a distinction growing out of different grades of employment. There has also been recognized in a few instances what may be called the doctrine of "vice-principalship;" that is, where one general employe is held to have been given the entire and unlimited control of the whole business of the principal, so that he stands in all respects in his principal's place, and all his negligent acts are deemed to be the direct acts of the principal. And upon these asserted principles we understand appellant to mainly rest his case. It is contended that as the conductor was superior in grade to the deceased brakeman, and had certain authority over him, and as the conductor, with respect to the running of the train, was the vice-principal, therefore the general rule applicable to fellow-servants does not apply. In support of this position the case of Railroad Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. Rep. 377, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184, is cited.

The facts of the last-named case are not exactly like those in the case at bar. It may be assumed, however, that the opinion of the majority of the court in that case is favorable to appellant's contention. That seems to be the view taken by the four dissenting justices, BRADLEY, MATTHEWS, GRAY, and BLATCHFORD; for, in expressing their dissent, they say: "We think that the conductor of the railroad train in this case was a fellow-servant of the railroad company with the other employes on the train. We think that to hold otherwise would be to break down the long-established rule with regard to exemption from responsibility of employers for injuries to their servants by the negligence of their fellow-servants." But it is to be observed that the majority of the court were not governed or restrained by any statutory provision. They were at entire liberty to consider the philosophy of the subject, and to follow the direction of their own judgment as to what should be the rule. The decision was not given in view of the statutory law of California upon the point, or of any similar law of any other state. The Civil Code of California went into effect January 1, 1873, and under the head of "Obligations of the Employer" it provides as follows: "Sec. 1970. An employer is not bound to indemnify his employe for losses suffered by the latter in consequence of the ordinary risks of business in which he is employed, nor in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer, in the same general business, unless he has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employe." This section of the Code not only restates the rule first established by judicial decision as to injury received through the negligence of a fellow-servant, but it clears away to a great extent the difficulties which may have existed as to the meaning of "fellow-servants." It declares them to be those employed "in the same general business." And if the employes on a train of cars, including the engineer, the conductor, the fireman, and the brakeman, are not persons employed in the same business, it would be difficult to imagine a set of men who could be considered as so employed. They are employed on the same train; their duties all appertain to the running of that train; each has his own work to do, and the joint work of all is necessary to the business; they are almost constantly in close relations and personal contact with each other; they have the fullest opportunities for knowing each others' qualifications as to carefulness and skill, and detecting any failure of duty; and to them applies peculiarly the reasoning upon which the general rule was originally founded. This clause of the Code has received judicial construction. In McLean v. Mining Co., 51 Cal. 255, plaintiff was employed to work in a hydraulic mine. One Kegan was "foreman of all the work" with "authority to employ and discharge hands." Through the negligence of Kegan plaintiff was injured by a blast. Judgment in the trial court went for defendant, and on appeal plaintiff's counsel contended, as an exception to the general rule, "that the employer is liable for injury to a subordinate servant by the negligence of a superior." The court affirmed the judgment, and in its opinion, after quoting section 1970, said: "The injury to the plaintiff was caused by the negligence of Kegan, the foreman of defendant, who was a fellow-servant with the plaintiff,—'another person employed by the same employer in the same general business,' that is, the business of working the mine of defendant,—Kegan being in the blasting, and plaintiff in the hydraulic, department of the 'general business.' * * * The law of this state respecting this subject, as set forth in the Code referred to, recognizes no distinction growing out of grades of employment of the respective employees; nor does it give any effect to the circumstance that the fellow-servant through whose negligence the injury came was the superior of the plaintiff in the general service in which they were in common engaged; and the alleged distinction in this respect insisted upon by the defendant's counsel, founded, as he claims, on the general principles of law and the adjudged cases, requires no examination at our hands. Collier v. Steinhart, ante, p. 116, (51 Cal.)" It is clear that in deciding this case the court determined that the Code swept away the distinctions which appear in some of the "adjudged cases" on the subject of fellow-servants. Collier v. Steinhart, referred to in the opinion, (51 Cal. 116,) is still stronger to the point decided. Both of these cases were approved in McDonald v. Hazletine, 53 Cal. 35, which was also a case where an employe was injured through the carelessness of a foreman. These cases were again followed and approved in Stephens v. Doe, 73 Cal. 26, 14 Pac. Rep. 378, where it was held that "the foreman of a mine and a miner employed to work under his directions are fellow-servants; and the owner of the mine is not liable for injuries caused through the negligence of the foreman, unless he failed to use ordinary care in the selection of the foreman." The same doctrine was announced in Brown v. Railroad Co., 72 Cal. 523, 14 Pac. Rep. 138, and Fagundes v. Railroad Co., 79 Cal. 97, 21 Pac. Rep. 487.

It is contended, however, that the principal may give an employe such authority as will constitute him a "vice-principal;" that in that instance such employe stands in the shoes of the principal, and the latter is liable for the employe's negligence by which another employe is injured; and that in the case at bar the conductor was such vice-principal. The authorities mainly relied on for this contention are Beeson v. Mining Co., 57 Cal. 20; Brown v. Sennett, 68 Cal. 225, 9 Pac. Rep. 74; Sanborn v. Trading Co., 70 Cal. 261, 11 Pac. Rep. 712; and McKune v. Railroad Co., 66 Cal. 302, 5 Pac. Rep. 482. In the Beeson case the death of the deceased was caused by a defective pipe in a mine; and the only point decided was that a principal is liable for injury to an employe caused by defective machinery. The principle that it is the duty of an employer himself to provide safe materials and structures has never been disputed. There is some language used in the opinion which, perhaps, goes further, for which reason, probably, three justices dissented; but the case decides nothing more than as above stated. In Sanborn v. Trading Co. the plaintiff was injured by defective machinery used in a saw-mill; and the court decided, according to the well-settled rule, that "it is the duty of the owner of a saw-mill to furnish suitable and safe machinery for the use of his employes." Brown v. Sennett and McKune v. Railroad Co. seem to recognize to some extent the doctrine of vice-principalship. In the former case it was held that "the foreman of a gang of men to whom a stevedore delegates the entire management of the work of unloading a vessel, with full direction to control and supervise it, is not a fellow-servant with his subordinate employes." The court says in its opinion that the "defendants abdicated the control and management of the entire work to the foreman, and gave him full discretion to control and supervise it." He employed the men; and the court holds that "the foreman was therefore in the performance of the 'job' in place of the master." The case is decided by a mere majority of the court, it makes no allusion to the language of the Code; and it is hard to reconcile with some former decisions, particularly with Collier v. Steinhart, above mentioned, (51 Cal. 116,) and McLean v. Mining Co., supra. But, assuming the case to be correctly decided, the facts were very different from those in the case at bar. In McKune v. Railroad Co., a department decision, the defendant was engaged in constructing a railroad. The plaintiff was injured by the negligence of one Fisher, who "was material agent and train dispatcher for defendant, and had charge of the moving of trains." The negligence consisted in his carelessly sending out a special train which collided with a hand-car on which plaintiff and others were riding, and injured plaintiff. "A rule of the company declared that no extra engine, either with or without train, unless in company with a regular train, would pass over any portion of the road, except on an order from the material agent or train dispatcher." The court says: "He represented the defendant; was a vice-principal; he employed and discharged men, and directed the movements of the trains. When he directed the extra train to go up the road, the company directed it." Assuming this case not to be in conflict with the numerous decisions above noticed, it is clear that it is not authority for appellant in the case at bar. The material-man and train dispatcher seems to have had control of the entire business of constructing the railroad. He employed and discharged men, and moved all the trains at his own will, without any restraint. The defendant seems to have "abdicated" in favor of this general agent. But in the case at bar the conductor was merely an ordinary employe, who worked with other employes on a train, each having certain duties to perform. He had no power to "direct the movement of trains." He had no authority to direct the movement of the particular train on which he was employed, except in accordance with the regulations and schedules and time-tables by which the defendant directed the work to be done. He had no power to employ and discharge men. It cannot be said that when he started the train before the schedule time "the company directed it." He was not then acting for the defendant, but against its express orders. He did not, therefore, come within the doctrine of vice-principalship,—assuming that there may be cases to which that doctrine would apply. Moreover it was said, and we think it was clearly intended to be decided, in Brown v. Railroad Co., 72 Cal. 523, 14 Pac. Rep. 138, that the brakeman and conductor on a railroad train are fellow-servants. And in Fagundes v. Railroad Co., supra, it was held that a laborer, a track-worker, and a conductor were all fellow-servants. Our conclusion is that, on the facts of this case as presented in the complaint, the deceased and the conductor were persons "employed by the same employer in the same general business," within the meaning of section 1970 of the Civil Code, and that, therefore, the defendant is not liable for the death of the one caused by the negligence of the other. Judgment affirmed.

In re BAQUIER'S ESTATE. (No. 14,080.)¹

EXECUTORS—ISSUE OF LETTERS—OBJECTIONS ON THE GROUND OF INCOMPETENCY.

1. The fact that an executrix claims property as her own, which the other legatees insist belongs to the estate, does not, of itself, show a want of integrity, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1850, providing that no person is competent to serve as an executor who is wanting in integrity.

2. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1349, provides that the court admitting a will to probate must issue letters thereon to the persons named therein as executors, who are competent, who must appear and qualify, unless objection is made under section 1351, which provides that any person interested may file objections to granting letters testamentary to the persons named as executors, and the objections must be determined by the court. Held, that the objections must show that the applicant for letters is incompetent upon some ground specified in section 1850, which provides that no person is competent to serve as executor who is under the age of majority, convicted of an infamous crime, or adjudged by the court incompetent to execute the duties of the trust by reason of drunkenness, improvidence, or want of understanding or integrity.

3. Where, on objections by the legatees to the issue of letters testamentary to the person named as executrix in the will, the court adjudges her incompetent, and denies her application for letters, an order denying her a new trial is appealable.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

J. C. Tubbs and A. L. Hart, for appellant. G. L. Johnson and James B. Devine, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Mary C. Rode was named in the will of Joseph Bauquier, deceased, as executrix without bonds, and filed in the superior court of Sacramento county her petition for the probate of said will, and for the issuance to her of letters testamentary. Objections to her appointment as executrix were filed by her brothers, who were also legatees named in the will, upon the alleged ground that she, in the life-time of said Joseph Bauquier, "for the purposes of pecuniary gain, and to obtain an unjust and larger portion of the estate of said Joseph Bauquier, deceased, than she was legally or morally entitled to, and to defraud said Peter, Frank, and Joseph Bauquier of their just portion of said estate, did, by means of intimidation, falsehood, fraud, deceit, misrepresentation, and undue influence, compel, influence, and induce her said father, the said Joseph Bauquier, deceased, to assign, set over, and deliver" to her $12,543.88 in money and certain described real and personal property, and that the said petitioner claims adversely to the estate to be the owner of said property so fraudulently obtained. This is followed by the general allegation "that said Mary Rode is incompetent to act as executrix of the said last will and testament for want of integrity, as shown by the facts herein set forth, and that she is generally incompetent, by reason of the facts herein set forth, to act as such executrix." An answer was filed to these objections, and, after a trial upon the issues arising, the court made the following and only finding: "Mary C. Rode is incompetent to execute the duties of the trust of executrix of the said last will and testament of said Joseph Bauquier, deceased, for want of integrity; and that the said Mary C. Rode is antagonistic and hostile, and asserts claims adverse to the said estate, and that she wants integrity in that regard." The court thereupon denied her application to be appointed executrix. The petitioner moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from this latter order this appeal is taken.

1. Under section 1850 of the Code of Civil Procedure no person is competent to serve as an executrix who is wanting in integrity. The word "integrity," as here used, means soundness of moral principle and character, as shown by one person's dealing with others in the making and performance of contracts, in fidelity and honesty in the discharge of trusts. In short, it is used as a synonym for probity, honesty, and uprightness in business relations with others. The evidence in the record before us is not such as would justify a finding that the petitioner is lacking in integrity, as thus defined, and we are not certain, from the peculiar language of the finding quoted, that the learned judge of the court below intended to say anything more than that the adverse interests of the petitioner would prevent her from fairly, justly, and properly protecting the estate; and that this is a want of integrity within the meaning of the statute. We do not think, however, that the mere fact that the appellant claims property as her own, which the other legatees insist belongs to the estate, would of itself, and without some reference to the honesty of her claim, show a want of integrity.

2. The remaining inquiry is whether the court was justified in denying the appellant's application upon the ground that she "is antagonistic and hostile, and asserts claims adverse to the said estate of Joseph Bauquier, deceased, and to the heirs at law, and persons interested in said estate;" or, adopting the language of counsel for respondents, "can one who claims a hostile and adverse interest in property alleged to belong to an estate be appointed administrator of such estate?" The answer to this will be found in the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the appointment of executors, and declaring who shall be incompetent to act in that capacity. These sections are as follows: "Sec. 1349. The court admitting a will to probate, after the same is proved and allowed, must issue letters thereon to the persons named therein as executors who are competent to discharge the trust, who must appear and qualify, unless objection is made as provided in section thirteen hundred and fifty-one. Sec. 1350. No person is competent to serve as executor who, at the time the will is admitted to probate, is (1) under the age of majority; (2) convicted of an infamous crime; (3) adjudged by the court incompetent to execute the duties of the trust by reason of drunkenness, improvidence, or want of understanding or integrity. * * * Sec. 1351. Any person interested in a will may file objections in writing to granting letters testamentary to the persons named as executors, or any of them; and the objections must be heard and determined by the court." The meaning of these sections is that at the time of admitting the will to probate the court must appoint as executor the person who is therein named as such, if he has petitioned therefor, and is not incompetent, unless written objections to such appointment have been filed, in which case the objections must be heard and determined; and the objections made must be such as show that the applicant is incompetent upon some one of the grounds specified in section 1350 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under our law a man has the right to make such disposition of his property as he chooses, subject only to such limitations as are expressly declared by law; and within the same limitations he has the absolute right to select the executor to carry out the provisions of his will. In other words, any executor named in a will has the right to act, unless there is some express provision of law which declares that he shall not; and, as a consequence, the testator may lawfully select any person for this trust who does not fall within one of the classes expressly mentioned and declared to be incompetent. And, so far as our investigation has extended, this construction has been uniformly given to statutes relating to this subject. Thus, DENIO, C. J., in his opinion rendered in McGregor v. McGregor, 40 N. Y. 139, says: "The selection of executors is not committed to the surrogate's court. The testator is allowed to appoint such persons as he may see fit, provided they do not fall within the class of incompetent persons mentioned in the statute." The language of JOHNSON, J., in the same case, is equally explicit. He says: "The statute (2 Rev. St. p. 69, § 1) makes it the duty of the surrogate, when any will of personal estate shall have been admitted to probate, to issue letters testamentary thereon to the persons named therein as executors, if they are by law competent to serve as such. It then provides who shall be deemed incompetent to serve as executor. I am of the opinion that any person appointed or named as an executor in a will is to be deemed competent unless he is declared incompetent by statute, and that it is the duty of the surrogate to grant letters to every person named as executor in a will, upon his application, who is not declared incompetent to serve by statute. He has no discretion to exercise in the matter, but must obey the requirements of the statute, which is the sole source of his power." The court of appeals of Kentucky take the same view of this question. "It is sufficient for us to say that the law has declared who may and who may not be executor; and, if Berry be a man whom the law allows to be appointed as such, it follows that upon his motion to give bond and security, and to qualify under the will, it was the duty of the county court, if the security was sufficient, to permit him to give bond, and be qualified as executor, and to give him letters testamentary. * * * Whatever may be opinions of men as to the propriety or impropriety of a particular appointment, the very basis and foundation of the exercise of the right which society has granted to its members to appoint its own representatives after death is the special confidence reposed by the testator in the appointee; and men, it seems to us, would care but little for the high privilege of disposing of their estates to their own liking if they are to be denied the right of selecting those who are to carry out and effectuate the benevolent purposes of their wills. It is true, some persons are incapable of being executors. The law has pointed out who they are, and society has long been satisfied with the wisdom of the rules upon this subject." Berry v. Hamilton, 12 B. Mon. 191. That the courts have no right to say that a person is incompetent to be appointed as an executor unless he falls within one of the classes of persons expressly declared to be incompetent by statute, is further shown by the decisions in regard to administrators where the law designates the order of priority in which different persons shall be entitled to appointment, and also declares who are incompetent to act. It is held in such cases that the order of priority named in the statute must be followed, and that no person can be declared incompetent unless he is one of a class so declared by the statute. A leading case on that point is Coope v. Lowerre, 1 Barb. Ch. 45. In that case the chancellor said: "The Revised Statutes provide that administration in cases of intestacy shall be granted to the relatives of the deceased who would be entitled to his personal estate, if they or any of them will accept the same, in the order specified in the statute; and I think the surrogate has no discretion to exclude a person declared by the statute to be entitled to a preference, except for the causes specified in the thirty-second section of the title of the Revised Statutes relative to granting letters testamentary and of administration." This case has been approved and followed in our state in Estate of Pacheco, 23 Cal. 480. In that case it was said: "On the trial it was admitted that one of the applicants, Rosa Pacheco de Sibrían, cannot read, write, or speak the English language; that she cannot read or write the Spanish; that she is sixty-nine years old, a Californian by birth, and a daughter of the intestate. It is not claimed that the other applicant, Penniman, is subject to any of the disqualifications mentioned in section 65; nor is the other applicant included therein. The fact of her great age, and that she cannot read or write, and that she cannot speak English, do not show any want of understanding within the statute. It is true, they may render it difficult for her to perform some of her duties properly, yet they do not render it impossible. In the case of Coupe v. Lowerre, 1 Barb. Ch. 45, it was held by the court of chancery of New York, in construing a similar statute, that the surrogate had no discretion to exclude a person declared by the statute to be entitled to a preference, except for some of the causes specified in the statute; and it was held that no degree of legal or moral guilt or delinquency was sufficient to exclude a person from the administration as the next of kin in the cases of preference given by the statute, unless such person had been actually convicted of an infamous crime. In that case the administration was granted to a person proved to be dishonest, and against whom a large judgment had been recovered in a case of crim. con. * * * We therefore hold that, under the admissions and evidence of this case, the daughter, Rosa Pacheco de Sibrían, was entitled to letters of administration." The decision in the case of Coupe v. Lowerre, supra, will be better understood when it is stated that in that case objection was made to the appointment of the petitioner as administrator of the estate of his father upon the ground "that he was disqualified on account of his vices and his improvidence," and the statute of New York provided, among other cases of disqualification, conviction of an infamous crime and improvidence, and it was with reference to that particular statute that the court in that case said: "No degree of legal or moral guilt or delinquency, therefore, is sufficient to exclude a person from the administration as the next of kin, in the cases of preference given by the statute, unless such person has been actually convicted of an infamous crime." The principle underlying that decision and the cases which have followed it is that the courts have no right to add to the disqualifications prescribed by the legislature for such cases. In some of the states the courts are by law given a wide discretion in determining who are qualified to act in the capacity of executors and administrators. The decision in the case of Stearns v. Fliske, 18 Pick. 24, cited and relied on by respondent, was based upon a statute which authorized the court to deny the application of a person "evidently unsuitable" to discharge the duties of the trust, and it was held that this language vested a wide discretion in the probate judge. We feel entirely satisfied that the words "want of integrity," found in section 1850 of the Code of Civil Procedure, do not apply to a case where there is a simple conflict of interest in regard to the estate between the executor named in the will and the other legatees. We are also satisfied that, if the legislature had designed to make such a conflict of interest a cause for refusing to appoint an executor so named, such intention would have been manifested by language more apt for that purpose than is to be found in that section of the Code of Civil Procedure. We may add that, while the court is authorized to refuse to appoint an executor named in a will for want of integrity, yet for manifest reasons this power should not be exercised except upon clear and convincing evidence establishing such disqualifying fact. The executor may always be removed after appointment, unless he discharges the duty of his trust faithfully, and as directed by law.

3. The order denying the appellant's motion for a new trial in this proceeding is an appealable one. Order reversed.

HYDE V. MANGAN et ux. (No. 13,767.)

EJECTMENT—DEFENSES—EQUITABLE TITLE.

Defendants, who were in possession of land under a contract to purchase, assigned the contract as security for a debt. The assignee assigned to plaintiff, who, with full knowledge of defendants' right, made payment to the vendor of the full purchase money, surrendered the contract, and received a deed for the land. He then brought ejectment. There was no evidence that defendants were in default under the contract. Held, that their equitable title should prevail over plaintiff's legal title, and he cannot recover.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge. Justin Jacobs, for appellant. Lambertson & Taylor, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action of ejectment, the complaint being in the usual form. The answer makes a general denial, and then alleges certain facts in the nature of a special defense. Judgment went for the defendants in the lower court, and the case is before us for consideration upon an appeal from the judgment and from the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The following are substantially the findings of the court, and they are supported both by the allegations of defendants' special defense, and by the evidence: That upon the 20th day of October, 1879, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company was the owner of a certain tract of land situated in Tulare and Fresno counties, and at said time Mary A. Mangan, who was the wife of J. M. Mangan, entered into a written contract with said company, whereby said company contracted to sell to her said real property for an agreed price; and said Mary A. Mangan at that time, from her separate property, paid a portion of said purchase price, and agreed to pay the balance on or before the 20th day of October, 1884, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum; and upon the payment of said purchase price and interest said company agreed to execute and deliver to her a deed in fee of said premises. That upon the execution of said agreement the defendants entered into the possession of said property, and ever since said time have been in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession and occupancy thereof, having valuable improvements thereon, and claiming to own the same; and the plaintiff, prior to his purchase, never made any inquiry from them, or either of them, as to their rights or claims in and to the premises. That about the 18th day of September, 1883, defendant Mary A. Mangan assigned her interest in and to the foregoing contract of sale to one Brownstone, to secure a promissory note given by defendant J. M. Mangan to said Brownstone; and said assignment was made with the understanding that said contract should be reassigned to her when said note and interest were paid. That said note was subsequently surrendered to J. M. Mangan, and he gave a new note to Brownstone for a larger amount, (including the amount of the first note,) without the consent or knowledge of Mary A. Mangan, and no part of said note has been paid. That upon the 22d day of November, 1883, Brownstone assigned an undivided one-half interest in said contract to B. Schwartz, and upon February 25, 1888, Brownstone and Schwartz assigned said contract to one Erlanger, who had actual knowledge of the claims and rights of defendants in and to said land. That upon the 7th day of March, 1888, Erlanger assigned said contract to plaintiff, who, upon the 14th day of March, 1888, made full payment to said railroad company for said land, surrendered said contract, and received a deed therefor. The court further found that the assignment of the contract of sale to Brownstone was a mortgage of defendants' interest in the land, and that the possession of defendants was sufficient to put plaintiff on inquiry as to their rights; and, having failed to make such inquiry, he is in no better position than if he had done so, and had been fully informed as to the defendants' claims and equities. The assignment of the contract by Mary A. Mangan was as follows: "I, Mary A. Mangan, the within-named purchaser, for and in consideration of the sum of six hundred dollars to me in hand paid, do hereby sell, assign, and transfer all my right, title, interest, and claim in and to the within-described tract or parcel of land, and the within contract No. 759, unto D. Brownstone, his heirs and assigns forever, subject to the stipulations and conditions therein contained, which are to be performed by said D. Brownstone, the assignee. MARY A. MANGAN. September 18, 1883."

Appellant relies upon two main propositions in this case, either of which, if maintained, he claims would entitle him to recover: First. That he is the owner and holder of the legal title to the premises, and in an action of ejectment the legal title must control. Second. If the assignment of the contract were to be held to be a mortgage, the debt for which it was given being barred, defendants are entitled to no consideration without offering to redeem. The first proposition, that "in an action of ejectment the legal title must control," is not the law of this state. The case of Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 615, decides: "A mere equitable title to land, if it is of such a character as entitles the holder to possession in equity, is a sufficient defense, under our system of practice, to an action for the possession, brought even by the holder of the legal title." Railroad Co. v. Mudd, 59 Cal. 585; Whittier v. Stege, 61 Cal. 238; Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 17. As to the second proposition contended for by appellant, there is a line of authorities which supports such contention. Hughes v. Davis, 40 Cal. 120; Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 352; Pico v. Gallardo, 52 Cal. 206. This proposition of law, as laid down in the cases just cited, is based upon another principle of law, established for the first time in this state in Hughes v. Davis, supra, and which has since been discarded by section 2925 of the Civil Code. This principle, as announced by the court, was "that an absolute deed, which is shown by parol evidence to have been intended as a mortgage, conveys the legal title to the property." And our attention has not been directed to any authority since this principle ceased to be the law of this state, which has held to the doctrine laid down in those cases; but, upon the contrary, the later decisions of this court hold that under the general issue the defendant may be allowed to show that the deed by which the plaintiff claims title is a mortgage, and therefore gives him no title. In the case of Healy v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 519, 6 Pac. Rep. 386, the language of the opinion is: "But when the court found that the deed was given only as security for money loaned, it found, in effect, that it was but a mortgage, and did not pass the legal title to plaintiff. If, therefore, defendants had rested only on their denial of plaintiff's alleged ownership of the property, judgment must have passed for the defendants." In the case of Smith v. Smith, 80 Cal. 329, 21 Pac. Rep. 4, and 22 Pac. Rep. 186, 549, the court says: "The plaintiff contends that his motion to proceed first with the trial of the affirmative defense set up by the answer should have been granted for the reason that it was an equitable defense, and that the whole judgment should have been reversed upon this ground. The affirmative defense was, in substance, that the deed of 1876 was a mortgage, and that the debt secured thereby had been fully paid. But the allegation that the deed was a mortgage was merely another way of saying that the plaintiff had no title, which was fully covered by the denial of plaintiff's ownership. And so far as the plaintiff's right of possession was concerned, it was immaterial whether the debt had been paid or not. And while it may be possible that if the defendant had a title he would have been entitled to some affirmative relief in the nature of the removal of a cloud, yet he did not ask for such relief in terms, and no affirmative relief of any kind was awarded to him by the judgment." See Roberts v. Columbet, 63 Cal. 25.

In the case at bar the defendants have not relied upon the general issue simply, but by a special defense—not seeking any affirmative relief—have attacked the title of plaintiff, and set out a history of their own title and right of possession. This special defense counsel for the plaintiff did not see fit to attack in the lower court; and, indeed, it cannot be discerned upon what grounds an attack could have been successfully made. The plaintiff came in to court in this action with full notice of all the rights and equities existing between the railroad company and the defendants, and between Brownstone and his assignees and the defendants; for the defendants were in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession of this land at all these times, and plaintiff made no inquiry to ascertain the rights or claims of defendants; and he is in no better position, and no more entitled to be regarded as a purchaser in good faith, than if he had so inquired, and ascertained the real facts of the case. Pell v. McElroy, 38 Cal. 268; Bank v. Baker, 82 Cal. 114, 22 Pac. Rep. 1087; Scheerer v. Cuddy, 85 Cal. 273, 24 Pac. Rep. 713. Neither could the plaintiff be recognized as a bona fide purchaser from his assignor, Erlanger, upon the additional ground that in the sale of equitable interests the principle of bona fide purchasers has no standing. Taylor v. Weston, 77 Cal. 534, 20 Pac. Rep. 62. The transfer of Mary A. Mangan's interest in the land (by the assignment of the contract to Brownstone) being a mortgage, Brownstone took no title; and his assignment to Erlanger, who assigned to plaintiff, gave the plaintiff no title, for, as we have already seen, he is deemed to have had notice of the character of the original assignment. The plaintiff does not even occupy the position of Brownstone, for he has an assignment of the security without the transfer of the indebtedness. The debt and security are inseparable; the mortgage alone is not a subject of transfer. Section 2936, Civil Code; Peters v. Bridge Co., 5 Cal. 334; Nagle v. Macy, 9 Cal. 426. Conceding that under the assignment of Mary A. Mangan to Brownstone she authorized him to procure from the railroad company the legal title, yet it is a matter of very serious doubt whether under the assignment Brownstone had the right to delegate that power to another; but that is a question unnecessary to decide. If we regard the plaintiff as the assignee of the railroad company, he then purchased the legal title, subject to the equitable title of the defendants under the contract, and his legal rights in maintaining this action are identical with those of his assignor; and, under the facts as disclosed by the record in this case, the railroad company could not prevail in this action. The record discloses that the defendants went in to possession under the contract, paid a portion of the purchase price, paid the taxes and annual installments of interest for years. The plaintiff, before suit, made no demand for possession. There is no proof in the case of any special facts tending to show either an active or constructive ouster of the plaintiff; nor is there any evidence tending to show a demand and refusal to pay the purchase price, or any installment of interest after it became due, or that the railroad company had not given the defendants additional time in which to make the final payment, or that the defendants had abandoned the purchase, or refused to complete it according to the terms of the contract. There is nothing to indicate that the defendants were in default in the performance of the contract; and, being rightfully in possession under their equitable title, they could not be disturbed, even by the holder of the legal title. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

STATE ex rel. CONGDON v. SECOND JUDICIAL DISTRICT COURT.

CONTINUANCE—POWER TO IMPOSE COSTS.

Civil Code Mont. § 253, authorizes a continuance on account of absence of material testimony, when the adverse party refuses to admit that such testimony would be given; and that "upon terms" the court may, in its discretion, postpone a trial upon other grounds than the absence of evidence. Section 508 authorizes the courts to impose costs as a condition of granting a continuance. Held, that costs may be imposed as a condition of a continuance for absence of evidence.

Certiorari.

This is a writ of certiorari brought to review two orders of the second judicial district court, made in the case of Charles O'Donnell v. Nelson Bennett et al., pending in that court. That case came on for hearing December 18, 1890. The defendants moved for a continuance, upon the ground of the absence of evidence. The motion was made upon an affidavit of E. E. Congdon, agent of defendants, setting forth what we may here consider material testimony expected to be obtained by the evidence of one Bocarde, an absent witness, and showing the diligence used to procure his attendance. The plaintiff admitted that the showing of diligence was sufficient, and declined to admit that the witness, if present, would testify to the matters set forth. The court continued the case until the next call of the docket, at the costs of the defendants. This appears from the bill of exceptions certified by the district court in obedience to the writ of certiorari. The bill of exceptions further recites as follows: "That thereupon the defendants, by their said attorneys, stated to the court that they declined to pay such costs, and would proceed to trial with such evidence as they had, but would not withdraw their motion for a continuance; but the court ordered that the said cause be continued until the next call of the civil calendar for setting causes for trial, at the cost of defendants." It further appears by the certified record that plaintiff filed his bill of costs. No exception was made thereto by defendants, nor was a motion made to retax the costs. Thereafter, on the plaintiff's application, the court ordered execution to issue for the collection of the costs, which was done. Thereupon the defendants, by said Congdon, as agent, sued out this writ of certiorari to the district court. Relators claim that the district court exceeded its jurisdiction in two respects: (1) In imposing the costs upon the continuance; (2) in ordering execution for the collection of said costs. The statutes to be construed are as follows, all from Code Civil Proc.: "Sec. 253. A motion to postpone a trial on the grounds of the absence of evidence shall only be made upon affidavit showing the materiality of the evidence expected to be obtained, and that due diligence has been used to procure it. The court may also require the moving party to state upon affidavit the evidence which he expects to obtain, and if the adverse party thereupon admit that such evidence would be given, and that it be considered as actually given upon the trial, or offered and overruled as improper, the trial shall not be postponed; and, upon terms, the court may, in its discretion, upon good cause shown, and in furtherance of justice, postpone a trial or proceeding upon other grounds than the absence of evidence." "Sec. 503. When an application is made to a court or referee to postpone a trial, the payment of the costs occasioned by the postponement may be imposed in the discretion of the court or referee, as a condition of granting the same." "Sec. 486. Whenever an order for the payment of a sum of money is made by a court, pursuant to the provisions of this Code, it may be enforced by execution in the same manner as if it were a judgment."

F. T. McBride, for petitioner. Chas. O'Donnell, for respondent.

DE WITT, J., (after stating the facts as above.) We have recently (State v. District Judge, this term, 25 Pac. Rep. 1053) so fully defined our views of the province of the writ of certiorari that we will now do no more than inquire whether the district court exceeded its jurisdiction in making the two orders complained of. The greater portion of relators' argument is made upon the alleged ground that they offered to proceed with the trial, but were not allowed to do so by the court. Indeed, the record does show that they offered to proceed with the trial. But the record also discloses that they moved for a continuance, and that the continuance had been granted at their costs. Relators argue that they rejected the terms imposed by the court, and that the trial, upon their offer to go on, should have proceeded, and the court had no authority to continue the case, and tax the costs against them. How they could reject an order of the court does not appear. Perhaps they could have declined to accept a continuance on the terms imposed, and have done this by withdrawing their motion for a continuance. They did not ask, or offer that the order for the continuance should be vacated, which must necessarily have been done if the trial was to be had. They expressly stated that they would not withdraw their motion for a continuance. They placed themselves in the peculiar position of, at the same time, demanding a continuance and offering to try the case. As to the motives of counsel in this action nothing appears, nor does it seem to concern this court. But, however proper the motives, the fact is plain upon the record that their attitude towards the court was equivocal. How was the district court to know of what mind the counsel were when they demanded two things, absolutely inconsistent, in the same breath? It is no answer to say that counsel were endeavoring to preserve their rights. If the court had jurisdiction to impose costs, counsel must submit to the law. In that contingency they could have paid the costs and had their continuance, or they could have asked to have the order for the continuance vacated, and, if done, could have saved the payment of the costs. On the other hand, if the court had not jurisdiction to impose the costs, counsel had the remedy which they are now invoking. The district court could not have done other than it did; that is, take the word of counsel as expressed by the solemnity of their motion of record, and disregard their utterances contradicting their motion.

This matter seems very plain to my mind, so much so that noticing it may seem superfluous. But counsel have pressed it upon our consideration, and it is perhaps fair to meet the argument contended for at the bar. Suffice it to say that we know of no principle of law or rule of practice by which it may be demanded from a court, as was demanded from the district court in this case, and even here insisted upon, that it do both of two things at once, the performance of one of which is the non-performance of the other, and then complain that the court has done the one demanded by a formal motion. Hughes v. Investment Co., 11 Sawy. 561, 26 Fed. Rep. 831, and cases cited; Newell v. Meyendorff, 9 Mont. 262, 23 Pac. Rep. 333.

I am of opinion that the granting of the continuance was proper and unavoidable, and will inquire whether the court had jurisdiction to impose the costs as it did. If section 253 stood alone, relators might have some reasons for their contention. The section first provides for a continuance on the ground of the absence of evidence, and says nothing about the imposition of terms on a continuance granted for this reason. Then the section goes on, and says that the court may postpone the trial for grounds other than the absence of evidence, and may do so upon terms. The argument is left open by this section, that, having provided terms on a continuance for causes other than the absence of evidence, this, by implication, excludes the imposition of terms on a continuance granted by virtue of the absence of evidence. But the matter is made certain by section 503 part of the same Code, that, when a trial is postponed for any cause, the costs occasioned by the postponement may be imposed, in the discretion of the court. In section 253 we have a special provision covering one class of cases. In section 503 we find a general provision covering all classes, including that named in section 253. It is not a case of expressio unius, exclusio alterius; because, when we consider the two sections, it is not a fact that there is an expressio unius, and, consequently, there can be no exclusio alterius. The facts are quite the contrary. Section 503 is an expression of all, and hence an including of all, and the maxim becomes expressio omnium, inclusio omnium. The district court, therefore, had jurisdiction, under section 503, to impose costs as it did. No question of their amount or their retaxation is presented. The order imposing costs being made, the statute (section 486) allows an execution therefor. I advise that the writ be dismissed.

BLAKE, C. J., (concurring.) Sections 253, 503, supra, are parts of the same act, the Code of Civil Procedure, and should be construed together. When they are thus read, there is no repugnancy, and the court below had the power, in the exercise of its discretion, to impose costs upon the relators as a condition of granting the motion to postpone the trial of the action; and I concur in the judgment that the writ should be dismissed.

HARWOOD, J., (concurring.) The sole question to be considered in this case is whether the court exceeded its jurisdiction in assessing the costs involved by the continuance upon the party applying therefor. Counsel for relator admits that under the statute quoted, supra, the court has jurisdiction to impose such costs as a condition of granting continuance, except where the moving party is entitled, on his showing, to a continuance, on the ground of absence of evidence. His reasoning would apply with much force if section 253 was the only statute on the subject. But section 503 seems to apply to all cases of postponement, and especially provides that costs occasioned thereby may, in the discretion of the court, be imposed as a condition of granting the same. This section is general, and makes no distinction as to the grounds upon which continuance is granted. Relator contends that section 503 should be interpreted to relate only to the latter part of section 253, authorizing continuance to be granted on "other grounds than the absence of evidence." If that be done, section 503 becomes meaningless, and vain legislation, because section 253 provides that terms may be imposed upon granting a continuance on "grounds other than the absence of evidence." Such interpretation would give section 503 the effect of only reiterating what was already provided by section 253. We ought to interpret these statutes so that both will have an effect, if such interpretation is possible. Section 630, Code Civil Proc. I think the statute gives the court jurisdiction, in its discretion, to impose the costs involved by the continuance upon the party applying therefor, without reference to the ground for which continuance is granted. Such discretion might be exercised so as to work hardship or injustice upon a party who had endeavored with due diligence to prepare for trial, and had been prevented from maturing his preparation by circumstances beyond his control. In such cases, if abuse of the discretion appeared, it would undoubtedly be corrected. But in the case at bar we are to pass upon the question of jurisdiction only, and not whether it has been properly exercised. The application of said provisions of the statute being the only question involved in the case, and the only one presented by relators' brief, with these observations I concur in the order dismissing the writ.

CUNNINGHAM v. QUIRK.

NEW TRIAL—REDUCING VERDICT—ESTOPPEL.

1. In an action for conversion of household goods against a constable who sold them under execution, the verdict assessed plaintiff's damages at $196. Plaintiff testified that the furniture cost $226.90, had been in use four years, and was now worth $196. The purchaser stated that the goods "looked to be used up pretty well." The articles were sold separately at one bid for $72.25. Held, that it was not an abuse of discretion to require plaintiff to accept $185.60, and remit the excess, under the alternative of a new trial.

2. The statement "that this cause came on regularly to be heard * * * on defendant's motion for a new trial," in plaintiff's bill of exceptions, precludes him from setting up that defendant never made or filed a motion for new trial.

Appeal from district court, Lewis and Clarke county; WILLIAM H. HUNT, Judge. Kinsley & Knowles, for appellant. F. N. & S. H. McIntire, for respondent.

BLAKE, C. J. The appellant alleges in her complaint that she was the owner of and in possession of the following described property, to-wit: One carpet, bedstead, bureau, washstand, table, wire-spring mattress, lamp, chair, stove, and two pillows, and four shades, of the value of $196; that the same were taken and converted, July 15, 1889, by the respondent; and that she has suffered damages by the unlawful conversion. The answer sets forth substantially that James Kerwin recovered a judgment against the appellant in the sum of $101.25, and that the property was sold by said respondent, as a constable, under an execution in favor of said Kerwin. There is a denial that the property was of any greater value than $72.25, or that appellant suffered any damage. The jury returned a verdict for Mrs. Cunningham, and assessed her damages in the sum of $196. Quirk filed his notice of intention to move for a new trial upon several grounds, including the following: Excessive damages, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice; and insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The statement of the case on the motion for a new trial was settled and allowed, and thereafter the court made and entered this order: "That if plaintiff shall file, on or before August 5th proximo, a stipulation consenting to a judgment in her favor in the sum of one hundred and thirty-five and 60/100 dollars, and interest from July 9, 1889, at ten per cent. (10%) per annum, together with costs, and remitting all in excess of such sums, then judgment for such sums may be allowed to stand, and motion for new trial overruled; other wise, the defendant's motion for new trial will be granted." To this order Mrs. Cunningham excepted, and refused to file the stipulation above mentioned, and the motion for a new trial was granted.

The appellant relies upon the proposition that the issue as to the value of the property was for the exclusive determination of the jury, and that the court usurped their province in making the order supra. We will not compare the authorities upon this question, but accept the law which has been declared in the recent case of Kenyon v. Gilmer, 131 U. S. 22, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 696. Mr. Justice GRAY reviewed the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state, and said: "Under these statutes, as at common law, the court, upon the hearing of a motion for a new trial, may, in the exercise of its judicial discretion, either absolutely deny the motion, or grant a new trial generally, or it may order that a new trial be had, unless the plaintiff elects to remit a certain part of the verdict, and that, if he does so remit, judgment be entered for the rest." There may have been sufficient evidence to justify the verdict, and the court might refuse to grant a new trial for this cause, and at the same time set aside the verdict upon the ground that the damages were excessive, and given under the influence of passion or prejudice. But the appellant had the option of remitting the excess, and thereupon a judgment would have been entered for her for the residue. Did the court abuse its discretion in disturbing the verdict? The testimony relates to one element of damages,—the value of the property. Mrs. Cunningham testified that the furniture cost $228.90, and that it was worth $196; that it had been in use four years; and that she had a husband and children. The number of the latter is not given,—but there were three or more, according to the testimony. Mr. Quirk testified that every article was sold separately, and that there was only one bid, and that the value was $72.25. Mr. Lommi testified that he kept a second-hand store, and that "a set of furniture may be used two years, and not be damaged ten dollars, and may be used two years and not be worth one-third of its original value." Mr. Kerwin testified that the furniture when sold by the constable "looked to be used up pretty well;" that he was the buyer, and paid therefor $72.25; and that he supposed he could not dispose of the property for half of his bid. This is the substance of the evidence which appears in the record upon this point, and we cannot perceive any error in the ruling of the court thereon.

The counsel for the appellant claims that no motion for a new trial was ever made or filed. We find in the transcript this statement in "plaintiff's bill of exceptions, filed July 31, 1890," which is binding upon the appellant: "Be it known that this cause came on regularly to be heard this 31st day of July, 1890, on defendant's motion for a new trial herein." It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the order and judgment be affirmed, with costs.

In re MCFARLAND'S ESTATE.

APPEALS — PROBATE MATTERS — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Prob. Prac. Act Mont. §§ 324, 325, passed by the territorial legislature, which provided for appeals directly from the probate court to the territorial supreme court, are void, as being in conflict with Rev. St. U. S. §§ 1869, 1882, which limited the appellate jurisdiction of the territorial supreme court to appeals from the district court, and which gave the district court jurisdiction of appeals from the probate court; and therefore these two sections of the probate practice act did not become laws of the state by virtue of Const. Schedule, § 1, which adopts, as laws of the state, the laws of the territory "in force" on its admission into the Union.

2. The provisions of Civil Code Mont. § 421, subd. 2, and section 444, which regulate appeals from judgments of the district court rendered on appeal from inferior courts, and which limit the time of appeal to 90 days, do not now apply to appeals from the district court in probate matters, as Const. Mont. art. 3, § 11, abolished the probate courts, and extended the original jurisdiction of the district court to matters of probate; and appeals from the district court to the supreme court, in probate matters, are now to be taken under section 421, subd. 1, which regulates appeals from final judgments in actions commenced in the court in which they are rendered, and which limits the time of taking the appeal to one year from the rendition of the judgment.

3. A decree of distribution by the district court in a probate proceeding pending before it is a "final judgment," within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. Mont. § 421, subd. 1, which provides that an appeal from a "final judgment" in an action or proceeding commenced in the court in which it is rendered may be taken within one year from the rendition of the judgment.

Appeal from district court, Deer Lodge county; D. M. DUFFEE, Judge.

Forbis & Forbis, for appellants. Thompson Campbell and Robinson & Stapleton, for respondents.

HARWOOD, J. The appeal herein is prosecuted on behalf of Hannah De Long, and for other persons claiming to be heirs at law of Elizabeth McFarland, deceased. Appeal is taken "from an order or decree" of the district court of the third judicial district, directing the distribution of the estate of deceased to Wilbur N. Aylesworth, and to the estate of David H. McFarland, deceased. It appears by the record that said order or decree of distribution was made and entered February 8, 1890, and that appeal therefrom was taken January 20, 1891. Said distributees named in said order now appear by counsel, and move the dismissal of said appeal, on the ground that the same was not taken within the time required by law in such cases.

It is contended in support of the motion that the time for taking an appeal in the matter here involved is limited to 60 days, under the provisions of sections 324 and 325, Prob. Prac. Act. On the other hand, counsel for appellants contend, in opposition to said motion, that under the new system of judiciary, and the jurisdiction thereof, established by the constitution, an appeal in the matter at bar should be taken under the provisions of chapters 1, 2, tit. 11, Code Civil Proc.; and that the time within which the same must be taken is prescribed by subdivision 1, § 421, Code Civil Proc., and is limited to one year in case the appeal is from the judgment. It is further contended by appellants' counsel that sections 324, 325, Prob. Prac. Act, in so far as the same provides for an appeal directly from certain orders and decrees of the probate court to the supreme court, are null and void, and have no force as statutes of this state, for the reason that when enacted, in 1887, the provisions thereof were contrary to the laws of the United States organizing the territory of Montana, and applying thereto; and hence, being invalid as laws of the territory, the same did not become laws of the state of Montana by virtue of the constitutional provision that "all laws enacted by the legislative assembly of the territory of Montana, and in force at the time the state shall be admitted into the Union, and not inconsistent with this constitution, or the constitution or laws of the United States of America, shall be and remain in full force as the laws of the state, until altered or repealed, or until they expire by their own limitations. Const. Schedule, § 1. This motion raises questions of much interest and importance, and fraught with some difficulty in the solution thereof. If sections 324, 325, Prob. Prac. Act, are in force as statutes of this state, the provisions thereof sustain the propositions asserted in favor of the motion before us, and this appeal should be dismissed. If, however, for any cause of invalidity, said sections were not in force as statutes of the territory, the same cannot be statutes of the state; because the enabling act of congress (section 24) and our constitution (Schedule, § 1) both provide that the laws of the territory in force at the time the state should be admitted into the Union, and not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States, or our state constitution, should remain in force, as the laws of the state, until otherwise provided. We therefore address our inquiry at once to the question of the validity of said sections 324 and 325 of the probate practice act. Said sections, providing for an appeal directly from the probate to the supreme court, were passed subject to the organic law governing the territory of Montana in 1887, and were valid or null, by virtue of that law. The organic act of the territory of Montana (section 9) provides "that the judicial power of said territory shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and in justices of the peace. * * * The jurisdiction of the several courts herein provided for, both appellate and original, and that of probate courts, and of justices of the peace, shall be limited by law." Again, section 1866, Rev. St. U. S., provides: "The jurisdiction, both appellate and original, of the courts provided for in section 1907 and 1908 shall be limited by law." Section 1907 provides: "The judicial power in * * * Montana shall be vested in a supreme court, district courts, probate courts, and justices of the peace." Section 1932, Rev. St. U. S., provides: "The probate courts of the territory of Montana, in their respective counties, in addition to their probate jurisdiction, are authorized to hear and determine civil causes wherein the damage or debt claimed does not exceed five hundred dollars, and such criminal cases arising under the laws of the territory as do not require the intervention of a grand jury; but they shall not have jurisdiction of any matter in controversy when the title or right to the peaceable possession of land may be in dispute, or of chancery or divorce causes; and in all cases an appeal may be taken from any order, judgment, or decree of the probate courts to the district courts." Section 1869, Rev. St. U. S., defines the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court of the territory of Montana as follows: "Writs of error, bills of exception, and appeals shall be allowed, in all cases, from the final decisions of the district courts to the supreme court of all the territories respectively, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law."

We think it is palpable, without argument, that where the organic law provided that the jurisdiction of the courts of the territory, both appellate and original, shall be limited by law, and that, "in all cases," appeals to the district courts should lie "from any order, judgment, or decree of the probate courts;" and, further, that the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court should be of appeals "from final decisions of the district courts,"—a law passed by the legislative assembly, governed by such fundamental provisions, directing the course of appeals otherwise, is void and of no effect, in so far as it prescribes such other course of appeals. This conclusion would be reached by applying either of two familiar maxims,—expressio unius est exclusio alterius; or, expressum facit cessare tacitum. Co. Litt. 210a; Broom, Leg. Max. 226. These maxims are applicable to the interpretation of statutes which expressly prescribe the method to be pursued, or the conditions governing the subject; for it is the common understanding that the expression of such method or conditions manifests an intention to exclude all that might otherwise be implied, unless the contrary intention clearly appears in the instrument. It should be remembered that the provisions of section 324, Prob. Prac. Act, for an appeal from the probate to the supreme court, as found in the present volume of Compiled Statutes, is not found in the Revised Statutes of 1879, preceding the present volume. The same section, as found in the Revised Statutes of 1879, provides that such appeal should be taken from the probate to the district court, and conformed to the provisions of the organic law above reviewed. An inspection of the original act, which became the present volume of Compiled Statutes, will show that the change crept into the statute, not by design on the part of the compiler, but by inadvertently compiling that portion of the act from a publication which did not contain a correct print of the statute as it then, and had for a long time, existed. The statutes comprised in said sections 324, 325, Prob. Prac. Act, are not the only statutes providing for appeals from the orders, judgments, and decrees of the probate courts. Chapter 3, tit. 11, p. 180, Comp. St., is entirely devoted to the subject of appeals from the probate to the district courts; and the same orders and decrees in probate matters are there made appealable to the district courts, which, by section 324 of the probate practice act, are made appealable directly from the probate to the supreme court. It is further provided in section 699, Code Civil Proc., that "the jurisdiction of the district court shall be original and appellate." Section 701, Code Civil Proc., provides that "the appellate jurisdiction of these [district] courts shall extend to hearing upon appeal an order or judgment of a probate court or justice of the peace, in the cases provided by law." Section 697, Code Civil Proc., provides: "The supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases tried in the district courts." Under the territorial system, a party feeling aggrieved by the decision of the probate court, in a matter like that in the case at bar, could carry the question ultimately to the supreme court. But such question had to come to the supreme court by appeal from the final determination thereof in the district court. The jurisdiction and practice of the district court, in such cases, as well as the manner of appealing from the final determination by that court to the supreme court, is ably elucidated by Chief Justice WARD in Broadwater v. Richards, 4 Mont. 52, 80, 2 Pac. Rep. 544, 546.

The foregoing inquiry into the conditions which governed the practice under the old system concerns the question before us, not only in order to find whether or not sections 324, 325, Prob. Prac. Act, are valid statutes of the state, by virtue of having been valid statutes of the territory, but also as shedding some light upon the practice to be pursued in the appeal from judgments, orders, and decrees of the district courts, in probate matters, under the new conditions inaugurated by the adoption of our state constitution. It cannot yet be said, in respect to our system of laws: "Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." While we have a new judiciary, established by the constitution, wherein there is no probate court, as a distinct member of that system, we have the old body of statute laws, which was modeled to apply to the territorial system, in which there was a distinct probate court, which statutes are still in force as state laws, in so far as the same are not inconsistent with the constitution. Const. Schedule, § 1. By a provision of the constitution, the original jurisdiction of the district courts thereby established is extended over the whole field of "matters of probate." Const. art. 8, § 11. By this provision, "all matters of probate," and necessarily the administration of all laws relating thereto, are now under the original jurisdiction of the district courts. In order to make the statutes relating to probate matters and probate courts apply to the district courts under the new system, it is provided in the constitution (Schedule, § 4) that the term "probate," where it occurs in the statute in the combination "probate judge" or "probate court," is eliminated, and the term "district" is inserted in lieu thereof. What change has these provisions of the constitution wrought in reference to appeals to the supreme court in probate matters? We have seen how, under the old system, the probate matters enumerated in section 445, Code Civil Proc., were brought under the jurisdiction of the district court. When a party, feeling aggrieved by the final determination of the matter by that court, sought to appeal, he found in the organic law a provision that "writs of error, bills of exception, and appeals shall be allowed in all cases from the final decisions of the district courts to the supreme court, * * * under such regulations as may be prescribed by law." Section 1869, Rev. St. U. S. Turning to the statutes of the territory, he found in section 444, Code Civil Proc., a provision that "an appeal may be taken to the supreme court from the district courts in the following cases: First, from a final judgment, or any part thereof, entered in an action or special proceeding commenced in those courts, or brought into those courts from other courts." In section 421, Code Civil Proc., was found prescribed the time within which such appeal must be taken, in the following terms: "An appeal may be taken * * * from a judgment rendered on an appeal from an inferior court within ninety days after the entry of such judgment." He also found in the Code of Civil Procedure statutes prescribing the grounds upon which he could move for a new trial, and section 327, Prob. Prac. Act, directing that in probate proceedings either party "may move for a new trial upon the same grounds and errors, and in like manner, as provided in the civil practice act for civil actions." It is further provided in section 323, Prob. Prac. Act, that, "except as otherwise provided in this title, the provisions of the civil practice act * * * are applicable to and constitute the rules of practice in the proceedings mentioned in this title." This provision is comprehensive, and refers to proceedings in all matters of probate, in whatever court adjudicated. Now, under the new system, these provisions of the Compiled Statutes are all in force; with this modification as to "probate matters," these matters are now within the original jurisdiction of the district court. Const. art. 8, § 11. Proceedings in probate matters are commenced and determined in that court, and hence the provisions of sections 421 and 444, quoted supra, as to appeals from final judgment "rendered on an appeal from an inferior court," do not now apply to probate matters. Appeals to the supreme court from final judgments, orders, or decrees of the district courts,—that is, orders, decrees, or judgments which in their nature amount to a "final determination of the rights of the parties in the proceeding," (section 238, Code Civil Proc.,)—in the administration of the laws pertaining to probate matters, are now to be taken under the provisions relating to appeals "from a final judgment in an action or special proceeding commenced in the court in which the same is rendered," (section 421, Code Civil Proc.,) subject to all other provisions relating to motions for new trials, and the review of evidence on appeal, etc., if such relief is sought, (section 327, Prob. Prac. Act.)

It is objected that the term "judgment," as used in the Code of Civil Procedure, and especially as used in sections 421 and 444 thereof, was not intended by the framers of the Code to apply to or include an order or decree of the court exercising probate jurisdiction, directing the distribution of an estate, as in the case at bar; or granting letters testamentary or of administration, or refusing the same; or an order made upon the settlement of an executor or administrator or guardian, etc. What is a "judgment," in contemplation of our Code of Civil Procedure? It is not necessary to look beyond that instrument for a definition of the term. Section 238, Code Civil Proc., defines the term as follows: "A judgment is the final determination of the rights of parties in an action or proceeding." There is a large class of matters or subjects arising in the administration of probate matters, susceptible of final determination, by the court exercising probate jurisdiction, so far as concerns the action of that court; like the subject at bar,—an order or decree directing the distribution of the estate. This certainly comes under the head of a "proceeding," and the action of the court was a final determination of the rights of all parties claiming a right of succession to said estate or a part thereof. It is plain that the action of the court, by whatever term it may be designated, has all the elements of a "judgment," under the statutory definition. If the term "judgment" was not defined by the Code, it would be found that the general definition of the term includes in its scope an order like that in the case at bar. And. Law Dict. 576. It can be demonstrated by the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure that the term "judgment," as therein defined, was intended to include and apply to such orders or decrees in purely probate matters as that involved in the case at bar; and, further, that the general provisions of chapters 1, 2, tit. 11, Comp. St., were intended to provide for appeals to the supreme court from the "final determination of the rights of the parties" in proceedings pertaining to purely probate matters as well as formal litigation. The matters of probate susceptible of final determination by the court exercising jurisdiction over the same are grouped together in section 445, Code Civil Proc., such as: "Admitting a will to probate, or refusing the same;

setting apart property, or making an allowance to the widow or children; granting letters testamentary or of administration, or appointing a guardian, or refusing to grant such letters or make such appointment; or an order or decree by which a debt, claim, legacy, or distributive share is allowed, or payment thereof directed, or by which such allowance or direction is refused," etc. All the proceedings in purely probate matters there mentioned are made appealable from the probate to the district court. Section 445, Code Civil Proc. In referring generally to appeals from the probate court provided for in chapter 3, tit. 11, (Code Civil Proc.,) section 450 of that chapter provides that "the appeal shall be taken by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment appealed from is entered * * * a notice stating the appeal from the same." Here the term "judgment" is applied indiscriminately to the final determination of the rights of parties in matters purely probate, as well as to matters of formal litigation in the probate court. These matters of probate being appealed to the district court, all the original papers pertaining to the case, with a transcript of the docket, were by section 454, Code Civil Proc., directed to be transmitted to the district court. Section 457 of the same chapter provides "that all appeals taken by virtue of this act shall be tried in the district court upon the papers in the case, as if the same had originally been instituted in said court." The matters of probate thus appealed received the final determination of the district court. Now, section 444, Code Civil Proc., contains the provision that "an appeal may be taken to the supreme court from the district courts in the following cases: First, from a final judgment, or any part thereof, entered in an action or special proceeding commenced in those courts, or brought into those courts from other courts." Turning to section 421, Code Civil Proc., we find again the provision, among others, that "an appeal may be taken * * * from a judgment rendered on an appeal from an inferior court." These terms are general, comprehensive, and apply to judgments rendered by the district court in those cases which were in that court on appeal from an inferior court, without distinction between probate matters and matters of formal litigation; so that it is conclusive that the term "judgment," as used in sections 421, 444, Code Civil Proc., refers to the "final determination of the rights of parties" in all the matters of probate mentioned in section 445, appealable to the district court, as well as to matters of formal litigation.

Bearing in mind that the legal definition of the term "judgment" is "the final determination of the rights of parties in an action or proceeding," it will be interesting to notice a little further what terms the framers of our Codes employ in referring to matters purely probate. The term "proceedings" is used in the Probate Code as a general designation of the action and procedure whereby the law is administered upon the various subjects within the probate jurisdiction. Section 1, Prob.

Prac. Act. provides: "The proceedings of the probate courts shall be construed in the same manner and with like intents, as the proceedings of courts of general jurisdiction." Section 5, Id., provides that "the seal of the court need not be affixed to any proceedings therein, except," etc. Section 328, Id., provides that "at or before the hearing of petitions and contests for the probate of wills; for letters testamentary or of administration; for sales of real estate and confirmations thereof; settlements, partitions, and distributions of estates; setting apart homesteads; and all other proceedings where all the parties interested in the estate are required to be notified thereof,"—the court may appoint counsel to represent, "in all such proceedings," certain parties interested, who "are unrepresented." Where a contest may be raised and a final determination made by the court respecting any subject involved in the administration of an estate, the Probate Code terms the same a "proceeding," and directs the procedure therein to conform as nearly as the nature of the case will admit to the practice governing the formation and trial of issues in civil actions, and expressly declares that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure "are applicable to and constitute the rules of practice in the proceedings mentioned in" the Probate Code, except as otherwise provided therein. Sections 20-22, 164-166, 287, 323, 326-330, Prob. Prac. Act. The terms "cases," "cause," and "judgment" are likewise applied by the Code of Civil Procedure to proceedings of distinct inquiry and determination by the court in matters of probate as well as to matters of formal litigation. Sections 445, 450, 454, 457, Code Civil Proc. A careful study of the Code will reveal the fact that the term "case" and "proceeding" is used in a much broader and less technical sense than the term "action." Section 697, Code Civil Proc., provides: "The supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all cases tried in the district courts." This statute is no less in force now than under the territorial system, for it is in entire harmony with section 15, art. 8, of the constitution, which provides: "Writs of error and appeals shall be allowed from the decisions of the district courts to the supreme court under such regulations as may be prescribed by law." The district courts now have original jurisdiction of "all matters of probate." Const. art. 8, § 11. We think the final determination by those courts of cases in the probate department of their jurisdiction, susceptible of final determination, such as are enumerated in section 445, Code Civil Proc., ought still to be regarded as final judgments of the district courts, and, where appeal to the supreme court is sought, the same must now be taken under the regulations prescribed for appeals "from final judgment in an action or special proceeding commenced in the court in which the same is rendered." Code Civil Proc. cc. 1, 2, tit. 11. It is ordered that the motion to dismiss the appeal herein be, and the same is, overruled.

ATTACHMENTS—DISSOLUTION—PRACTICE—APPEAL.

1. Under Laws Wash. 1885-86, p. 45, §§ 81, 82, providing for dismissal of an attachment on motion to the court in which the action is brought, on the ground that it was improperly or irregularly issued, and that, if the motion is made on affidavits on defendant's part, plaintiff may oppose the same by affidavits or other evidence, the questions of fact raised by the motion are to be tried by the court, and, the attachment being merely ancillary to the action, a jury cannot be demanded.¹

2. A motion to discharge an attachment on the ground that the affidavit on which it was sued is insufficient on its face must explicitly point out the insufficiency.

3. An attachment may be discharged on motion and affidavits of only one of several defendants.

4. No appeal from an order of the superior court discharging an attachment lies to the supreme court under Laws Wash. 1890-90, pp. 333, 336, giving the right of such an appeal in "all actions and proceedings," etc., since an attachment is merely an ancillary proceeding.

Appeal from superior court, Pierce county.

Appellate & Titlow, for appellant. Doolittle, Pritchard & Stevens, for appellees.

ANDERS, C. J. This was an action by appellant against appellees, who were partners, upon an account for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered. Before judgment, plaintiff filed his affidavit and bond, and caused a writ of attachment to be issued and levied upon certain personal property alleged to have been fraudulently disposed of by defendants. The grounds for the issuance of the writ, as stated in the affidavit of the plaintiff, were—First, that the defendants had disposed of their property with intent to defraud, hinder, and delay their creditors; and, second, that the defendants were guilty of a fraud in contracting a certain portion of the indebtedness mentioned in the complaint. One of the defendants appeared in the action, and applied to the court upon motion, supported by his affidavit, to discharge the attachment upon two grounds: First, "that the affidavit in the said cause is insufficient upon its face;" and, second, "that the grounds for said attachment alleged in said affidavit are not true." The affidavit by the defendant in support of his motion, controverting the allegations contained in plaintiff's affidavit for attachment, was attacked by plaintiff for alleged insufficiency by motion to strike it from the files. The reasons assigned in the latter motion were that no facts were stated in said affidavit showing or tending to show that the attachment was improperly or irregularly issued, and that the facts therein set forth stated an issue triable by a jury, and which the plaintiff demanded to have so tried. The court overruled the motion to strike, and proceeded to hear the motion to discharge upon affidavits and counter-affidavits. This action of the court is relied on by appellant as sufficient ground for the reversal of the order discharging the attachment; but we think the court committed no error in this proceeding. It is true that the issues raised by the pleadings in an ordinary action at law must be tried by a jury unless a jury is waived; but an attachment proceeding is not an action, but only a proceeding ancillary to an action, and does not in any manner affect the main issues in the case. A motion to discharge an attachment is addressed to the consideration of the court or judge, and our statute does not contemplate the interposition of a jury to determine it, or to aid in its determination. The statute provides two methods by which an attachment may be discharged. One is by the defendant filing a bond, with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the officer having the attachment, or, after the return thereof, by the clerk, to the effect that he will perform the judgment of the court; and the other is by an application on motion, upon reasonable notice to the plaintiff, to the court in which the action is brought, or to the judge thereof, that the writ of attachment be discharged on the ground that the same was improperly or irregularly issued. Laws 1885-86, p. 45, §§ 29, 31. And it is further provided that "if the motion be made upon affidavits upon the part of the defendant, but not otherwise, the plaintiff may oppose the same by affidavits or other evidence in addition to those on which the attachment was issued." Id. § 32. The latter provision of the statute was followed in this instance by the court below; and this practice was approved by this court in the case of Hanson v. Doherty, decided at its last session, and reported in 25 Pac. Rep. 297. We are satisfied with that decision, except the closing portion thereof, wherein it is stated that "we see no reason why the defendant may not set forth specifically in his notice and motion the fact showing wherein the attachment was improperly issued, and prove the same by the testimony of witnesses before the court." This is an inaccurate statement, and liable to mislead. When the motion to discharge is made upon affidavits, the plaintiff may oppose the same by affidavits or oral testimony; but the defendant has no right, in the first instance, to introduce any testimony other than affidavits in support of his motion. The practice of hearing motions to dissolve attachments by the court without a jury upon affidavits and counter-affidavits or other evidence obtains in many of the states. See Holland v. White, 120 Pa. St. 228, 13 Atl. Rep. 782, 783; Grimes v. Farrington, 19 Neb. 44, 26 N. W. Rep. 618;

Genesee Co. Sav. Bank v. Michigan Barge Co., 52 Mich. 164, 17 N. W. Rep. 790, and 18 N. W. Rep. 206; Hardesty v. Campbell, 29 Md. 533; Baer v. Otto, 34 Ohio St. 11; Drake, Attachm. (6th Ed.) §§ 401-403.

It is insisted by appellant that that part of defendant's motion based on the ground "that the said affidavit in the said cause is insufficient upon its face" states no fact, and that it is but a conclusion; and we think the view of counsel in that particular is correct, and, if that had been the only ground of the motion, it would have been manifestly insufficient. The insufficiency of plaintiff's affidavit should have been distinctly and explicitly pointed out, so as to have enabled him to avail himself of the right of curing by amendment any defects appearing in his affidavit or bond. Appellant further contends that, even if it be conceded that the court below did not err in hearing the motion to discharge the attachment upon affidavits, still the proof shows that the attachment ought to have been sustained. But, conceding that the transcript contains all the testimony, we nevertheless cannot say that the ruling of the court was not warranted by the evidence. Appellant also contends that in no event should the attachment have been dissolved upon the motion and affidavit of but one of the defendants. The practice, however, is sanctioned by authority, and we see no reason for holding to the contrary. See Drake, Attachm. (6th Ed.) § 53; Holland v. White, supra.

But there is a jurisdictional question involved in this controversy, which, though not raised by counsel in this proceeding, ought to be considered. It is whether the order appealed from can be reviewed by this court, and a negative answer will be decisive of this appeal. Our statute for the removal of causes from the superior to the supreme court, as amended March 22, 1890, provides that an appeal may be taken to the supreme court from the superior courts "in all actions and proceedings," with certain exceptions and limitations, not pertinent to the question now before us. See Laws 1889-90, pp. 333, 336. And we are of the opinion that the word "proceedings," in contradistinction to "actions," must be taken to include not the orders of the court in matters arising in the progress of the action, or merely incident or ancillary thereto, but only those matters outside of ordinary actions, and commonly known as "special proceedings." We cannot think that the constitution of the state, which is in substantially the same language as to appeals as the statute, contemplates the review by this court (at least without express legislation) before final judgment of orders discharging or sustaining attachments, or of any other orders not affecting the merits of the action. The supreme court of California, having before it an appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment, says: "The attachment is merely a proceeding ancillary to the action, by which a party is enabled to acquire a lien for the security of his demand by a levy made before, instead of after, the entry of judgment. This ancillary proceeding may be taken at the time of the commencement of the action or at any time afterwards. Neither the action nor the judgment, under our law, in any manner depends upon the attachment, although the attachment depends upon the judgment. The judgment in the case is precisely the same whether the attachment is dissolved or not. In those states where the attachment is used as a process for acquiring jurisdiction, the consequences of dissolving or refusing to dissolve an attachment might be different." Allender v. Fritts, 24 Cal. 447. The appeal in that case was dismissed on the ground that it was not warranted by the statute, and we think the language used by the court is peculiarly applicable to the case now before us. We are aware that appeals from orders discharging or sustaining attachments are provided for by statute in some of the states; and it may be said that our statute is broad enough to cover such cases. Our reply is: It is broad enough, but too indefinite. Taken in a literal sense, it would permit an appeal from any and every interlocutory order and decision made in the progress of an action. Ordinarily speaking, every step taken in an action is a proceeding; and, if every proceeding were appealable, then this court might be compelled to sit in judgment upon the ruling of the lower court in changing the place of trial of an action, or in overruling a demurrer. We do not believe the legislature intended that the word should be understood in any such sense. But we do believe that the court should not depart from the well-known and established principles of the common law, and permit a cause to be brought before it by piecemeal for review, unless clearly authorized so to do by legislative enactment. It is true, we entertained a similar appeal in the case of Hanson v. Doherty, above mentioned; but in that case the question of jurisdiction, not having been raised or considered, was not passed upon by the court. The order of the court below not being reviewable by this court, the appeal must be dismissed at the cost of appellant.

APPEAL—ORDER OF ARREST IN CIVIL ACTIONS.

An order of arrest before final judgment in civil actions is not appealable, under Laws Wash. 1889-90, p. 836, § 1, providing that "an appeal may be taken from the superior courts in all actions and proceedings," except in certain cases, since such order is merely incident to the action. Scott, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Pierce county.

John C. Stallcup, for appellant. Marshall K. Snell, for appellees.

ANDERS, C. J. This was an action by appellees against appellant in the court below for the recovery of $168, upon an account for goods sold and delivered. The defendant in his answer denied owing the plaintiffs the amount claimed, but admitted an indebtedness of $115. At about the time the defendant's answer was filed the plaintiffs filed a bond and affidavits, and caused an order and warrant of arrest to issue, upon which the defendant was arrested, and held to bail in the sum of $300. The defendant moved the court to vacate the order of arrest, for the reasons, as alleged, that there was no law authorizing arrest and imprisonment in civil actions before judgment; that the proof upon which the order was issued was insufficient, and showed no pertinent facts; that the bond for arrest was defective; and that the allegations upon which the order was issued were untrue. The motion was denied by the court, and the defendant, before final judgment in the action, appealed to this court, and assigns the ruling of the court in granting the order of arrest, and in refusing to vacate the same, as error. Counsel for appellees move to dismiss the appeal upon two grounds: First, that the order from which the appeal is sought to be taken is not appealable, and the court is without jurisdiction; and, second, that the action in which said order was made is a civil action at law for the recovery of money, where the original amount in controversy does not exceed the sum of $200, and the action does not involve the legality of a tax, impost, assessment, toll, municipal fine, or the validity of a statute. Whether this court has jurisdiction to hear and determine the question now before it must depend upon the construction to be given to the statute in reference to appeals. The act of the legislature concerning the removal of causes from the superior courts to the supreme court, (as amended March 27, 1890,) ¹ following substantially the language of the state constitution, provides that "an appeal may be taken to the supreme court from the superior courts in all actions and proceedings, excepting that its appellate jurisdiction shall not extend to civil actions at law for the recovery of money or property, when the original amount in controversy or the value of the property does not exceed the sum of two hundred (200) dollars, unless the action involves the legality of a tax, impost, assessment, toll, municipal fine, or the validity of a statute." In the case of Windt v. Banniza, ante, 189, but recently decided by this court, and which was an appeal, before final judgment, from an order discharging an attachment, we had occasion to interpret the meaning of the word "proceedings," as used in the statutes; and we then held it did not embrace those proceedings merely incident to an action, and not affecting its merits, but only those known as special proceedings, as distinguished from ordinary actions at law. The appeal in that case was dismissed for want of jurisdiction in the court to review the alleged errors. And as it is evident that arrest and bail is a provisional remedy only, and not a special proceeding, and, like an attachment, merely ancillary to the action in which it is invoked, it follows that this appeal should likewise be dismissed. While it seems more harsh and oppressive to arrest an individual than to seize his property, still that is no sufficient reason, in the absence of more specific legislation upon the subject, for drawing a distinction as to the right of review by this court between orders denying or sustaining motions to dissolve attachments and those refusing to vacate orders of arrest. Our conclusion is in accordance with the view of the supreme court of Kansas, as announced in the case of Burch v. Adams, 20 Pac. Rep. 476, in which the precise question was before the court. See Allen v. Tyler, 32 N. J. Law, 499; Clasen v. Shotwell, 12 Johns. 31. If, as appellant alleges, there is no law authorizing arrests in civil actions in this state, and he has been illegally deprived of his liberty, he is not without the means of redress, but we can afford him no relief at this time. For the foregoing reasons the appeal must be dismissed, at the cost of appellant.

PUBLIC LANDS—PRE-EMPTION—FRAUD—CANCELLATION OF ENTRY AND CERTIFICATE.

1. The commissioner of the general land-office, on complaint of a stranger that one who has entered land under the pre-emption laws of the United States, and received a cash entry certificate and final receipt from the register and receiver of the district land-office, has not made his residence on the land, or improved it, as required by law, may suspend the entry, order the register and receiver to hear the charges, and, on their being established, may cancel the entry, under Act Cong. July 4, 1890, providing that the issuing of patents and the sale of public lands shall be under the supervision of such commissioner.

2. The holder of such cash entry receipt, while it is uncanceled, may maintain ejectment.

DUNBAR, J., dissenting.

Error to superior court, Pierce county.
Doolittle, Fritchard & Stevens, for plaintiff in error. Judson, Sharpstein & Sullivan, for defendant in error.

HOYT, J. Plaintiff in error filed his complaint in ejectment, and sought to recover possession of certain land therein described. Defendant in error answered, denying the allegations of the complaint, and alleging as an equitable defense facts substantially as follows: "On December 20, 1890, the plaintiff in error filed his declaratory statement for the premises in controversy under the pre-emption laws of the United States. On February 18, 1883, he made final proof to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the United States land-office at Olympia, and on March 12, 1883, his cash entry was allowed by the register and receiver, and a final receipt issued to him; that on August 7, 1883, and while the final proof of plaintiff in error was in the hands of the commissioner of the general land-office, the defendant in error filed with said commissioner his corroborated affidavit, in which he alleged that plaintiff in error had 'at no time established his residence on said land, and that he had failed to improve and cultivate the same as required by law, and that the said cash entry had been procured by fraud.' The commissioner on the 16th day of May, 1885, suspended the entry, and ordered a hearing to be had before the register and receiver, touching the charges made by defendant in error in said affidavits. On July 18, 1885, said hearing was had, at which plaintiff in error appeared with his witnesses, as did also the defendant in error. The evidence was taken, and after argument the register and receiver found that plaintiff in error 'at no time established his residence on the land embraced in his said cash entry; that he failed to cultivate and improve said land as required by law;' and they, therefore, advised that said cash entry be canceled. Plaintiff in error thereupon took an appeal from the decision of the register and receiver to the commissioner of the general land-office, and on June 3, 1886, the commissioner affirmed said decision, and ordered plaintiff in error's cash entry to be canceled. Again plaintiff in error took an appeal, this time to the secretary of the interior, and on March 31, 1888, the secretary affirmed the decision of the commissioner of the general land-office, and thereafter canceled said plaintiff's cash entry. Subsequently the defendant in error filed upon said premises embraced in said cash entry under the homestead laws of the United States, and thereafter made his final proof, and received from the register and receiver of the land-office his patent certificate for said premises." To this answer plaintiff in error filed a reply, in which he asserted that the proceedings of the land-office after the 12th day of March, 1883, the date on which his certificate was issued, "were wholly void, for the reason that said officers had no jurisdiction whatever over the said land or the plaintiff in error," and denied that the defendant in error, in the affidavit filed by him with the commissioner of the general land-office, alleged that the plaintiff in error failed to improve and cultivate said land as required by law, or that said entry of plaintiff in error had been procured by fraud. He further denied that the decision of the commissioner of the general land-office was affirmed by the secretary of the interior, except as to the findings of the register and receiver and commissioner that plaintiff in error had not made his residence upon said land. Defendant in error demurred to this reply, and the ruling of the court sustaining said demurrer is relied upon as cause for the reversal of the judgment rendered thereon.

Upon this record two questions have been argued: First. Had the court jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action? Second. Had the officers of the land department jurisdiction to cancel the entry of plaintiff in error?

The first proposition is so largely dependent on the latter that it is necessary only to say that, if the final receipt was in force and uncanceled, it would, under the laws of this state, authorize the holder to maintain an action for the protection of his possession thereunder. The authorities cited are to the effect that the courts will not take jurisdiction to determine the title of adverse claimants to land until the land department is through with it, and the legal title has passed from the government, and are not applicable to a case like the one at bar, where the right of possession under the laws of the state is alone in question. It is true that the language of the court in the case of Hays v. Parker, 2 Wash. T. 198, 8 Pac. Rep. 901, seems to warrant the contention of defendant in error; but the language used must be interpreted in the light of the facts of the case, and, thus interpreted, is not inconsistent with the above-stated conclusions; for though that was an action of ejectment, and the plaintiff relied upon a final receipt as in this case, yet it appeared that at the time the action was commenced the plaintiff was in the land-office of the United States waging a contest with the defendant as to the validity of the right upon which his action was founded, and under these circumstances the court very properly refused to aid either party in so changing the situation as to affect, or have a tendency to affect, the contest then being waged in the land-office. Under the second question above stated, the contention of the plaintiff in error is that a patent certificate issued in due form, in favor of a pre-emptioner, for lands subject to entry under the pre-emption law, where no appeal is taken from the decision of the register and receiver in granting the same, cannot be set aside by the land department upon proceedings subsequently initiated by a stranger, and upon the ground of failure to comply with the law in relation to settlement and improvement; while the defendant in error contends that until the issuance of the patent the commissioner of the general land-office may suspend an entry, and place the pre-emption claimant in the same position that he was prior to the offering of proof; and that on said second hearing the government can itself, through its officers and agents or by the efforts of an informer, re-examine the question as to the pre-emption claimant's compliance with the law; and if on said hearing it is shown that the claimant has not done so, that the commissioner of the general land-office may cancel the entry, and allow another to file upon the land.

These contentions have been elaborately argued by counsel for the respective parties, who by their zeal and ability have brought together and summarised nearly all the authorities upon this subject; and the labors of the court in coming to a conclusion as to these important questions have been thereby greatly facilitated. Plaintiff in error, to maintain his contention above stated, relies upon the provisions of section 2263 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which, he claims, constitute the register and receiver a tribunal to hear and determine all questions relating to the settlement and improvement of pre-emption claims, and that, in the absence of a contest, there is no appeal to the higher officers of the land department; the only exception being that they shall hear and determine these questions agreeably to such rules as may be prescribed by the secretary of the interior. The language of this section is as follows: "Prior to any entries being made under and by virtue of the provisions of section twenty-two hundred and fifty-nine, proof of the settlement and improvement thereby required shall be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver of the land district in which such lands lie, agreeably to such rules as may be prescribed by the secretary of the interior; and all assignments and transfers of the right hereby secured, prior to the issuing of the patent, shall be null and void," and would seem to warrant such construction, though it might be contended that, under the power given to the secretary of the interior, he might provide by rules that the decision of these facts should, in the first instance, be only tentative, and that before such decision should become final the register and receiver should, when directed by the commissioner of the general land-office, again pass upon the question, and so continue to do until their superior officers were satisfied with the correctness of their determination. This latter contention would, however, be an unnatural and forced one, and if said section stood alone, unqualified by other provisions of the land law, we should have little trouble in coming to the conclusion that the contention of the plaintiff in error was correct.

This language, however, must be interpreted in the light of all the provisions of law relating to the disposition of public lands. Upon an investigation of these provisions, we find that the entire duty of supervising the disposal of such lands is vested in the secretary of the interior and the commissioner of the general land-office; that such commissioner is the head of a bureau having in charge all matters relating to such lands; that the register and receiver are inferior officers in such bureau, who must make full report of all their proceedings to such commissioner, who is charged with the duty of seeing that a patent issues to persons entitled thereto. These provisions were in existence at the time of the enactment of the pre-emption law of 1841, in which was found the section above quoted from the Revised Statutes. Under such provisions it had been the constant practice of registers and receivers not only to send up to the commissioner their finding of facts, but to send therewith all the proofs taken by and before them upon which such findings were based. This practice could only be justified upon the theory that such register and receiver were inferior officers to the commissioner, and their findings were subject to review by him. Viewing the language of the section in question in the light of the law and the practice thereunder existing at the time such section was enacted, we think it is not sufficient to show the intention of congress to overturn such law and practice, and by indirection take from the commissioner his powers of supervision, and transform the theretofore inferior officers of register and receiver into courts of final determination, by whose decisions, however erroneous, the government would be absolutely concluded. The responsibility of finally determining as to the conditions precedent to the issuing of a patent for lands of the United States could not thus indirectly be taken from one of the higher officers of the government, acting under the immediate supervision of the president, and cast upon inferior and comparatively unknown ones, exercising their powers in places remote from the seat of government.

It is true that to hold that these findings of the register and receiver may be reviewed by the commissioner, and a rehearing ordered, may work great hardships to individuals who may thus be called upon to prove facts that they had long supposed settled by the finding of such register and receiver; but these considerations can have but little weight in construing the statutes, as courts are bound to assume that the higher officers of the land department will not act arbitrarily, and causelessly put the burden of a second hearing upon an applicant. On the other hand, to hold otherwise would place the entire interests of the government, as to these important questions, in the hands of these inferior and remote officers, who, by their careless or corrupt administration of the trust reposed in them, might to a great extent nullify the policy of the government as to the disposal of its lands to actual settlers and improvers only. That a policy that congress had, and since has, taken such pains to establish and carry out, should be left at the mercy of such inferior and remote officers, does not seem reasonable. The opportunities for evasions of such policy are very great, even under the most careful supervision of the highest officers of the government; and without such supervision there would be little practical utility in all the laws enacted by congress upon that subject. The language of the section in question is susceptible of the interpretation claimed for it by plaintiff in error, but when viewed in the light of other statute law and public policy, we cannot believe that such was the intention of congress.

The adjudicated cases upon this subject are quite numerous, and, though there may be found in some of them expressions which seem to give force to the claim of plaintiff in error, yet we think that, when examined in the light of the facts of each particular case, they will be found to better harmonize with the contention of defendant in error. In fact, after a somewhat exhaustive research, we have been unable to find any case that fully supported the plaintiff in error's contention, or that could not be harmonized with the positions of the defendant in error, except two cases in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Oregon: Smith v. Ewing, 11 Sawy. 56, 23 Fed. Rep. 741; Wilson v. Fine, 40 Fed. Rep. 52. The long experience and great reputation for learning and ability of the judge who tried those cases is well known, and they on that account are entitled to great consideration and weight. The court which rendered these opinions was, however, an inferior one, whose decisions were subject to reversal on appeal, and its judgments are not entitled to the same weight as courts of last resort. The opinions in said cases, however, show that the most painstaking research was brought to the aid of the court in the decision thereof, and the argument therein is very strong; and did we not think that they stand alone, while on the other hand are a large number of cases tending more or less strongly in an opposite direction, we should perhaps be content to accept the argument of the learned judge who decided them, and sustain the contention of the plaintiff in error; but in the light of such other cases we are led to the belief that said decisions were founded too much upon the language of the particular sections in controversy, and that due weight was not given to other portions of the statutes relating to the disposition of public lands. We shall not attempt a review of the cases cited from the state reports, as their number is too great to make a careful review of them all practicable. Besides, this is a purely federal question, and, so far as the supreme court of the United States has spoken, their decision must be taken as final. Cases more or less conclusive upon the subject-matter under discussion have been from time to time decided by the supreme court of the United States, and to these we must mainly look for guidance. And, first, we may say generally that a large number of cases cited by plaintiff in error passed upon the effect of a final receipt in cases where the land was subject to private entry, and where proof of any fact was not required as a prerequisite to the purchase. In this class of cases it has often been held that by the payment of the money to the government the substantial title at once vested in the purchaser, and that there was nothing further for the government to do except to complete the sale by the conveyance of the bare legal title. These cases, however, are only remotely applicable to the case at bar. In this case, while it is true that the government has received the money for the land, yet it has done so upon the assurance and proof of the purchaser that he had qualified himself under the land laws to become such purchaser; and if such assurance and proof were false, then the government has acted under a mistake as to the facts, and the reasons for concluding it would not be nearly so strong as in the former case. The settlement and improvement may be said to be a substantial part of the purchase price, for which the government consents to part with its title. At the time the final receipt is issued it is supposed that that part, as well as the cash part, has been paid; but before the government has parted with its title it is found that such part of the purchase price has not been paid, and therefore the government asserts only the right which a private party would have under like circumstances in refusing to convey the contracted premises.

We shall now briefly examine a few of the cases decided by the supreme court of the United States bearing upon this question. The case of Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. 498, is much relied upon by plaintiff in error. In its opinion in that case the court says: "Even assuming that the decision of the register and receiver, in the absence of fraud, would be conclusive as to the facts of the applicant then being in possession, and his cultivation during the preceding year, because these questions are directly submitted to them, yet if they undertake to grant pre-emptions in land in which the law declares they shall not be granted, then they are acting upon a subject-matter clearly not within their jurisdiction;" which language is far from conclusive, as, instead of indicating that the court had actually determined the law as thus stated, it clearly shows that it was only an admission by way of argument. It is but fair to say, however, that the above-quoted language, when taken in connection with the context and of the reference therein made to the case of Elliott v. Peirsol, 1 Pet. 840, very strongly supports the contention of plaintiff in error, and, if the statute law upon the subject was the same now as when that decision was rendered, might well be cited as nearly conclusive of the question. Such, however, is not the case, for not only has the law been materially changed, but the law as thus changed has received an interpretation by the same court which, as we shall see hereafter, has destroyed the force of the case under consideration. The case of Lytle v. State, 9 How. 314, is a still stronger one, and, were it not qualified by the statement just made, might well conclude our inquiry; for Justice McLEAN, in the course of his opinion, says that the findings of the register and receiver are final. These cases are entitled to but little weight in determining the proper practice under the law as it now stands. At the time the proceedings passed upon therein were had, the law provided that the fact of settlement and cultivation should be proved to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, from whom no appeal was given, and over whose acts, in that regard, no control was given by the higher officers of the land department. At the time the proceedings were had, which are under review in the case at bar, the law, as we have seen, was very different. At this time the entire responsibility as to the control and disposition of the public lands had been cast upon the commissioner of the general land-office; and the effect of all these provisions would seem to be sufficient to change the ruling of the court, as above set forth; and as we read the cases, such has been their effect. In deciding the case of Barnard's Heirs v. Ashley's Heirs, 18 How. 43, Mr. Justice CATRON uses the following language: "In cases arising under the pre-emption laws of the 29th of May, 1830, and of the 19th of June, 1834, the power of ascertaining and deciding on the facts which entitle a party to the right of pre-emption was vested in the register and receiver of the land district in which the land was situated, from whose decision there was no direct appeal to higher authority. But, even under these laws, the proof on which the claim was to rest was to be made agreeably to the rules to be prescribed by the commissioner of the general land-office; and, if not so made, the entry would be suspended, when the proceeding was brought before the commissioner by an opposing claimant. In cases, however, like the one before us, where an entry had been allowed on ex parte affidavits, which were impeached, and the land claimed by another, founded upon an opposing entry, the course pursued at the general land-office was to return the proofs and allegations, in opposition to the entry, to the district office, with instructions to call all the parties before the register and receiver, with a view of instituting an inquiry into the matters charged; allowing each party, on due notice, an opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses of the other, each being allowed to introduce proofs; and, on the close of the investigation, the register and receiver were instructed to report the proceeding to the general land-office, with their opinion as to the effect of the proof, and the case made by the additional testimony; and on this return the commissioner does in fact exercise a supervision over the acts of the register and receiver. This power of revision is exercised by virtue of the act of July 4, 1836, § 1, which provides 'that, from and after the passage of this act, the executive duties now prescribed, or which may hereafter be prescribed, by law, appertaining to the surveying and sale of the public lands of the United States, or in any wise respecting such public lands, and also such as relate to private claims of land and the issuing of patents for all grants of land under the authority of the government of the United States, shall be subject to the supervision and control of the commissioner of the general land-office, under the direction of the president of the United States.' The necessity of 'supervision and control,' vested in the commissioner, acting under the direction of the president, is too uni-test to require comment, further than to say that the facts found in this record show that nothing is more easily done than apparently to establish, by ex parte affidavits, cultivation, possession of particular quarter sections of land, when the fact is untrue. That the act of 1836 modifies the powers of registers and receivers to the extent of the commissioner's action in the instances before us, we hold to be true. But if the construction of the act of 1836 to this effect were doubtful, the practice under it for nearly twenty years could not be disturbed without manifest impropriety; which language, we think, directly approves of the course pursued by the land department in the case at bar; for though it is true that in that case the contestant claimed an interest in the land at the time of the institution of the contest, yet that fact could not affect the question, as, without any appeal having been taken to the commissioner, he reversed the findings of the register and receiver, and ordered another hearing before them. Had the court said only as above quoted, it would be reasonably clear that the cases of Wilcox v. Jackson and Lytle v. State, supra, were not applicable after the passage of the act of 1836; but we are not left in doubt upon this question, as the court in the case under review proceeded further to say: "The case relied on of Wilcox v. Jackson, 13 Pet. 511, was an ejectment suit, commenced in February, 1836; and as to the acts of the register and receiver, in allowing the entry in that case, the commissioner had no power or supervision, such as was given to him by the act of July 4, 1836, after the cause was in court. In the next case (9 How. 383) all the controverted facts on which both sides relied had transpired, and were concluded before the act of July 4, 1836, was passed; and therefore its construction, as regards the commissioner's powers, under the act of 1836, was not involved; whereas, in the case under consideration, the additional proceedings were had before the register and receiver in 1837, and were subject to the new powers conferred on the commissioner." The case of Harkness v. Underhill, 1 Black, 316, fully sustains the right of the commissioner to review the action of the register and receiver, and makes use of language which would seem to indicate that the question was fully settled. The court say: "The question is again raised whether this entry, having been allowed by the register and receiver, could be set aside by the commissioner. All the officers administering public lands were bound by the regulations published May 6, 1836, (2 L. L. & O. 92.) These regulations prescribed the mode of proceeding to vacate a fraudulent occupant entry, and were pursued in the case before the court. The question has several times been raised and decided in this court, upholding the commissioner's powers." The above citations are sufficient to show that the supreme court of the United States has more than once had substantially the same question before it, and that since the act of 1836 the jurisdiction of the commissioner has been sustained and approved. The case of Cornelius v. Kessel, 128 U. S. 457, 9 Sup. Ct. 122, does not militate against the doctrine of the cases before decided in that court. On the contrary, when carefully considered, it tends to confirm them; for while it is true that Mr. Justice FIELD, in deciding that case, in setting out the findings that may be reviewed by the commissioner, omits that of settlement and improvement, yet he does not say that this question cannot, in a proper case, be reviewed. On the contrary, he by inference recognizes that right, but says that it cannot be exercised arbitrarily, or so as to deprive an applicant of land lawfully paid for. The language of the opinion, taken as a whole, does not sustain the position of plaintiff in error; and, even if it did, it would lose much force from the fact that this was a case of private entry, where no act was required but the payment of the purchase money. This case, as we understand it, only asserts the recognized doctrine that the courts will inquire into the decisions of the land-office as to questions of law, and, if erroneous, correct them. It may also be gathered from this case, as well as many others decided by the same court, that if the land-officers have been imposed upon, and by mistake and fraud been induced to decide a question of fact wrongly, the court will interfere to protect the rights of the parties. This last question may at some future time arise upon the facts of the case at bar. But that question has not, and probably could not have, been raised in this case, and it is not necessary that we should say anything in regard thereto. On the whole case, we agree with the contention of the defendant in error, and the case must be affirmed.

STATE ex rel. WADE v. KENNEY, State Auditor.

MANDAMUS—To STATE AUDITOR—APPROPRIATION OF MONEY.

Act Mont. March 14, 1889, which fixes the compensation of the Code commissioners at $4,000 each, and which provides that on filing any one of the completed Codes with the secretary of the territory the auditor shall draw his warrant for the pro rata salaries of the commissioners, constitutes an appropriation of the money required for the compensation of the commissioners, and mandamus will issue to the state auditor to compel him to draw his warrant in favor of the commissioners who have performed their duties as prescribed by the act.

Application for peremptory writ of mandate.

B. P. Carpenter and F. W. Cole, for petitioner. Henri J. Haskell, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

BLAKE, C. J. The affidavit of the relator contains the following allegations: "That he was duly appointed, in the year 1889, one of the Code commissioners under an act of the legislative assembly of the territory (now state) of Montana, entitled 'An act to provide for the appointment of a commission to codify the criminal and civil law and procedure, and to revise, compile, and arrange the statute laws of Montana,' approved March 14, 1889. That ever since such appointment he has acted as such commissioner in the preparation of the four Codes provided for in said act. That said Codes have been prepared and filed, as required by said act and the act of the legislative assembly of the state of Montana amendatory of said act, approved March 9, 1891. That the Civil and Penal Codes and the Code of Civil Procedure were prepared and filed, and a warrant drawn by the auditor in favor of this affiant and each of the Code commissioners, and paid out of the state treasury. That the Political Code was filed, as required by law, on the 10th day of March, 1891. That affiant, on the 10th day of March, 1891, after filing the said Political Code with the secretary of state, demanded of said E. A. Kenney, the state auditor of the state of Montana, a warrant on the state treasurer of the state of Montana, for the sum of one thousand dollars, which said sum was due this affiant for his salary and compensation in the preparation of said Political Code. That the said E. A. Kenney, state auditor as aforesaid, refused, and still refuses, to give affiant a warrant on the state treasurer for said amount, or any other amount." There are other allegations, which do not become material to this controversy, and the prayer is for a peremptory writ of mandate to issue out of this court, directed to said state auditor, and commanding him to give to the affiant a warrant for said sum. The return of the respondent is to the effect that the foregoing act of the legislative assembly in 1889 did not make any specific appropriation of money out of any fund to pay the relator; that the relator was not entitled to receive any compensation by the terms of this act until he had performed certain services; and that, when said Political Code was filed with the secretary of state, there was no money in the state treasury which was applicable to the payment of said claim by reason of the appropriations of large amounts by the second legislative assembly of the state, which had been made in 1891. It is necessary to construe these clauses and sentences of the act which was approved March 14, 1889: "The said commissioners shall each receive a compensation for his services of $4,000." Section 4. "Upon the completion of any one of the said Codes, and upon filing the same, accompanied with a general index, and the report of the commission in relation thereto, * * * in the office of the secretary of the territory or state, as the case may be, it shall be the duty of the chief justice and the secretary of the territory or state to examine the same, and, as soon as practicable, to determine whether the work has been done as provided in this act; and, if they so determine, they shall file their decisions with the state auditor, whereupon it shall be lawful for, and the duty of, such auditor to draw his warrant for the pro rata salaries of the commission under the provision of this act, and to be paid by him out of any funds not otherwise appropriated." Section 5. In State v. Hickman, 9 Mont. 370, 23 Pac. Rep. 740, we held that a section of the constitution which provides that the secretary of state shall receive for his services $3,000 per annum, payable quarterly, was an appropriation by law. The relator has been nominated by the governor and confirmed by the territorial council, and is an officer whose duties and compensation are fixed by the statute supra. It is also specified that the payment pro rata for his services shall be made at a time which is made certain by the completion of the respective Codes. The constitution has declared that "all obligations of the territory of Montana existing, in force, and unpaid at the time of the admission of the state into the Union are hereby assumed by the state, which shall and will well and truly pay the same." Article 20, § 12, Schedule.

We have commented heretofore upon the provisions of the constitution concerning an appropriation, and do not think our views require a repetition of the reasons which control this decision. Under the authorities, the legislation providing for the appointment of the Code commission is held to appropriate the definite sum which is designated as the compensation of the commissioners. State v. Bordelon, 6 La. Ann. 68; Ristine v. State, 20 Ind. 328; McCauley v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 11; Prohl v. Dunn, 80 Cal. 220, 22 Pac. Rep. 143; Humbert v. Dunn, 84 Cal. 57, 24 Pac. Rep. 111. The last-named case is a recent utterance of the supreme court of that state, and is directly in point. Our construction of the act, supra, that it is an appropriation of the money required for the compensation of the relator, renders needless a consideration of the other grounds of defense of the respondent. The laws making appropriations for various purposes, which are cited, were enacted subsequently to the act under view, and cannot affect the rights of the relator. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the peremptory writ of mandate be issued in accordance with the prayer of the relator.

TROVER—WHO MAY MAINTAIN—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. A written order by the owner of personal property, authorizing plaintiff to dispose of it, and collect the proceeds, does not transfer the title to plaintiff, and does not enable him to maintain trover against a third person, who converted the same to his own use. DE WITT, J., dissenting.

2. Neither does such order constitute plaintiff a "trustee of an express trust" within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. Mont. § 6, which authorizes a "trustee of an express trust" to sue without joining the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted. DE WITT, J., dissenting.

3. In trover for wood, plaintiff alleged title in himself, and a conversion by defendants. Defendants set up a counter-claim, in which they alleged that the title originally had been in a third person, for whom plaintiff had done the cutting; that such third person had sold the wood to defendants; and that they had furnished supplies to plaintiff while engaged in the cutting. Plaintiff's replication consisted of a general denial. Held, that on the trial plaintiff could not admit the truth of the facts averred in the counter-claim, and introduce evidence in avoidance, as the issue raised by his general denial was the existence of the facts averred in the counter-claim.

4. A conversation in which plaintiff demanded of one of defendants $74 for the wood, adding that if such sum was not paid he would sue, is admissible in evidence, where there is nothing to show that the conversation took place while negotiating for a peaceful settlement, or with a view to compromise.

Appeal from district court, Deer Lodge county; D. M. DUFFEE, Judge.

W. H. Trippett and Robinson & Stapleton, for appellants. Cole & Whitehill, for respondent.

HARWOOD, J. Action for damages for taking and conversion of personal property. The plaintiff, for cause of action, avers that on June 1, 1887, he possessed and owned 250 cords of wood, of the value of $287.50; that between said date and October 26, 1887, defendants unlawfully took and conveyed away said wood, and converted the same to their use, to plaintiff's damage in said sum, for which judgment is demanded, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum from the time of such alleged taking. Defendants made answer, denying the allegations of the complaint; and further alleged, as new matter of defense or counter-claim, a transaction connected with the cutting of said wood, in effect as follows: That defendants, Albert Kleinschmidt and Addison Smith, were copartners doing business in the firm name of A. Kleinschmidt & Co.; and that during the winter of 1885 to 1886 the Butte Manufacturing Company, a corporation existing under the laws of Montana, employed plaintiff and L. Mangarud and C. J. Lindquist, as partners, to cut wood for said company at an agreed price of $1.15 per cord for cutting and packing the wood; that said partners, under said agreement, cut the wood in question, but the same was only 203½ cords in quantity, instead of 250 cords, as alleged by plaintiff; that while plaintiff and his said partners were cutting said wood, defendants, for said Butte Manufacturing Company, furnished plaintiff and his said partners, at their instance and request, goods, wares, and merchandise at and for the price of $153, and that plaintiff and his said partners became indebted to the Butte Manufacturing Company therefor in said sum; that during the year 1886 said debt owing by plaintiff and his said partners for said goods was assigned by the Butte Manufacturing Company to defendants. Defendants' answer further alleges that plaintiff and his said copartners became indebted to one Phil. E. Evans in the sum of $9.07, which is alleged to have been assigned to defendants, A. Kleinschmidt & Co., and that plaintiff and his said partners assumed and agreed to pay the same. Defendants also allege that defendants, A. Kleinschmidt & Co., paid $10.74 at the instance and request of plaintiff and his said partners for hauling said goods to them, which plaintiff and his said partners agreed to pay. Defendants further allege that long before the commencement of this action all of said indebtedness of plaintiff and his partners was assigned to and became the property of defendants, A. Kleinschmidt & Co., and that all of said wood was sold to and became the property of the same defendants prior to the commencement of the action; that said wood was not packed or piled; and that, in order to ascertain the amount of said wood, defendants were compelled to pay, and did pay, 15 cents per cord for packing the same, amounting to the sum of $30.80. In conclusion defendants offered to pay plaintiff the sum of $32.33, which they admitted was a balance due plaintiff and his said partners for cutting said wood. Plaintiff, by replication, denied said matters set up by the answer, alleging, however, that said wood was cut by plaintiff and said Mangarud and Lindquist, not as partners, but each cutting for himself. Upon the issues thus formed the case was tried, and during the course of the trial, as appears by defendants' bill of exceptions, plaintiff was sworn, and, while testifying on his own behalf, said the wood in controversy was cut by himself, Mangarud, and Lindquist for the Butte Manufacturing Company; that said parties were chopping together, and they chopped about 250 cords; that plaintiff chopped 120 cords, and one of the others chopped about 75 to 80 cords, and the other from 85 to 90 cords; that these choppers had no contract with defendants, but their "contract was with the Butte Manufacturing Company, at the agreed price of $1.15 per cord, and that the company was to furnish grub, and would receive the wood about June 1, 1886;" that they "chopped till about February 16, 1886, and quit because the company busted up." He said: "Nobody offered to pay us. I never received anything but goods—about $150 worth, I think—for myself and the two men that were with me. Each man chopped for himself. I am suing for what they chopped, too. The goods we received were in part payment for the wood. The amount was to be deducted." Plaintiff then offered in evidence what he claimed was a transfer from said Mangarud and Lindquist to him of the wood which each of them cut. The papers offered are in terms as follows: "Deer Lodge, Apr. 24th, 1886. This is to certify that I, the undersigned, have given S. Swenson, of Deer Lodge, full authority to dispose of all the wood belonging to me in Mt. Powell gulch, in Deer Lodge county, and collect money for the same if sold. The wood is marked thus: 'C-I-L.' [Signed] C. LINDQUIST." "Deer Lodge, April 24th, 1886. This is to certify that I, the undersigned, have turned my wood over to S. Swenson, of Deer Lodge, and given him full authority to dispose of it in any way he may deem satisfactory. Also collect money for me for the same if sold, all wood belonging to me in Mt. Powell wood camp, and are marked thus: 'L-M.' [Signed] L. J. MANGARUD." Those papers were offered in evidence, as the bill of exceptions recites, "to show title in plaintiff to the wood cut by said parties," and to the introduction of which the defendants objected for the reason that the same were incompetent and insufficient to show title in plaintiff to the same. The court overruled the objection, and admitted said papers to be read in evidence to the jury; to which ruling defendants excepted, and assign the same as error.

Plaintiff's action is for damages for the conversion of 250 cords of wood,—his property. He must prove the essential allegations of his complaint to make a cause for recovery. As said by Bishop: "To maintain this particular action [trover] he must have a right both to the property and to the possession of it." Non-Cont. Law, § 397. Plaintiff had just shown by his testimony that when this wood was cut certain separate described portions of it were not his property, but were the property of others. To make out his case as to that wood, plaintiff must show conveyance of title to him. This he undertook to prove by introducing said papers; but said papers do not show a transfer of title. They constitute mere revocable grants of authority or agency to plaintiff to do stated acts in relation to the wood belonging to said Lindquist and Mangarud. The terms used indicate no intention to transfer the property. The contrary is shown. In the first the maker gives the plaintiff authority to dispose of all the wood belonging to him, "and collect money for the same if sold." In the second the plaintiff is authorized by the maker to dispose of the wood, "and collect the money for me for the same if sold." If said papers were sufficient to show, or intended to show, a transfer of title in this action, the same papers ought certainly to be good evidence for the same purpose in case said Lindquist or Mangarud had brought an action against plaintiff for recovery of possession of their wood, respectively, or for damages for the conversion thereof by plaintiff. Said papers can in no way be construed to have such an effect. So far as said papers show, the makers of them still own the respective portions of the wood, as plaintiff testified. Plaintiff's counsel contend that said papers made plaintiff "trustee of an express trust" for the other owners of respective portions of said wood, (Code Civil Proc. § 6;)¹ but such position cannot be sustained, (Pom. Rem. § 171 et seq.; Bliss, Code Pl. §§ 54-57, and 262, and cases cited.) It was error to admit said writings as evidence tending to establish plaintiff's title to the respective portions of the wood in controversy, which he had testified was the property of Lindquist and Mangarud.

After plaintiff had testified that he and Lindquist and Mangarud had cut said wood for the Butte Manufacturing Company under a contract with said company for the price of $1.15 per cord, "and that the company was to furnish grub, and would receive the wood about June 1, 1886," and that about $150 worth of goods were received by plaintiff and Lindquist and Mangarud, and that "the goods were received in part payment for the wood," plaintiff's counsel then asked him to explain for what reason he was not indebted to the Butte Manufacturing Company. Defendants objected to the witness responding to that question for the reason that such inquiry was incompetent, and not warranted by the pleadings. The objection was overruled, and defendants excepted to such ruling. In response to said question plaintiff testified "that the contract was that said company was to furnish grub and receive the wood; that by their failure to fulfill the contract they had nothing left but the wood; and, as it was, they were thrown out of everything, and that they were idle for a while." Defendants then moved the court to strike out said testimony. This motion the court overruled, to which ruling defendants excepted, and assign the same as error. Was that proof warranted by the pleadings? By reverting to the pleadings it is seen that plaintiff alleged as his cause of action these simple facts: That he owned and possessed a certain quantity of wood of a certain value, and that defendants carried away and converted the same to their own use, to plaintiff's damage in a certain sum, for which he demanded judgment. Defendants answered plaintiff's alleged cause of action, denying his allegations, and setting forth as new matter or counter-claim a state of facts which, if true, and of binding force, would at least modify the amount which plaintiff ought to recover. By defendants' answer an issue of fact was raised as to the truth of the allegations of the complaint, and also a new state of facts affecting the rights of the parties to the controversy was introduced. The new matter or counter-claim set up in the answer must be controverted, or it will be deemed true. Code Civil Proc. § 109. How shall the new matter be controverted? To "controvert" means more than to deny. Webst. Dict.;

¹ This section provides that a trustee of an express trust may sue without joining the persons for whose benefit the action is brought.

Century Dict. If the allegations constituting new matter or counter-claim are deemed untrue by plaintiff, he will, of course, controvert the same by direct denial. Then the issue on that point is as to the verity of such matter; that is, as to the existence of the facts stated as new matter or counter-claim. But the new matter stated by way of defense or counter-claim may be true, and yet have no binding force by reason of the existence of another fact, or state of facts, which occurred in relation to the same. How, in such a case, shall the plaintiff controvert the new matter of defense or counter-claim? Shall he make a direct and unqualified denial of such matters in his replication, and then, on the witness stand, admit the truth of what he denied by replication, and then introduce proof of a new state of facts, foreign to the pleadings, which occurred in relation to the new matter of defense or counter-claim, and which, as he contends, destroyed the binding force thereof? Aside from the duplicity involved in such a position, is not a denial of a transaction, by necessary and inevitable implication, a denial also that any facts exist relating to or growing out of such a transaction? How can there be a state of facts growing out of, or relating to, or affecting that which never existed? How can there be a breach or satisfaction of a contract or transaction which was never engaged in? The pleader not only stands in such an attitude as a logical sequence arising from direct, unqualified denial of a transaction or contract alleged as new matter of defense or counter-claim, but he raises an issue of no consequence in the trial, for he will upon the trial admit what he denied, as he must admit it in whole or in part, to show that other facts arose in relation to such new matter or counter-claim, which satisfied or destroyed the obligation arising therefrom. Again, the issues are materially different under the one or other method of controverting new matter of defense or counter-claim. If direct denial is made, the issue raised is as to whether such facts exist or not. If, however, the replication controverts the counter-claim, a new matter of defense, by alleging a state of facts which would, when proved, destroy the force of such new matter or counter-claim, the issue is then shifted to the question of the existence of the latter facts, by which the new matter or counter-claim would be avoided. This latter issue is raised by an assumed denial of new matter stated in the replication. "The statement in the replication of matter in avoidance shall on the trial be deemed controverted by the adverse party." Section 109, Code Civil Proc. Again, "an issue of fact arises * * * upon new matter in the replication." Section 248, id. We think that to allow a party who, by replication, makes an unconditional denial of facts constituting new matter of defense or counter-claim to admit those facts on the trial, and then, under color of such former denial, to enter upon the proof of facts material to the rights of the parties, and foreign to the pleadings, by way of avoidance, would be paradoxical, and contrary to the provisions and spirit of our Code of Civil Procedure. Mauldin v. Ball, 5 Mont. 98, 1 Pac. Rep. 409. We think the court erred in admitting the said evidence objected to as not warranted by the pleadings.

There is one other assignment of error which we will notice. During the course of the trial, P. Bader, testifying in behalf of defendants, stated that on a certain occasion he heard a conversation in defendants' store between plaintiff, Swenson, and defendant Strenhal, in which "Swenson asked Strenhal if he would take his wood, and Strenhal told him he would, but it was not piled; and Swenson said he thought it ought to be worth $1.15 outside of piling. Strenhal said he could get it banked for that price. He told him he would find out." "In the second conversation Swenson asked Strenhal if he would pay him, and he told him the wood was not measured yet. Swenson said he wanted $74. or he would sue." Defendants' bill of exceptions recited that plaintiff objected to said evidence, "and the court ruled that all evidence with reference to the offer to take $74 be stricken out, and the same was withdrawn from the consideration of the jury." The objection to said evidence assigns no ground for the exclusion of the same. Nor does it appear on what ground said evidence was stricken out and withdrawn from the consideration of the jury. It is asserted by respondents' counsel in their brief that said evidence was withdrawn from the jury because the court previously ruled that the conversation was concerning a compromise. The bill of exceptions is quite elaborate in setting out the evidence of two conversations to explain the point of defendants' exception; but nowhere in said evidence is there an expression showing that the demand of plaintiff for $74 from defendant Strenhal, in payment for the wood cut by plaintiff, was made as a compromise offer; nor that said statements were made while negotiating for a peaceful settlement, nor in view of any compromise. The evidence is a plain recital of a demand by plaintiff upon one of the defendants for the payment of a certain sum in settlement, adding that if the same was not paid he would sue. There are no expressions which indicate that plaintiff was offering to take anything less than his due, nor that in making such demand he was offering to sacrifice anything whatever. We must presume that in settling the bill of exceptions the court made the same conform to the truth. According to the recitals therein, said evidence was clearly admissible, and the order withdrawing the same from the consideration of the jury was error. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 192; Best, Ev. § 510. It is ordered that the judgment appealed from be, and the same is hereby, reversed, with costs, and the cause is remanded for trial de novo.

BLAKE, C. J., concurs.

DE WITT, J. While I concur that the cause must be reversed, some views have been expressed from which I must record a dissent. The appeal is on the judgment roll. The only questions presented are in a bill of exceptions. The only evidence before us is that contained in the bill to explain the points of the exceptions. The first point is the objection that the writings offered and received in evidence "were incompetent and insufficient, and did not show any title in plaintiff." Whether these writings were alone sufficient to show title, whether they were conclusive, whether they wholly proved plaintiff's right to sue, is not before us for determination. The whole evidence is not before us. We do not know what plaintiff proved as to the essential allegations of his complaint, outside of the writings. The question for determination under the exception is, were the writings competent as tending to prove what plaintiff claimed for them? that is, as establishing a title in plaintiff, against trespassers, for the purposes of the action. Whether they were sufficient is another matter to be taken in connection with the whole evidence, which is not before us. Did the writings tend to show that plaintiff had a right of action for the conversion of the wood? That the writings may have been revocable is not material in the absence of any claim that they had been revoked, and in an action between plaintiff and trespassers, and where no question is raised between plaintiff and Mangarud and Lindquist. The writings confer upon Swenson, plaintiff, the right to dispose of the wood. He alleges in his complaint that he was in the lawful possession of the wood. We do not know what evidence he offered in other parts of the trial of the fact of possession. We speak now, for the moment, only of his right of possession. Having the right to dispose of, what does "dispose of" mean? Webster's Dictionary defines the term "to determine the fate of; to exercise the power of control over; to fix the condition, application, employment, etc., of; to direct or assign for a use." With this idea of the term "dispose of," it can be said without much hesitation that Swenson had the right of possession of the wood. But did these writings tend to show title in plaintiff? "Title" must mean title for the purposes of the action against the alleged trespassers. "Title" here means, I take it, much the same as "property," when that word is used to designate the interest which one has in a thing, in distinction to the use of the word as signifying the thing itself. Mr. Bishop says, speaking of trover: "Yet to maintain this particular action he must have a right both to the property and to the possession of it." Non-Cont. Law, § 397. What is property, as to things personal or title? Bouv. Law Dict. says: "Property in personal goods may be absolute or qualified, * * * because more persons than one have an interest in it, or because the right of property is separated from the possession." The same authority says of "title": "In general, possession constitutes the criterion of title of personal property, because no other means exist by which a knowledge of the fact to whom it belongs can be attained." Now, those writings offered in evidence tended to show the lawful possession which was alleged. A lawful possession was one of the elements of a special or qualified title or property against alleged trespassers, which it is claimed the plaintiff must have; and therefore evidence of such lawful possession was competent in the chain of testimony. I am of opinion that the writings were at least one step in the proof of a title as trustee of an express trust, and if Swenson, plaintiff, were trustee of an express trust, that is one of the facts establishing his cause of action. Whether the writings alone were sufficient to establish the existence of an express trust is not before us. I am satisfied that they tended in that direction, and for that reason were competent. The writings were informal, but substance, and not form, is material. 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 835; Voorhies' Code Proc., N. Y. § 111, p. 93. There is no substantial difference between our statutes and those of the states from which I cite the following cases: Considerant v. Brisbane, 22 N. Y. 389; Weaver v. Trustees, 28 Ind. 112; Tyler v. Houghton, 25 Cal. 29; Smith v. Logan, 18 Nev. 152, 1 Pac. Rep. 678; Wetmore v. Hegeman, 88 N. Y. 69, and cases cited; Reed v. Harris, 7 Rob. (N. Y.) 151; McKee v. Judd, 12 N. Y. 622; Richtmeyer v. Remsen, 38 N. Y. 206, citing Haight v. Hayt, 19 N. Y. 464; Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 347; Greene v. Insurance Co., 6 Hun, 131; Hoogland v. Trask, 6 Rob. (N. Y.) 540; Allen v. Brown, 44 N. Y. 231; Robbins v. Deverill, 20 Wis. 158; Deer. Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 367-369, notes; Voorhies' Code Proc. N. Y. §§ 111-113, notes; Pom. Rem. §§ 132, 133, 172, and cases cited. In accordance with the views above expressed and the authorities cited, and in consideration of the fact that plaintiff was undertaking to prove a case against alleged trespassers, and not against Mangarud and Lingquist, I am of opinion that there was no error in admitting in evidence the writings in controversy.

As to the second point discussed by my associate, Mr. Justice HARWOOD, I concur in the conclusion he reaches. And also as to the third point,—the error in excluding the evidence of Bader. As to that I will add a word. If Swenson offered to take $74, and it was clearly a compromise proposition, the evidence of such offer was not admissible. If it were a remark that he claimed only $74, and would take that amount, and such remark was an independent fact, disconnected with the proposition to compromise, it was competent. Williams v. Thorp, 8 Cow. 202, note and cases reviewed; Harrington v. Inhabitants of Lincoln, 4 Gray, 566; Reynolds v. Manning, 15 Md. 526; Paulin v. Howser, 63 Ill. 312. It does not appear by the bill of exceptions that it was a compromise proposition. It was not objected to as such. The record shows simply that the evidence was objected to, without purporting to give any reasons whatever for the objection. That is not a good objection. In re Thompson, 9 Mont. 387, 23 Pac. Rep. 933, citing City of Helena v. Albertose, 8 Mont. 499, 20 Pac. Rep. 817. I agree to a reversal of the judgment on these latter points, and state my dissent from the first point for the reason that the proposition therein involved becomes material on a retrial of the case in the district court.

MCCORMICK v. RIDDLE et al.

INJUNCTION—SHERIFF'S SALE—PLEADING.

1. A sheriff's sale of land to enforce a judgment subjecting it to a mechanic's lien will not be enjoined at the suit of the owner, who did not contract for the erection of the building, and who was not made a party to the mechanic's lien proceeding, as the purchaser at the sale will acquire no title as against him.

2. An allegation in the complaint that the sale will result in great and irreparable injury and damage to the owner is not admitted by demurrer, as such allegation is a conclusion of law, and not the statement of a fact.

Appeal from district court, Missoula county; CHARLES S. MARSHALL, Judge.

Action by Kate H. McCormick, administratrix, etc., of W. J. McCormick, deceased, against Joseph N. Riddle and others, to enjoin a sheriff's sale of land belonging to her estate. From a decree in complainant's favor defendants appeal.

Walter M. Bickford, for appellants. Geo. W. Reeves, for respondent.

BLAKE, C. J. The complaint of the respondent, as the administratrix of the estate of W. J. McCormick, deceased, contains the following allegations of facts, which are not denied by the appellants, and therefore admitted: Riddle & Watts, two of the appellants, filed February 13, 1890, their complaint, and set forth that they were employed by T. D. Rees to do certain work upon a house constructed upon a lot numbered 1, in block numbered 56, in McCormick's addition to the town of Missoula; that Rees, prior to the time of this employment by said Riddle & Watts, entered into a contract with Kate H. McCormick to erect a house upon said lot; that said Kate H. McCormick owned said lot; that said Rees was the agent of said Kate H. McCormick for the purpose of contracting for said work; that between March 1, 1889, and May 15, 1889, Riddle & Watts completed said house according to the contract they had made with Rees; that at the time of commencing their suit there was due them the sum of $554; and that in May, 1889, Riddle & Watts filed their lien under the statutes on said lot; and that they prayed for judgment against Rees and said Kate H. McCormick for said sum, and that their lien be enforced against said property. The complaint of the respondent further alleges that the court entered May 5, 1890, a decree in said action, by which it is adjudged "that the said Kate H. McCormick and T. D. Rees were indebted to the said Riddle & Watts in the sum of six hundred and nine dollars and 40 cents, and to secure said sum aforesaid the said Riddle & Watts have and hold a lien on the lot of land aforesaid, and the building thereon situated; * * * that, for the purpose of paying the sum aforesaid as found to be due Riddle & Watts, said lot * * * be sold by the sheriff of Missoula county, state of Montana, upon the payment of the purchase price of said lot and premises, that said sheriff convey said lot by deed to the purchaser; and that, in obedience to the directions of said decree aforesaid, the said sheriff has advertised said lot and premises for sale at the court-house in Missoula, Mont., on the 3d day of June, 1890; * * * that said lot * * * was never the property of the said T. D. Rees and Kate H. McCormick, or either of them, and that at the time when the contracts for the building of the house on said lot was said to have been made with the said Riddle & Watts and with T. D. Rees said lot aforesaid was, and has continued to be and is now, the property of the estate of W. J. McCormick, deceased; that, during the time of the construction of the said house aforesaid, as shown by the complaint and decree in the case of Riddle & Watts v. T. D. Rees and Kate H. McCormick, this plaintiff was and continued to be, and now is, the regularly appointed and acting administratrix of the estate of W. J. McCormick, deceased, and as such holds the title to said lot for the benefit of the estate aforesaid; that under the decree aforesaid the said sheriff, W. H. Houston, who is made defendant hereto, will, on the 3d day of June, 1890, sell said lot, and will convey the same by deed, unless enjoined and restrained from so doing by this court; that if said property is permitted to be sold, and the sheriff is not enjoined and restrained from making said sale, great and irreparable injury and damage will result to the plaintiff as the representative of the estate aforesaid, and to the estate also." The judge of said court, by an order dated June 3, 1890, enjoined the sheriff from making a sale and conveyance of said property. We will not review the motions which appear in the transcript, and depend upon one question. If the complaint states facts sufficient to justify the issuance of the injunction, there is no error in the proceedings.

The respondent contends that the allegation in her complaint that "great and irreparable injury and damage will result to the plaintiff" must be considered as true, because it is not denied. But this is a conclusion of law, which does not fall within this rule, and is not admitted by the appellants. Boley v. Griswold, 2 Mont. 447. Another familiar principle has been stated repeatedly in the books. In Carlisle v. Stevenson, 3 Md. Ch. 499, the chancellor said: "The mere allegation that irreparable injury will result to the complainant, unless protection is extended to him, is not sufficient; the facts must be stated, that the court may see that the apprehensions of irreparable mischief are well founded." See, also, Waldron v. Marsh, 5 Cal. 119; Mechanic's Foundry v. Ryall, 75 Cal. 601, 17 Pac. Rep. 703; Thorn v. Sweeney, 12 Nev. 251; Crisman v. Heiderer, 5 Colo. 589. A perusal of the complaint fails to disclose any facts of this nature. A valid judgment, of which no criticism is made, was entered in favor of Riddle & Watts, and against Kate H. McCormick and T. D. Rees. There are no allegations of an equitable character, such as fraud, injustice, or insolvency. The position of the respondent is fairly presented in the following sentences of the brief: "The contention of plaintiff and respondent is, as alleged in the complaint, that the property upon which the structure was built was the property of W. J. McCormick, deceased, and that Kate H. McCormick, one of the defendants in the former action, never had any interest in the property whatever. Upon this statement of the case respondent's counsel will present their argument." This court has passed upon one of the questions which arises in the case. Chumassero v. Vial, 3 Mont. 376; Story v. Black, 5 Mont. 28, 1 Pac. Rep. 1; Princeton Min. Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 7 Mont. 530, 19 Pac. Rep. 210. In the case last cited, Mr. Justice BACH said: "And it is also a rule of law that where a judgment creditor attaches real estate of his judgment debtor, and that property is held by the said judgment debtor in trust, the judgment creditor (at least when purchasing with actual notice) obtains no right, as against the cestui que trust of that property, even though the trust is no part of the records." The statutes concerning the liens of mechanics are decisive of some of the propositions which have been discussed by courts: "In all suits under this chapter the parties to the contract shall, and all other persons interested in the matter in controversy, and in the property charged with the lien, may, be made parties; but such as are not made parties shall not be bound by any such proceedings." Comp. St. div. 5, § 1379. It is shown by the record that neither the estate of W. J. McCormick, deceased, nor the administratrix thereof as the representative of said estate, who is the respondent, was a party to the action wherein said Riddle & Watts recovered their judgment. The foregoing language of the statute fixes in direct terms the legal consequences of such an omission. The section which authorizes the sale to enforce the lien of a mechanic is as follows: "That the lien given by section 820 of this chapter shall extend to the lot or land upon which any such building, improvements, or structure is situated to the extent of one acre, if outside of any town or city, or, if within any town or city, then to the extent of the whole lot or lots upon which the same is situated, if the land belonged to the person who caused said building to be constructed, altered, or repaired; but if such person owned less than a fee-simple estate in such land, then only his interest therein is subject to such lien." 15th Ex. Sess. 71. The injunction under review is not subject to any conditions or limitations. We think that the case at bar is governed by Archbishop v. Shipman, 69 Cal. 586, 11 Pac. Rep. 346. It appeared that Dorland recovered a judgment against J. S. Alemany et al. for the foreclosure of a lien upon a certain parcel of land; that a corporation sole, known as "The Roman Catholic Archbishop of San Francisco," was the owner of the premises, and was not a party to the judgment; that J. S. Alemany was the said archbishop; and that upon the application of the said corporation an injunction was issued to restrain the sale of the land by the sheriff. Mr. Justice McKEE in the opinion said: "The judgment creditor has been forever enjoined from enforcing her judgment, because the plaintiff herein was not a party to it. * * * The interest to which the lien attached may not have constituted a valid title; it may not in fact have been of any value; but, whatever it was, the party in whose favor the right to it was adjudged was entitled, as matter of right, to have her judgment against it enforced by legal process. * * * One who is not a party or privy to a judgment is not affected by it. As to him, the judgment, and all proceedings under it, are void. Neither the judgment, nor an execution sale of land affected by it, can change his rights in the land, or create a cloud upon his title. * * * The complaint fails to state a case cognizable in equity." We are satisfied from the foregoing authorities that the court erred in issuing the injunction. Some questions respecting the service of papers or process have been discussed by counsel, but the transcript does not contain the facts which are essential to their decision, and we will presume that there was no irregularity. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the judgment and order be reversed, and that the cause be remanded, with instructions to dissolve said injunction.

SPECT v. SPECT. (No. 14,075.)

EJECTMENT AGAINST MORTGAGEE IN POSSESSION.

One claiming through a mortgagor who has placed his mortgagee in possession cannot maintain ejectment against the mortgagee while the mortgage debt remains unsatisfied, even though an action thereon by the mortgagee is barred by the statute of limitations.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. BRIDGEFORD, Judge.

B. F. Howard and S. G. Tomkins, for appellant. H. M. Albery and W. G. Dias, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant in her answer to a complaint in ejectment, which was in the ordinary form, denied all its allegations, and, "for a separate and equitable defense to plaintiff's action, and for the purpose of obtaining equitable relief herein," alleged that in October, 1875, Jonas Spect, who was then the owner and in possession of the demanded premises, conveyed the same to one Montgomery; that in October, 1876, said Jonas Spect borrowed from the defendant the sum of $2,200, and executed to her his promissory note therefor; that on the 2d day of January, 1877, he procured said Montgomery to convey the demanded premises to her, and that at the same time, and as a part of the same transaction, an agreement was entered into between herself and said Jonas Spect declaring that said conveyance was made as security for the payment of said promissory note; "that by virtue of said conveyance from Montgomery, and said agreement, and by the consent of said Jonas Spect, defendant took possession of the demanded premises, and has ever since remained and is now in actual possession of the same, claiming them as her own; that no part of said $2,200 has ever been paid, principal or interest, but the whole thereof is now due and unpaid, amounting to $5,632;" and prayed judgment that plaintiff's complaint be dismissed. The action was tried by the court, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff. The court made findings of the facts alleged in the complaint, and incorporated therein the following statement with reference to the equitable defense set up in the answer: "The court declines to find on the fact whether or not defendant has a mortgage lien on the premises in controversy, for the reason that the court is of the opinion that it is not necessary for the disposition of the issues involved in this case to find upon that matter, this being an action of ejectment, and the only question involved being the right to the possession of the premises described in plaintiff's complaint." The defendant has appealed directly from the judgment, and presents as a ground for its reversal that the court failed to find upon the issues presented by her equitable defense.

Inasmuch as the court gives as its reason for not making findings upon these issues that such findings were immaterial, we must assume that evidence was introduced at the trial sufficient to support the allegations, and therefore the rule announced in Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 23 Pac. Rep. 1098, had no application. If the facts alleged by the defendant constitute a defense to the cause of action set forth in the complaint, they presented material issues upon which the court should have made findings, and a failure to do so was error which will require a reversal of the judgment.

The court does not find by what means the plaintiff became the owner of the demanded premises, but, as it is alleged in the equitable defense above named that Jonas Spect was the owner at the time he made the conveyance to Montgomery, we must assume that the plaintiff's title is derived under him, and is therefore subject to whatever incumbrance was created by the foregoing facts in favor of the defendant, and that the plaintiff can assert no greater rights to the premises than could Jonas Spect himself, were he the plaintiff herein. It may also be assumed, although it does not appear in the record that such point was presented to the court below, that the defendant's right of action upon the debt for which this mortgage was given to her was barred by the statute of limitations. The question to be determined is, "Can a mortgagor, who has placed his mortgagee in possession of the mortgaged premises, maintain ejectment against him while the debt for which the mortgage was given remains unsatisfied, even though an action by the mortgagee for the recovery of the debt is barred by the statute of limitations?" Section 2927 of the Civil Code declares that "a mortgage does not entitle the mortgagee to the possession of the property, unless authorized by the express terms of the mortgage, but after the execution of the mortgage the mortgagor may agree to such change of possession without a new consideration." The right of the mortgagee to take possession of the mortgaged premises does not depend upon the statute. The mortgagor could at all times, even by a parol agreement, give to his mortgagee this additional security. Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 589; Edwards v. Wray, 11 Biss. 251.¹ In taking such possession the mortgagee does not thereby acquire any estate in the land, or obtain for his mortgage any higher character or any different or greater protection than it would otherwise have possessed. In any action to enforce the mortgage, or to collect the debt for which it was given as security, the mortgagee has no additional rights by reason of the fact that he is in possession of the mortgaged premises with the consent of the mortgagor. Such possession does, however, give him rights in addition to those conferred by the mortgage. It is an additional security for the debt, which he is entitled to retain in accordance with the terms under which it was received. This right to retain the possession of the land is not coincident with a right to foreclose his mortgage, or dependent upon such right, but depends solely upon the existence of the debt. The possession of the land is a special security for the debt, distinct and separate from the mortgage, which has been conferred by an act of the debtor, and the right to retain the same is independent of and distinct from any right springing from the mortgage. A mortgage is defined by section 2920 of the Civil Code to be "a contract by which specific property is hypothecated for the performance of an act, without the necessity of a change of possession." The use of the term "hypothecate" signifies that possession is not an incident of the mortgage, and that the fact of possession is entirely distinct from the contract of hypothecation. When, therefore, in addition to the contract of hypothecation, the debtor gives to his creditor the possession of the mortgaged premises, he thereby, in addition to the mortgage which he has executed, pledges to him the land also as security for the debt, and confers upon him such rights as are incident to a pledge.

The common law recognized this species of landed security. It was there called vadium vivum, as distinguished from the vadium mortuum. This is defined by Chancellor Kent to be: "When the creditor takes the estate to hold and enjoy it without any limited time for redemption, and until he repays himself out of the rents and profits. In that case the land survives the debt, and when the debt is discharged the land by right of reverter returns to the original owner." 4 Kent, Comm. 187; 2 Bl. Comm. 157; Co. Litt. 205a. The holding of the land in pledge is like the holding of any other pledge. Until the debt is repaid the owner of the pledge cannot recover it from the creditor. The holder of personal property given as security for a debt is entitled to retain the same from the owner until the debt is satisfied, even though the statute of limitations has barred all right of action to recover the debt. Jones v. Bank, 4 Rob. (N. Y.) 221.

Under the same principle the mortgagee in possession is entitled to retain such possession until the debt is paid. "The mortgagee's right, being in possession, to defend himself against an ejectment by the mortgagor, is but a right to retain the possession of the pledge for the purpose of paying the debt. Such a right is but the incident of the debt, and has no relation to a title or estate in the lands." Kortright v. Cady, 21 N. Y. 364. "On the same principle that the party who holds goods in pledge for a debt may retain these goods, even after an action at law upon such debt has been barred, the party who has got rightful possession of land mortgaged may retain possession thereof until his debt is paid, although he can bring no action to enforce the debt." Henry v. Mining Co., 1 Nev. 622. In Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 625, it is said: "When possession is taken by the mortgagee after condition broken by consent of the mortgagor, it will be presumed, in the absence of clear proof to the contrary, to be with the understanding that the mortgagee is to receive the rents and profits, and apply them to the payment of the debt secured. There is, indeed, no other good reason why the mortgagee should be let into possession in preference to any other party, and, unless a limitation to the period of possession is fixed at the time, it will be considered as extending until the satisfaction of the debt. Having thus entered, the mortgagee can hold against the mortgagor and all others until such satisfaction is obtained."

The rights which grow out of the relations existing between mortgagor and mortgagee, as well as the remedies for the enforcement and protection of those rights, are of equitable origin, and are to be determined by the principles of equity, whether the right be asserted or the remedy sought in an action at law or in equity. These principles, when once established, become the guidance of courts of law as well as of equity, even in those countries where the tribunals of law and equity are distinct. It was said by Lord REDFORD: "The distinction between strict law and equity is never in any country a permanent distinction. Law and equity are in continual progression, and the former is constantly gaining ground upon the latter. A great part of what is now strict law was formerly considered as equity, and the equitable decisions of this age will unavoidably be ranked under the strict law of the next." Section 307, Code Civil Proc., declares: "There is in this state but one form of civil actions for the enforcement or protection of private rights and the redress or prevention of private wrongs." While all distinctions in the form of actions are abolished, yet the principles upon which the rights of parties are to be determined remain to guide the judgment of the court. Courts look to the substantial rights of the parties for the purpose of determining the remedy to which they are entitled, irrespective of the form of the complaint under which the remedy is sought. Whenever a mortgagor seeks a remedy against his mortgagee which appears to the court to be inequaltable, whether it be to cancel the mortgage as a cloud upon his title, (Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. Rep. 225,) or to enjoin a sale under the power given by him in the security, (Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 298,) or to recover from the mortgagee the possession of the mortgaged premises, the court will deny him the relief he seeks, except upon the condition that he shall do that which is consonant with equity. In accordance with these principles, it is a settled rule that a mortgagor cannot maintain ejectment against his mortgagee until the debt is paid. Phyle v. Riley, 15 Wend. 248; Hubbell v. Moulson, 53 N. Y. 225; Fee v. Swingly, 6 Mont. 596, 13 Pac. Rep. 375; Roberts v. Sutherland, 4 Or. 220; Cooke v. Cooper, 18 Or. 142, 22 Pac. Rep. 945; Frink v. Le Roy, 49 Cal. 314; Tallman v. Ely, 6 Wis. 244; Brinkman v. Jones, 44 Wis. 512; Sahler v. Signer, 44 Barb. 614; Madison Ave. Church v. Oliver St. Church, 78 N. Y. 82; Den v. Wright, 7 N. J. Law, 175; Wells v. Van Dyke, 109 Pa. St. 385; Duke v. Reed, 64 Tex. 705; 1 Jousé, Mortg. § 715.

The debt is not satisfied or paid by mere lapse of time. The statute of limitations is a bar to the remedy only, and does not extinguish, or even impair, the obligation of the debtor. It is available in judicial proceedings only as a defense, and can never be asserted as a cause of action in his behalf, or for conferring upon him a right of action. It is to be used as a shield, and not as a sword. "It has never been held that the expiration of the statutory time for bringing an action to recover a debt, or to enforce any personal obligation, operated either as an extinguishment or payment. Such a result cannot be derived from the language of our statute, the reason or policy of the law, or the decisions of courts in this state or elsewhere." Grant v. Burr, 54 Cal. 301. The mortgagee, after the mortgage debt has been barred by the statute of limitations, cannot, by any affirmative proceedings on his part, invoke the aid of the court for the collection of the debt; but, if the mortgagor has placed him in the possession of the land mortgaged, he does not lose the right thus conferred upon him, and can resist any action by the mortgagor to deprive him of this security. In Frink v. Le Roy, 49 Cal. 314, a decree of foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises was entered in 1859. Thereupon Le Roy, one of the mortgagees, took possession of the premises under an agreement between the parties that he might do so, and apply the rents to the satisfaction of the judgment. In 1870, Frink, who had succeeded to the interest of the mortgagor in the premises, brought an action in ejectment against Le Roy for their recovery. Le Roy in his answer, by way of equitable defense, set up the mortgage, the judgment foreclosing the same, and the agreement under which he had taken possession. To this defense the plaintiff pleaded the statute of limitations. Upon an appeal from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, the supreme court held that the statute of limitations had no application, and that Le Roy's right to remain in possession under the agreement was not affected by it.

saying that "the equity of Le Roy to be maintained in possession until satisfaction of the debt is not lost from the fact that for upwards of ten years he has been in the actual possession of that of which he is now sought to be deprived." In Hubbell v. Moulson, 53 N. Y. 225, it was held that the mortgagor could not maintain an action in ejectment against the mortgagee for the mortgaged premises, even though he could prove at the trial that the mortgagee had received from the lands sufficient rents and profits to satisfy the debt; that such receipt did not ipso facto satisfy the mortgage and discharge its lien, but was in the nature of an equitable set-off to the amount due upon the mortgage debt; and that until after a judicial determination had been had upon an accounting in equity, and the application of these receipts decreed by the court in satisfaction of the debt, the mortgage was not satisfied. Section 346, Code Civil Proc., provides that "an action to redeem a mortgage of real property, with or without an account of rents and profits, may be brought by the mortgagor, or those claiming under him, against the mortgagee in possession, or those claiming under him, unless he or they have continuously maintained an adverse possession of the mortgaged premises for five years after breach of some condition of the mortgage." If the mortgagor could maintain ejectment against his mortgagee, after the debt for which the mortgage was given had become barred by the statute of limitations, he would have no need to bring an action to redeem the mortgage; and, if the mortgagee had maintained an adverse possession of the mortgaged premises for five years after the breach of some condition of the mortgage, such adverse possession would be a complete defense to the action of ejectment. Mere lapse of time does not constitute adverse possession, but, if the mortgagor could maintain ejectment as soon as the right of action upon the debt was barred by the statute of limitations, the provisions of this section would be meaningless. It follows, from a consideration of the principles which we have herein stated, that the equitable defense alleged by the defendant was, if sustained by proofs, sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's right of recovery; and that the failure of the court to make findings upon the issues so presented was error, for which the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

DESCENT—DETERMINATION OF HEIRSHIP—JURISDICTION—DEPOSITIONS—APPEAL.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 22, 23, providing that an action is an ordinary proceeding for the enforcement or protection of a right, or the redress or prevention of a wrong, and every other remedy is a special proceeding, the determination of the heirship of claimants to an estate by the superior court is a special proceeding, and under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1664, conferring jurisdiction, and providing that any person claiming to be an heir to deceased, or entitled to distribution, may, "after the expiration of one year" from the issuing of letters of administration, petition the court to determine the rights of persons to the estate, and to whom distribution shall be made, the court acquires no jurisdiction where the petition is filed within a year from the issuing of letters of administration.

2. The supreme court will not dismiss an appeal from a judgment of the superior court on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding, if it assumed jurisdiction, and rendered an affirmative judgment.

3. The deposition of "James M. T.," taken under a commission to take the deposition of "Jno. T.," is not competent evidence.

4. The admission of such deposition, where it is as to a material fact, is ground for reversal, though there is other competent evidence of the same fact.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; J. W. WALLING, Judge.

John Caldwell for appellants. P. F. Simonds and James A. Stidger, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. William Westerfield died intestate in Nevada county, October 16, 1888, and on the 29th of that month letters of administration upon his estate were issued out of the superior court of that county to the public administrator. February 27, 1889, the plaintiffs herein filed in said superior court their petition in the matter of said estate for a determination by the court of the interests of all parties in the estate, and to whom distribution thereof should be made, and that upon final hearing thereof they be declared to be the sole heirs of said estate, and that the estate be distributed to them. Thereupon, upon the same day, the court made an order that notice be given requiring all persons claiming to be interested in said estate to appear before said court on the 20th day of May, 1889, and exhibit their respective claims of heirship or other interest in said estate, and directing that said notice be personally served "on all persons herein named, and all other persons known as claiming any interest in said estate, at least thirty days before the time fixed for said appearance;" and further directing that "service of said notice be made on all said persons claiming interest in said estate by publication thereof in the Daily Transcript, a newspaper published in said Nevada county, and that said publication be made at least once a week for seventy consecutive days before the time herein named for such appearance." At the time of filing said petition and making said order no person had appeared claiming any interest in the said estate other than the petitioners, nor were any other persons "named" in said petition or order. Notice, as required by said order, was on the same day issued by the clerk of the court, and on the 27th day of May, 1889, the court made its order and decree, stating that "due and legal notice to all persons claiming an interest in said estate as heirs at law of said deceased or otherwise has been given, and that the same is established of record, and that this decree be entered in the minutes of this court." At various dates prior to July 22, 1889, the plaintiffs and the defendants herein filed their appearance and respective claims of heirship, and on that day the court made an order adjudging "that the default of all such persons that have not appeared herein as aforesaid be, and the same is hereby, entered according to law." On the 30th day of July, 1889, the plaintiffs herein filed their complaint in the matter of said estate, setting forth their claims of heirship thereto, and making as defendants the persons who had previously appeared undersaid notice, and filed their claims of heirship to said estate. The defendants thereafter filed answers to said complaint, setting forth therein the facts constituting their claims of heirship, and praying that they be declared to be the heirs at law of the deceased, and entitled to the distribution of his estate. The matter was thereafter tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered that the plaintiffs "are not and were not relatives of said William Westerfield, deceased, and are not entitled to be decreed his heirs at law;" and also that the respondents herein "are the lawful heirs at law of said William Westerfield, deceased, and, as such, entitled to inherit his estate." This judgment was entered January 3, 1890, and the plaintiffs, having made a motion for a new trial upon a statement of the case, and the same having been denied, have appealed from both the judgment and the order denying the new trial.

Section 1664, Code Civil Proc., provides that "any person claiming to be heir to the deceased, or entitled to distribution in whole or in any part of such estate, may at any time after the expiration of one year from the issuing of letters testamentary or of administration upon such estate file a petition in the matter of such estate, praying the court to ascertain and declare the rights of all persons to said estate, and all interests therein, and to whom distribution thereof should be made." The section further provides that "upon the filing of said petition the court shall make an order directing service of notice to all persons interested in said estate to appear and show cause on a day to be therein named;" and, after prescribing the character of the notice to be given, declares: "Which notice shall be served in the same manner as a summons in a civil action; upon proof of which service, by affidavit or otherwise, to the satisfaction of the court, the court shall thereupon acquire jurisdiction to ascertain and determine the heirship, ownership, and interest of all parties in and to the property of said deceased." Proceedings for the administration of the estates of deceased persons and for their distribution to those who may be entitled thereto, including the determination of the heirs of the decedent, are purely statutory. The superior court, while sitting as a court of probate, has only such powers as are given it by statute, and such incidental powers as pertain to all courts for the purpose of enabling them to exercise the jurisdiction which is conferred upon them. Although it is a court of general jurisdiction, yet in the exercise of these powers its jurisdiction is limited and special; and whenever its acts are shown to have been in excess of the power conferred upon it, or without the limits of this special jurisdiction, such acts are nugatory, and have no binding effect, even upon those who have invoked its authority, or submitted to its decision. The authority conferred upon the superior court by the above section to determine the heirship of claimants to an estate is a "special proceeding," within the meaning of that term as defined in the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 22, Id., declares that "an action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice by which one party prosecutes another for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or punishment of a public offense;" and section 23 of the same Code declares that "every other remedy is a special proceeding." Jurisdiction of special proceedings is conferred by the constitution upon the superior court; but, inasmuch as special proceedings are only such as are created and authorized by statute, the court, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, is limited by the terms and conditions under which the proceedings were authorized. It is stated in the briefs of both appellants and respondents that this may be regarded as a contest to determine heirship under the general provisions of the probate law, preparatory to the final distribution of said estate. We have not been referred, however, to any section of the Code which authorizes such proceeding other than section 1664; and, as we have above shown, unless authorized by statute, the superior court has no power by virtue of its general jurisdiction in cases at law and in equity to entertain a proceeding of this character. Section 1664, Id., provides that distribution of an estate may be made on the settlement of the final account, provided a petition therefor has been filed with said account, and section 1665, Id., provides that at any time subsequent to the final settlement of the account distribution may be made. Whenever distribution is sought under either of these sections the court has power to inquire into and determine who are the heirs of the deceased and entitled to receive the estate; but the terms of each of these sections show that this power can be exercised only after the final accounts of the administrator have been settled.

In view of the principles above stated, and of the statute under which the proceedings herein were had, it results that the superior court had no jurisdiction to entertain the petition of the plaintiffs, or to determine who were the legal heirs of the deceased. The petition of the plaintiffs, under which the court proceeded to act and to render judgment, was filed in the superior court within less than four months after the issuance of letters of administration upon the estate of the deceased; and the complaint and answers upon which the issues were tried were all filed before the expiration of the year. The court, however, had no jurisdiction to entertain any petition for this purpose, or to make any order that would be binding upon the heirs of the deceased, or upon those who may claim to be such heirs, until "after the expiration of one year from the issuing of letters of administration upon said estate." It does not appear from the record that the respondents made any objection in the court below to its want of jurisdiction, but they now ask that the appeal be dismissed upon the ground that the proceeding was instituted before the expiration of a year after the issuance of the letters of administration upon the estate of the deceased. This court will not, however, dismiss an appeal from a judgment of the superior court upon the ground that that court had no jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding when it has assumed such jurisdiction, and rendered an affirmative judgment therein. Our appellate jurisdiction over the judgments of the superior court includes those in which that court improperly assumed jurisdiction, as well as those in which it was properly entertained. It is revisory of the action of that court, and is to be exercised by affirming, correcting, modifying, or setting aside its judgments; whereas, if the appeal therefrom is dismissed, the judgment would remain as originally pronounced. Section 1664, supra, provides, however, that "all appeals herein must be taken within sixty days from the date of the entry of the judgment or the order complained of." The judgment herein was entered January 3, 1890, and the appeal therefrom was not taken until June 2, 1890. It follows, therefore, that by reason of the failure to take the appeal from the judgment until more than 60 days after its entry we have no jurisdiction of that appeal, and it must be dismissed.

The appeal from the order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial was, however, taken within 60 days after its entry, and can, therefore, be reviewed by us. A commission was issued out of the superior court to Orris C. Cobb to take the depositions of several witnesses named therein, one of whom was "Jno. Thompson," of Cincinnati, state of Ohio. At the trial of the cause the respondents offered to read in evidence the deposition of James M. Thompson, taken under said commission, to which the appellants objected on the ground that the commission to Cobb did not authorize him to take the deposition of James M. Thompson, but to take that of one John Thompson. Upon this objection being made, J. C. McBurney testified on behalf of the respondents that he presented them in the matter of taking said deposition, and was personally acquainted with said James M. Thompson at the time of the issuance of the commission to take his deposition, and that "the name intended to be inserted in said commission was James M. Thompson, and the person designated as John Thompson in said commission was identical." It was not shown, however, that this fact was known by or ever communicated to the appellants, and the difference in the names would presumptively indicate different persons. The court overruled their objections, and allowed the deposition to be read. This ruling was erroneous. The commissioner had no authority to take the testimony of any person other than those named in the commission, and the testimony of any person not so named was not properly taken by him, and should not have been received in evidence. The real name of the person whom the defendants intended to examine under the commission should have been given to the plaintiffs and inserted in the commission, in order that the plaintiffs might intelligently prepare their cross-interrogatories. This not having been done, the taking of the testimony of James M. Thompson was, so far as they were concerned, purely ex parte, and should have no effect against them in determining the issues in the case. Brown v. Southworth, 9 Paige, 851; Scholes v. Ackerland, 13 Ill. 650; Strayer v. Wilson, 54 Iowa, 565, 7 N. W. Rep. 7; Denny v. Horton, 11 Daly, 861; Patterson v. Railway Co., 54 Mich. 91, 19 N. W. Rep. 766. In Brown v. Southworth, supra, a commission had been issued to take the testimony of James Hurd, whereas the true name of the witness who was intended to be examined, and who in fact was examined, was Imus Hurd. The court, upon the objection of the defendant, excluded the deposition upon the ground that, "owing to the mistake in his Christian name, he was not one of the witnesses that the commissioners were authorized to examine, and would not, therefore, by the laws of any country, be guilty of perjury if his deposition was false." In Scholes v. Ackerland, supra, a commission had been issued to take the testimony of Seymour Rank of Cincinnati. The deposition of Seigmund Rank, and signed "Seigmund Rank," was taken, and returned with the commission. The supreme court held that it was error in the trial court to admit the deposition in evidence, saying: "The dedimus directed the commissioner to take the testimony of one person, and under it the deposition of another person was taken. The special authority was not pursued. The names were essentially variant, and clearly indicated different individuals." We cannot agree with the respondents that, inasmuch as other witnesses testified to the same fact, this was an immaterial error. One of the issues presented for trial in the case, and which was sharply contested on both sides, was whether the name of the plaintiff's father was "Westfield" or "Westersfield." The respondents alleged in their answer that the true name of the plaintiff's father was Charles Westfield, and the court found that the plaintiffs are "the issue of Charles Westfield and Mary Westfield, his wife." It was for the purpose of establishing this fact that the defendants issued the commission to take the testimony of the witnesses at Cincinnati. This is not a case where an incidental and collateral fact which may not be seriously contested had been shown by incompetent evidence, but the testimony of the witness bore directly upon the main point in issue. In such a case all the evidence upon that point becomes material, and the introduction of any incompetent testimony is presumed to cause an injury to the opposite party. We cannot determine the weight which the court below gave to the testimony of this witness in reaching its conclusion upon this controverted point. If the respondents believe that this testimony of the witness was unnecessary for the purpose of establishing their case, they should have declined to introduce it after the objection had been made thereto. They cannot now, after insisting upon a ruling in their favor, and introducing the testimony, say that the error was harmless.

Other errors appear from the statement of the case to have been assigned by the appellants, but, inasmuch as the error in receiving in evidence the above deposition necessitates the reversal of the order denying a new trial, and in view of what we have said upon the jurisdiction of the superior court to entertain the proceeding, it is unnecessary to pass upon the correctness of the other rulings of the court which were excepted to by the plaintiffs. The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, the order of the court below denying a new trial is reversed, and that court directed to enter an order dismissing the petition of the plaintiffs, and all proceedings subsequently taken thereunder.

ABDUCTION—COMMITMENT.

1. An order of commitment for taking a female away for the purpose of prostitution "from her father, mother, guardian, or other person having the legal charge of her person," in violation of Pen. Code Cal. § 267, need not recite that the father, mother, or guardian had legal charge of the female's person, since the law gives them such charge.

2. A defect in the commitment in describing the offense is immaterial if it is sufficiently described in the order indorsed on the deposition.

3. Evidence that a woman took a girl 17 years old to a house of prostitution, to act as a domestic, warrants her commitment for taking the girl for the purpose of prostitution.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

B. B. Haskell, for petitioner.

BEATTY, C. J. The petitioner is held in the custody of the chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco under a commitment which recites an order of the police judge holding her to answer "on a charge of felony, to-wit, enticing a minor away for the purpose of prostitution, committed as follows: said Cora Estrado did, in the city and county of San Francisco, on the 26th day of February, 1891, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously take away a certain female under the age of eighteen years,"—naming her,—“of the age of seventeen years, from her father, for the purpose of prostitution. It is claimed that the imprisonment of the petitioner is unlawful for two reasons: First, because the order recited in the commitment does not show that the father of the girl, from whom she was taken, had the legal care of her person; and, second, because the evidence adduced at the examination does not show any reasonable or probable cause for holding that the petitioner is guilty of the offense charged.

The first ground is not alleged in the petition upon which the writ was issued, but is taken by way of objection to the return, and rests upon counsel's construction of section 267 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: "Sec. 267. Every person who takes away any female under the age of eighteen years from her father, mother, guardian, or other person having the legal charge of her person, without their consent, for the purpose of prostitution, is liable to imprisonment in the state-prison not exceeding five years, and a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars." According to the construction of this section contended for, it is not sufficient to allege and prove that a girl has been taken away from her father, mother, or guardian; it must also be alleged that the father, mother, or guardian had the legal charge of her person. But a father, mother, or guardian necessarily has the legal charge of the person of a minor child or ward, and the true construction of the statute only requires averment and proof of legal custody when the child is taken from some other person. Moreover, a defect in the commitment in describing the offense is immaterial if it is sufficiently described in the order indorsed on the deposition. (Ex parte Keil, 85 Cal. 309, 24 Pac. Rep. 742, and cases cited;) and it is not alleged in this case, either in the petition or by way of traverse to the return, that a sufficient order was not so indorsed.

The second ground relied on is, if possible, more barren of merit than the first. We note in passing, that the petition, so far as this ground is concerned, was wholly insufficient to call for the issuance of the writ under the decision in Ex parte Walpole, 84 Cal. 584, 24 Pac. Rep. 808. But the writ was issued, and on the return enough of the deposition was read to show that the petitioner induced a girl of 17 years to go to a house of prostitution for the ostensible purpose of domestic service. She did not disclose to the girl or her father what the character of the place was. It is contended that this does not show that the purpose of taking the girl to the house was to make her a prostitute; but clearly such evidence would sustain a verdict against the petitioner. It is not to be supposed that a procurer will furnish direct and positive proof of her guilt by openly proposing a life of shame to a girl that she is seeking to lead astray. On the contrary, every motive of policy will conspire to induce her to pursue a course of discretion in carrying out her design, and she is judged not by what she says so much as by what she does. People v. Marshall, 59 Cal. 386. If a person is to be presumed to intend the natural consequences of his acts, it is certainly fair to presume that when a woman takes a young girl, without the knowledge or consent of her parents, and puts her to work as a domestic servant in a house of prostitution, she intends to lead her to take up that sort of life; for it is very certain that amidst such surroundings she cannot long preserve either reputation or modesty.

And a court should look with extreme suspicion upon such an excuse as the petitioner offers for her conduct. To treat it with any favor would make the nefarious traffic of which she is accused easy and safe, when it ought to be made difficult and dangerous. An example which would enforce the lesson that domestic servants for such places are to be sought outside of the ranks of immature girls, would be extremely salutary. The prisoner is remanded.

BARNHART V. KRON. (No. 13,233.)

COSTS—ALLOWANCE.

The allowance of costs is in the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be disturbed on the ground that items of expense allowed against appellant were incurred by his co-defendant only, unless the record shows that the items were not incurred partly by appellant, or for his benefit.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCANN, Judge.

E. Spalshury and W. E. Turner, for appellant. T. H. Laine and Wm. T. Jeter, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff moved the court below to retax the bill of costs filed by the respondent, by striking out each and every item thereof, upon the ground that none of said items were incurred by the respondent in maintaining or establishing any part of his defense to the action, but that each of said items was so incurred by his co-defendant. The court denied the motion, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The allowance or disallowance of items for the expenses and disbursements incurred upon the trial of an action must be left, in nearly every instance, to the discretion of the judge before whom the cause was tried. He has an opportunity to know the issues that are tried, the character of the prosecution and of the defense, the principal points upon which the witnesses are called, and whether there existed any necessity for calling them. We must assume that he would not allow costs to a party for witnesses that were unnecessarily called, or, in a case like the present, for witnesses who were not called for the respondent. There is nothing in the record in the present case which shows that the court did not properly exercise its discretion in refusing to strike out the items objected to. The plaintiff does not in his affidavit show that the witnesses named in the bill of costs were not necessary for the defense of the respondent, or that they did not testify in his behalf. His statement that certain of the witnesses were called as witnesses for the co-defendant of the respondent, and did not testify on behalf of the respondent, "except in a general manner in connection with H. F. Kron, * * * and that they did not testify on behalf of Oscar Kron, as contradistinguished from H. F. Kron," is an admission that they did in some respects, or upon some matters, testify in behalf of the respondent. So, too, his statement that other witnesses "did not testify as to any separate issue, as made by the answer of Oscar Kron," does not sufficiently show that the items for their defense as witnesses should be stricken from the cost-bill. The character of their testimony at the trial is not a test of the necessity for incurring the expense of subpoenaing them as witnesses. The memorandum of costs filed by the respondent is supported by the affidavit of his attorney that "the foregoing items of costs and disbursements in this action are correct, and that the said disbursements have been necessarily incurred in said action," and, unless controverted, should control the decision of the court. The fact that the items for the fees of the sheriff, the clerk, and the reporter were for services performed for both defendants, and not "for services performed for Oscar Kron alone," would not authorize the court to strike these items from the cost-bill. The respondent may have himself paid all of these items, and, if so, they were expenses necessarily incurred by him in his defense. The order appealed from is affirmed.

INJUNCTION—RELIEF AGAINST EXECUTION—LACHES.

Where defendants consent to waive all defenses, and confess judgment on the strength of a verbal agreement that plaintiffs will stay execution for a year, they cannot enjoin a sale under the execution which plaintiffs levied before the end of the year, being guilty of laches in standing by and permitting the execution to be levied without moving the court to recall it. Affirming Moulton v. Knapp, 85 Cal. 385, 24 Pac. Rep. 808.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge.

E. G. Knapp, T. Z. Blakeman, and Wright & Hazen, for appellant. Turner & Maddux and J. H. Budd, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. In Moulton v. Knapp, 85 Cal. 385, 24 Pac. Rep. 808, (this cause,) an injunction had been granted on verified complaint alone. It was held that plaintiffs' remedy, if any they had, was by motion to set aside the execution, and to stay all process until the expiration of the year; that plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction. That decision is the law of the case, and is conclusive of the question involved in this appeal. The judgment appealed from is based upon the complaint on which the preliminary injunction referred to was granted, and decrees to plaintiff the relief therein prayed for. Judgment reversed.

(No. 14,092.)

SPECIAL ACTS—SCHOOL-DISTRICTS—OFFICERS.

1. There being nothing in the old constitution of California which prevented special legislation, Pol. Code Cal. § 1593, providing that "the number of school trustees for any school-district, except where city boards are otherwise authorized by law, shall be three," did not prevent the passage of Act Cal. March 25, 1874, creating the Nevada school-district, and providing for the election of its directors, and the latter act controls.

2. Const. Cal. art. 4, § 25, prohibiting the legislature from passing local or special laws in certain cases, does not affect past legislation.

SHARPSTEIN, J., dissenting.

J. J. Caldwell, for appellant. Niles Searls and P. F. Simonds, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action is brought in the name of the Nevada school-district; and its purpose is to have the court decree that the defendants deliver all the lots, buildings, and school-houses in the city of Nevada, used for the purpose of conducting the public schools, into the possession of George E. Shaw, J. I. Caldwell, and N. Douglas, who claim to have been recently elected school trustees of said district. The defendants, all but two, are the persons who are the regularly elected and acting school directors of said district, under an act of the legislature, approved March 25, 1874, entitled "An act to establish and define the powers and duties of the board of education of Nevada school-district," and the other two are the janitor and watchman under said other defendants. The point relied on by appellant is that said act of March 25, 1874, under which the board of education of Nevada City has been acting for more than 16 years, is unconstitutional, and totally void. We do not think that the position taken by appellant is tenable. There is nothing in the old constitution which prevented special legislation, (Meade v. Watson, 67 Cal. 591, 8 Pac. Rep. 311;) and therefore the fact that when the said act was passed section 1593 of the Political Code provided that "the number of school-trustees for any school-district, except where city boards are otherwise authorized by law, shall be three," did not prevent the legislature from subsequently creating the Nevada district. The latest expression of the legislative will on the special subject in hand controls. The provision of the present constitution,¹ that the legislature shall not pass local or special laws in certain cases, applies to future, and not to past, legislation. Ex parte Burke, 59 Cal. 6. Neither do we think that the act is void because inconsistent with any of the provisions of the present constitution. The judgment is affirmed.

SHARPSTEIN, J., dissenting.

RAILROAD COMPANIES — INJURIES TO PERSON ON TRACK—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. Where a person, seeing a train advancing on a track located within three feet from a high station platform, hurriedly crosses, and stands between the track and platform for the train to pass, she is guilty of contributory negligence, and cannot recover for injuries by being struck by the train.

2. In an action for injuries in such case there cannot be a recovery, notwithstanding plaintiff's negligence, on the ground that defendant's employes saw her dangerous position, and failed to stop the train and allow her to move, if the complaint merely alleges negligence on defendant's part, and not willful and wanton negligence.

BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

E. L. Craig and Horace Hawes, for appellant. Justin Jacobs and W. A. Gray, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This was an action for damages for personal injuries. The plaintiff had a verdict and judgment for $5,000, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying its motion for a new trial. The following are the material facts: The accident occurred at Leemore, a small town between Tulare and Huron, in the afternoon of February 13, 1889. The plaintiff had gone to the depot with a friend, one Miss Furnish, to bid good-bye to an acquaintance, one Mrs. Shively, who took the freight train which passed Leemore about that time. The general features of the locality are as follows: The main track ran east and west. Almost parallel with it, and a few feet to the south, was a side switch, which ran along a platform about four feet high, and came into the main track a little further to the east. The platform was about 100 feet long, and about 3 feet from the first rail of the side switch. The train was headed towards the east. Its forward part, consisting of the engine and some flat-cars, uncoupled from the caboose, (which was left standing on the main track opposite the platform,) for the purpose of taking on some box-cars which were on the western end of the side switch. Mrs. Shively got into the caboose, and the plaintiff and Miss Furnish, having taken leave of her, started to go around by the western end of the platform to the street which crosses the track there. They changed their minds, however, and went towards the western end. By this time the engine and the platform cars were backing down the side switch, and plaintiff was aware of the fact. She says: "I knew the train was switching before I crossed, but I thought I had time to escape any danger." "And I thought that the space between the cars—I had never paid any particular attention to that—and I thought the space between the cars and the platform would be wide enough that I could walk right along without being injured in the least." She "crossed the switch just at the end of the box-cars." Miss Furnish did not cross the switch. In this regard plaintiff says: "At this time Miss Furnish was with me. She did not cross the track with me. I told her I thought we had ample time to get across. I don't know what her answer was exactly. I know she didn't come. I could not say whether she said anything to me about going, or that there was not time to cross the track before the cars came. There was no time for talking. She might have spoke, but I did not hear." Miss Furnish says that she did not cross because she was afraid. There were two brakemen employed on the train. One of them (Ferguson) was on the ground near the box-car for the purpose of signaling the engineer. The other (Williams) was on the end of the flat-car, but got down to make the coupling when the end of the train neared the box-car. He says: "A young lady ran in between the box-car and the flat-car, and I told her to 'get out of there, or you will get hurt;' and she said, 'I am not afraid.'" The fact that he did not say this is corroborated by Miss Furnish, by one Benton, "an engineer and pumper" about the station, and by Mrs. Shively. The plaintiff says that if the brakeman spoke to her she did not hear him, and it is assumed that her statement in this regard is true. After she had crossed the switch she found that she had not time to get around the platform before the end of the train reached her, so she stood with her back against the platform. While standing in this position the flat-cars passed her, but did not touch her; and she does not seem to have been alarmed. In this regard her testimony was as follows: "Question. The brakeman at this time was about six feet from you. Could you not have spoken to the brakeman, and asked him to hold until you could get around the corner? Answer. Yes, sir; I could. Q. Did you attempt to? A. No, sir. Q. Did you do anything but press back against the platform? A. I did not, because I thought I was perfectly safe." The same sense of security appears from her conversation with Mrs. Shively. The latter says: "I looked out the caboose window, and saw the plaintiff standing between the flat-car and the platform. I told her I thought it was a dangerous place where she was. She said she was all right;" and the plaintiff admits that this conversation occurred. The defendant's employees evidently shared plaintiff's opinion that there was no danger, for they paid no further attention to her. The brakeman Williams says: "I went about my work, made the coupling, and Mr. Ferguson, the other brakeman, gave the signal to go ahead. When he gave the signal to go ahead the girl was out of my sight. I did not see her. She must have gone behind the box-car, or I would have seen her." The engineer says he did not see her when he got the signal. And the fireman, who had seen her cross the switch, says: "She disappeared from my sight. I cannot tell which way she went;" and he went on ringing his bell without troubling himself further about the matter. The plaintiff's account does not differ materially from this. Her testimony is as follows: "Question. You did not ask either brakeman to stop the train? Answer. No, sir. Q. But simply pressed back against the platform? A. I did. Q. State whether or not you are positive that both those brakemen saw you. A. I am positive. Q. I ask you now with reference to that. Do you mean to say at this time that both of those brakemen were looking at you at the time the car was coupled, and you were standing here, pressed up against the platform? A. I mean to say that both could have seen me. Q. You mean to say that both could have seen you? A. Yes, sir. Q. You don't mean to swear positively that they were both looking at you at that time? A. I didn't say they were looking at me at the time; but I know positively they both saw me. They saw me standing there. Q. At some time? A. At some time. Q. You don't mean, then, however, to be understood by the jury that at the time the coupling was made, and the signal given to start, that both these brakemen were looking at you in this position? A. I could not say they were looking at me just at that time, but I am positive they both saw me. Q. As I understand you, you are positive that while you were standing there, and the train was coming in, that they saw you over on that side of the car? A. Yes, sir." These extracts show clearly enough that the employees on the train saw the plaintiff go in between the flat-cars and the box-cars, and saw her standing up against the platform as the flat-cars passed her, but paid no further attention to her, apparently sharing her belief that she was safe. But neither she nor they seem to have thought of the fact that the box-cars were wider than the flat-cars. She says: "When the cars began to move I noticed that the box-cars were considerably wider than the flat. Then I fully realized my danger. Not until that time." The first car struck and crushed her shoulder, whereupon she threw herself upon the ground, and the train passed without injuring her further.

All of the foregoing facts appear without substantial contradiction. The only conflict is as to whether she heard the brakeman tell her not to go in there; and for the purposes of the opinion it is assumed that she did not hear him. Upon these facts it seems clear that her own negligence contributed directly and approximately to the injury. She had voluntarily placed herself in a dangerous position,—a position in which, as it turned out, she would be almost certain to be injured by the running of the cars in the ordinary way, and from which her more prudent companion shrank back in fear. Now, if the defendant's employees had not seen her position of danger, the defendant would have owed her no duty to take any particular precaution, and consequently would not have been guilty of negligence. Toomey v. Railroad Co., (Cal.) 24 Pac. Rep. 1074. But the defendant's employees saw her in time to have avoided the accident, and hence were bound to use care. The brakemen ought to have stopped the train, and, if necessary, compelled her to get out of harm's way. They did not do this, and hence are guilty of negligence. But the complaint does not charge that there was anything willful or wanton against the defendant. It simply alleges that the defendant "carelessly and negligently" ran one of its cars against the plaintiff, and this is all that the evidence shows. For this negligence on the part of the defendant plaintiff would have had a cause of action if there had been no contributory negligence on her part; but the rule is that, wherever the negligence of the plaintiff contributed directly and approximately to the injury, there can be no recovery. Such negligence must have contributed to the injury, not remotely, but directly and proximately. Needham v. Railroad Co., 87 Cal. 409; Kline v. Railroad Co., id. 406; Fernandez v. Railroad Co., 52 Cal. 53. But I think that such was the case here. The plaintiff's negligence was certainly not remote in point of time. She voluntarily went into a dangerous place, where she had no right to be; and the brakeman very foolishly allowed her to do so. The fatal mistake after this was in not thinking of the fact that the box-cars were wider than the flat-cars; and this was evidently shared by all the parties. The plaintiff probably was correct in the opinion which she expressed to Mrs. Shively shortly after the accident. "She said it was some of her foolishness,—it was her own fault. I asked her what in the world did she go in there for. She said, 'Some of her own foolishness.'" I think the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: BEICHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

MASON v. VESTAL. (No. 14,001.)

EXECUTION—CLAIMS BY THIRD PERSON—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

1. In an action against an officer for the value of property wrongfully levied on, in which plaintiff claims title by purchase from the execution debtor, defendant may show that the alleged sale was fraudulent, without having alleged fraud in his answer.

2. In such action evidence that the execution debtor, who was a witness for plaintiff, before the trial made statements consistent with his testimony, is not admissible either in rebuttal of proof of inconsistent statements, or of evidence of his bad reputation for veracity.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; CHARLES P. BRAYNARD, Judge.

John F. Ellison and J. T. Matlock, for appellant. A. M. McCoy, Clay W. Taylor, and Jackson Hatch, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The suit was brought against the sheriff to recover for property seized at the suit of L. Newcomer against James Gleason, who is a brother of the plaintiff. The answer denies the title and possession of plaintiff, justifies under the writ, and avers title in Gleason. Plaintiff derives her title from Gleason, and at the trial the controversy was as to the validity of the transfer against her. The questions raised relate almost entirely to alleged erroneous rulings in the admission of evidence tending to establish the bona fides of the sale to plaintiff. On the trial the plaintiff objected to the testimony of defendant on this subject, claiming that the answer did not raise the issue of fraud, and now insists that, if the rulings complained of are erroneous, they are still not injurious for the same reason. It is claimed that the insufficiency of this answer is established by the cases of Albertoli v. Branham, 80 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. Rep. 404, and Sukeforth v. Lord, (Cal.) 25 Pac. Rep. 497. In those cases, however, the defendants did not content themselves with simply denying the right of plaintiff, justifying under a writ, and averring title in the debtor of the attaching creditor, but proceeded to charge the plaintiff with an attempt to assist the debtor in defrauding his creditors. It is not necessary to set up such a defense; it has been held that the defendant is not required to anticipate the source from which plaintiff claims to derive his title, but, if he does proceed to set up the acts of fraud which he charges render plaintiff's title invalid, he must state facts which are sufficient in law to that end. But such plea is entirely unnecessary. A sale made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors is, as to such creditors, absolutely void, and not voidable merely. Section 3439, Civil Code; Freem. Ex'ns, § 136; Butler v. Collins, 12 Cal. 457. When the defendant denies the plaintiff's title, and shows himself to be a creditor, such evidence is admissible in rebuttal of plaintiff's proof of title. It shows such title invalid; that as to defendant the transfer is void. This question was expressly decided in this court in Grum v. Barney, 55 Cal. 254, and in Humphreys v. Harkey, id. 234, and decisions elsewhere accord with these decisions. See Tupper v. Thompson, 26 Minn. 385, 4 N. W. Rep. 621.

James Gleason was a witness for the plaintiff, and gave evidence in support of nearly all the facts constituting plaintiff's case. In rebuttal he was impeached by evidence of statements made by him inconsistent with his testimony, and by showing that his reputation for truth was bad. The plaintiff was then allowed, against the objection of defendant, to prove by other witnesses that he had also made statements consistent with his testimony. When this testimony was objected to, counsel explained the offer, "We propose to prove [statements made?] at a time so far remote that there was no possibility he would foresee it, and which precludes the idea that the story was a fabrication of recent date." Respondent does not claim the right to prove such statements in rebuttal of the statements proved by defendant, but claims that the fact that his witness was impeached by evidence of bad reputation justifies such evidence. The first thing that strikes one upon such a proposition is that this character of evidence does not meet the emergencies of the case. Where a witness is discredited by showing that he is not disinterested, but is testifying under an inducement to misstate the facts, there is some plausibility in the claim that statements to the same effect as his testimony, made before he became interested, tend in some degree to show that his testimony was not affected by this interest. Here the question was whether Gleason was a truthful man, and the evidence had no bearing upon that issue. The doctrine upon this subject is discussed in People v. Doyell, 48 Cal. 90; Barkly v. Copeland, 74 Cal. 1, 15 Pac. Rep. 307; and 1 Greenl. Ev. § 469. These authorities do not support the respondent in this matter, and he has not referred us to any which do. On the hypothesis of the plaintiff, Gleason had no interest in the case, nor could he have had any except upon the theory of the defense that the transaction was an attempt to hide his property from his creditors; and upon that supposition, who can tell how long he had been seeking a cover for his fraud? It is denied that the evidence was material, and it must have been injurious. The trial was before a jury, who found for plaintiff. We think the ruling erroneous. The other alleged errors need not be noticed, as they may not be repeated on a new trial, except the point made that the evidence does not show an immediate delivery. Upon that point we think there was evidence enough to warrant the court in submitting the matter to the jury. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

In re CONSTITUTIONALITY OF A COURT OF APPEALS.

COURT OF APPEALS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. An intermediate court, having appellate and final jurisdiction, can be constitutionally created in Colorado, but it cannot be given appellate jurisdiction in cases within the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court, unless its judgment in such cases is made subject to review by the supreme court.

2. Senate Bill Colo. No. 98, creating "the court of appeals," is constitutional.

Senate bill No. 98 provides:

"Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Colorado: Section 1. No writ of error from, or appeal to, the supreme court shall lie to review the final judgment of any inferior court, unless the judgment, or, in replevin, the value found, exceeds two thousand dollars, exclusive of costs: provided, this limitation shall not apply where the matter in controversy relates to a franchise or freehold, nor where the construction of a provision of the constitution of the state or of the United States is necessary to the determination of a case: provided, further, that the foregoing limitation shall not apply to writs of error to county courts. Sec. 2. There is hereby established a court which shall have appellate jurisdiction only, and which shall be called 'The Court of Appeals.' Said court shall consist of three judges, who shall possess the qualifications required of judges of the supreme court. Sec. 3. Immediately upon the taking effect of this act, the governor shall nominate, and, by and with the consent of the senate, appoint, one judge for the term of two years; one for the term of four years; and one for the term of six years; and biennially thereafter he shall in like manner appoint one judge for the term of six years. The term of office shall begin on the first Wednesday in April next after each regular meeting of the legislature. The judge having the shortest term to serve, not having been appointed to fill a vacancy, shall be the president of the court. Vacancies shall be filled in the same manner as original appointments are required to be made: provided, that, where such vacancies occur during the recess of the senate, the governor shall fill the same by appointment until the next meeting of the senate, when he shall nominate some person to fill such office. Sec. 4. The said court shall have jurisdiction—First. To review the final judgments of inferior courts of record in all civil cases, and in all criminal cases not capital. Second. It shall have final jurisdiction, subject to the limitations stated in subdivision 3 of this section, where the judgment, or, in replevin, the value found, is two thousand dollars or less, exclusive of costs. Third. It shall have jurisdiction, not final, in cases where the controversy involves a franchise or freehold, or where the construction of a provision of the constitution of the state, or of the United States, is necessary to the decision of the case; also in criminal cases, or upon writs of error to the judgments of county courts. Writs of error from, or appeals to, the court of appeals shall lie to review final judgments, within the same time and in the same manner as is now or may hereafter be provided by law for such reviews by the supreme court. Sec. 5. Any cause now pending in the supreme court, within the jurisdiction of the court of appeals, may, by order of the supreme court, upon notice to the parties or their attorneys of record, be transferred to the court of appeals for determination, unless objection to such transfer be interposed within thirty days after service of the notice aforesaid. Sec. 6. The court of appeals shall have power to adopt rules regulating the procedure therein in the same manner and with like effect as the supreme court; provided, that such procedure shall be so far similar to that of the supreme court as in the judgment of the judges of said court of appeals may be practicable. Sec. 7. The court of appeals may issue all necessary and proper writs and other processes in causes within its jurisdiction, in the same manner and with the same effect as the supreme court. It shall be a court of record, and have a seal. Sec. 8. Opinions shall be delivered as may be required of the supreme court, and may be published in like manner and in separate volumes. The reporter of the supreme court shall be the reporter of the court of appeals. Sec. 9. The clerk of the supreme court shall be the clerk of the court of appeals, but shall receive no extra compensation therefor. He may employ such deputies and other clerical assistance as may be required to transact the business of the court: provided, the compensation paid such deputies and assistants shall not exceed the sum of $1,500 a year in the aggregate; and provided, that the amount thus paid shall not exceed the amount of fees in cases in said court. The deputies and assistants shall be paid in the same manner as the deputies and assistants in the business of the supreme court. Sec. 10. Fees shall be fixed in said court in the same manner as in the supreme court. Sec. 11. The judges of the court of appeals shall each receive an annual salary of five thousand dollars, to be paid in the same manner as the salaries of judges of the supreme court are paid. Sec. 12. It shall be the duty of the secretary of state to provide the court and the judges thereof with suitable rooms, stationery, fuel, and other things, in like manner as the supreme court and the judges thereof are provided. Sec. 13. The judges of said court may employ such stenographic and other clerical assistance as may be required for the proper transaction of their duties, at a compensation not greater than that allowed for like services in the supreme court: provided, such compensation shall be paid only out of the fees collected in said court. Sec. 14. Terms of court shall be held at the capitol, at such times as may be fixed for the terms of the supreme court. Sec. 15. Writs of error from, or appeals to, the supreme court shall lie to review every final judgment of the court of appeals in cases which, under this act, might have been taken for review to the supreme court in the first instance. Such writs of error shall be sued out or appeals taken within sixty days after the rendition of the final judgment, and not thereafter. Any case in the court of appeals, not within the final jurisdiction thereof, shall be transferred to the supreme court, upon motion of a plaintiff in error or appellee, made within such time as such party may be by law or rule of court required to file a brief in the case, and such case shall be for hearing in the supreme court the same as if originally taken there, and all bonds or other obligations shall remain in full force and effect. When any such case is taken to the supreme court, all pleadings, papers, abstracts, briefs, and other things pertaining to the case shall be transferred to the supreme court, and new briefs and abstracts shall not be required, except by special rule in particular cases. Appeals shall be perfected, and a writ of error made a supersedeas, in the same manner and under the same conditions as in cases brought from other courts. Sec. 16. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed. Sec. 17. Whereas, an emergency exists, this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage."

The following questions were by the senate submitted to the supreme court for determination: "First. Under the state constitution, can an intermediate court be legally created, having appellate and final jurisdiction? Second. If such a court can be legally created, having co-ordinate jurisdiction with the supreme court in certain classes of cases, what jurisdiction could be conferred, and to what extent as co-ordinate jurisdiction? Third. In what cases could not final jurisdiction be conferred upon such a court by legislative enactment? Fourth. Would a court of appeals with jurisdiction as provided in senate bill No. 98, hereto attached, be obnoxious to any provisions of our constitution?"

PER CURIAM. In response to the interrogatories presented by the state senate touching the creation of a court of appeals, the following conclusions are respectfully submitted:

An intermediate court, having appellate and final jurisdiction, can be legally created. Such a court may, by legislative enactment, be clothed with appellate jurisdiction in cases remaining within the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court, provided its judgments in such cases are made subject to review by the latter court. But no other court can, under the constitution, be given final appellate jurisdiction in cases left by law within the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court. In re Court of Appeals, 9 Colo. 623, 21 Pac. Rep. 471. Under the constitution as amended in the fall of 1886, a court of appeals, as provided in senate bill No. 98, submitted for examination, is not obnoxious, so far as we are advised, to any constitutional objection.

JONES v. MEYERS.

PUBLIC LANDS—CANCELLATION OF FINAL RECEIPTS.

1. The commissioner of the general land-office of the United States has the authority to cancel the final receipt or certificate issued to a pre-emption entryman at any time before patent issues to such entryman upon a proper showing, made in accordance with the rules and regulations of the land department, that said entryman obtained such certificate illegally or fraudulently.

2. The fact that such entryman had sold and conveyed the land so entered to an innocent purchaser would not deprive the commissioner of the authority to cancel an entry illegally or fraudulently made.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from district court, Bear Lake county.

Ejectment to recover the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 33, township 12 S., range 44 E., Boise meridian.

Smith & Smith, for appellant. R. S. Spence and Hawley & Reeves, for respondent.

SULLIVAN, C. J. This is an action in ejectment, brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, to recover possession of certain real estate situated in the county of Bear Lake, in this state. The complaint is the ordinary one in an action of ejectment. The answer is a general denial of the allegations of the complaint, and sets up that defendant is in possession of said land under a homestead entry. The pleadings are not verified. The case was heard in the court below upon the following stipulation of facts: "In the above cause it is stipulated and agreed that the facts are as follows: That about the month of August, 1884, Lauritz Neilson made pre-emption declaratory statement No. 1,362, embracing the land in controversy in this cause, and on the 1st day of October, 1885, made his pre-emption entry and final proof for the land embraced in his declaratory statement, being the lands in controversy in this case and in the case of S. P. Sorrenson v. Emil Meyers, [post, 218.] That he, on that day, purchased said land, and paid $200 therefor, and took patent certificate for the same. That on the 28th day of October, 1886, said Lauritz S. Neilson, together with his wife, Catharine Neilson, by deed of conveyance duly executed and recorded, conveyed the lands described in the complaint to the plaintiff, Thomas W. Jones. That said Thomas W. Jones has never conveyed any of said land to any other person. That said conveyance to Thomas W. Jones was made in consideration of the sum of $200, which had been paid in the month of June or July, 1886. That said purchase was made in good faith by said purchaser on June 7, 1886. That the defendant filed an affidavit in the United States land-office at Oxford, Idaho, charging that Lauritz S. Neilson had failed to comply with the requirements of the pre-emption law in the matter of residence and improvement of said land, previous to his final proof and payment therefor. That Neilson was notified by the officers of the United States land-office that a day had been set for hearing, to determine the question as to whether his final entry should be canceled on account of the fraud charged. That Neilson ignored this notice, and did not endeavor to resist such cancellation, if it could be made. That the defendant appeared at the time appointed, August 10, 1886, and offered his evidence; and that afterwards, on the 24th day of January, 1887, an order was made by the officers of the land department of the United States canceling the final entry of Lauritz S. Neilson; and thereafter, on the 25th day of January, 1887, the defendant, Emil Meyers, made homestead entry upon said land, which was accepted by the land department of the United States, and the proper certificate issued. That the defendant, Emil Meyers, took possession of the land mentioned in the complaint on the 20th day of January, 1887, and has ever since had possession of the same. That a reasonable rent for the premises described in the complaint during the time that the defendant has been in possession is $150. That the damage to the plaintiff, being ejected from the land, is $1.00; and it is agreed, in case the plaintiff recover in this case, that he shall recover $1.00 damages for the taking of the place by the defendant, and $150 damages for rent during the time he has been excluded therefrom by the defendant. It is further agreed that said Neilson had not resided upon the said land six months prior to his making said final proof, and did not reside upon the land at the time he made said proof."

It is admitted that Lauritz S. Neilson, the grantor of plaintiff, entered the land in question under and by virtue of the pre-emption laws of the United States, and that at the time he made his final proof and received his final receipt or certificate from the receiver he had not resided upon said land six months, and did not reside thereon at the time of making said final proof. It is conceded by appellant that the final certificate was procured illegally and fraudulently, but appellant contends that the land department of the United States has no authority to cancel an entry where final certificate has been issued, and the land described therein sold to such a purchaser as the stipulation of facts shows appellant to be. It is admitted that respondent entered a contest to set aside Neilson's entry in June, 1886. It is also admitted that appellant purchased the land in question from Neilson in June, 1886, and paid him therefor in June or July, 1886, but that said Neilson did not execute a deed of conveyance conveying said land to the appellant until October 23, 1886. Neilson was duly notified that said contest was set for hearing August 10, 1886, but failed to appear and defend. The respondent in this cause introduced his testimony at said hearing, and thereafter said entry was canceled by the proper officer of the land department. The question, then, is, had the land department, under the facts of this case, the authority to cancel said entry? The secretary of the interior is given by law the entire supervision of the survey and the sale of the public lands. The commissioner of the general land-office is by law required to perform, under the directions of the secretary of the interior, all executive duties appertaining to the survey and sale of the public lands of the United States. The registers and receivers are but local officers of the several land-districts, charged with the performance of certain duties, and subject to the direction and supervision of the commissioner of the general land-office and secretary of the interior. From the organization of the land department of the United States down to the present time it has been held by that department (and by the supreme courts of numerous states and territories) that it had the right and authority to cancel all entries of public lands upon a proper showing, made prior to the issuance of a patent, if the entrymen had failed to comply with the law, and had procured final receipt or certificate upon false proof. In re Cogswell, 3 Dec. Dep. Int. 23, and authorities there cited; Hosmer v. Wallace, 47 Cal. 461; Figg v. Hensley, 52 Cal. 299; Hestres v. Brennan, 50 Cal. 211; Vance v. Kohlberg, 50 Cal. 346; Randall v. Edert, 7 Minn. 450, (Gil. 359;) Gray v. Stockton, 8 Minn. 529, (Gil. 472;) Judd v. Randall, (Minn.) 29 N. W. Rep. 589; Bellows v.

Todd, 34 Iowa, 31; McLane v. Boves, 35 Wis. 27; Franklin v. Kelley, 2 Neb. 79; Hayes v. Parker, 3 Pac. Rep. 991. We have examined the cases cited by counsel for appellant and many other cases not cited, and, with the exception of Smith v. Ewing, 23 Fed. Rep. 741, have been unable to find any case that sustains the view taken by appellant. The decided weight of authority is clearly against the position contended for by appellant. The appellant cites Cornelius v. Kessel, 58 Wis. 237, 16 N. W. Rep. 550, as holding that the commissioner had no power to cancel a final certificate. The court says: "The land was then subject to entry. It was purchased by him, and paid for. There was no fraud or mistake in the transaction." In the case at bar it is admitted that the entryman had not complied with the law; that he had not resided upon the land six months, and was not residing there at the time he made his final proof. The case at bar differs from the one last above cited in this: in that case, there was no mistake or fraud; in this, there appears to have been perjury committed in making the final proof, and by such perjury a fraud was committed upon the land department. The appellant also cites U. S. v. Minor, 114 U. S. 223,¹ as an authority in this case. It was held in that case that, where the land department had issued a patent upon false and perjured affidavits, the United States is not precluded from instituting a suit in equity to cancel such patent. It does not conflict with former decisions of said court, in which it has been held that the decisions of the land department upon questions of fact and mixed law and fact are conclusive.

Appellant contends that the supreme court of the United States in Myers v. Croft, 13 Wall. 291, holds that a sale by a pre-emptor, after entry and final proof and the issue of a final certificate to a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, conveys to the purchaser a valid, legal title. The court in that case in no respect intimates that the grantee of a pre-emptor would get any better title than his grantor had, or that any title would pass if the grantor had not in good faith, and in full compliance with the requirements of the pre-emption law, entered the land conveyed. The concluding portion of said opinion indicates very strongly the contrary opinion. The court says: "If it had been the purpose of congress to attain the object contended for, it would have declared the lands themselves unalienable until the patent was granted. Instead of this, the legislation was directed against the assignment or transfer of the right secured by the act, which was the right of pre-emption, leaving the pre-emptor free to sell his land after entry, if at that time he was in good faith the owner of the land, and had done nothing inconsistent with the provisions of the law on the subject." 13 Wall. 297. It will not be contended for a moment that Neilson, appellant's grantor, was in good faith the owner of the land in question when he sold the same to the appellant. The case of Carrol v. Safford, 3 How. 441, cited by appellant, proceeds upon the theory that the government has no right to refuse a patent to a bona fide purchaser of land offered for sale. The court says: "But where there has been fraud or mistake the patent may be withheld, and every other purchaser at tax-sale incurs the risk as to the validity of the title he purchases." The case of Brill v. Stiles, 35 Ill. 309, is cited by the appellant as holding that the commissioner has no power to cancel the final certificate, and that his doing so is void. The court says: "If the entry was authorized by law, the title passed to him, subject to be defeated by the proof of a right of pre-emption; and, if unauthorized, he acquired no title. But until it was shown to have been illegally made, or to have been defeated by proof of a pre-emption, the certificate of purchase was evidence of an equitable title." There may be some apparent conflict in the Illinois decisions, but in the case of Robbins v. Bunn, 54 Ill. 48, the court has clearly shown that there is no conflict in the decisions of that state upon this question. The court says, after citing Brill v. Stiles, supra, and other decisions: "These two classes of cases may seem at first inconsistent with each other, and there are probably some expressions in the various opinions not strictly harmonious, but on further consideration it will be seen there is no real antagonism in the decisions. The cases in the first class relate to pre-emption claims upon which the land-officers have decided. The pre-emption law of 1830 required proof of the facts upon which the right of pre-emption depended to be made to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, agreeably to rules to be prescribed by the commissioner of the general land-office. This, by implication, gave them the right to decide all cases of contested pre-emption, so far as they depended upon the facts of prior settlement; and this construction has been uniformly given to the law, as will be seen by the cases before cited and in other authorities quoted in the opinions pronounced in these cases. The finding of the land-officers upon the facts in matters of pre-emption has been held conclusive by the courts, upon the familiar ground that such officers, in these proceedings, were acting in a quasi-judicial capacity, and within the scope of their authority. But, on the other hand, when these officers have undertaken to cancel a patent or a certificate of entry for which a purchaser has paid his money, either at their discretion, or under some patented regulation of the department which the law did not authorize, or under some clearly erroneous construction of the law of congress, the courts have held themselves not bound by such acts of the officers of the land department, because they were not exercising a judicial function within the limits prescribed by law. The cases cited by counsel for defendant will be found to relate to proceedings of this character. Between those two classes of authorities there is a clear and sound distinction. In the one, the proceedings of the land-officers are held conclusive, because judicial in their character, and within their conceded jurisdiction; in the other, such proceedings are held not conclusive, because they are either ministerial in their character, or, if judicial, beyond the authority given by the acts of congress." In Stark v. Starrs, 6 Wall. 402, it is claimed that the supreme court of the United States holds that "a right to a patent once vested is treated by the government when dealing with the public lands as equivalent to a patent issue." This case arose under what is known as the "Oregon Donation Act," and under that act the right of the claimant to a patent became perfected when the certificate of the surveyor general and accompanying proof were received by the commissioner of the general land-office, and he found no valid objection thereto. In that case the law had been fully complied with by the claimant, but the commissioner objected to issuing the patent to Stark upon the ground that the land was brought under the operation of the "town-site act," and was not subject to disposition under said "donation act." If the "donation act" of 1850 was applicable to the lands, Stark's right to a patent became perfect when the certificate of the surveyor general and accompanying proof showed, in the judgment of the commissioner, a compliance with its requirements. In that case the commissioner's objection to the issuance of a patent arose, not from any defect in the certificate or proof, but from an opinion that the lands were subject to the provisions of the "town-site act" of 1844. How very different from the case at bar! The appellant's grantor had not complied with the requirements of the pre-emption law. Through false proof he had obtained a final certificate. A hearing was ordered long before the appellant received a deed of conveyance from his grantor, and, had the appellant examined the records of the land-office at Oxford, Idaho, he would have found a contest pending to set aside his grantor's entry at least four months before said deed of conveyance was executed. If an entryman can through false proof pre-empt land, and, as soon as he obtains his final certificate, sell the same, and convey a valid title, it seems to us that it would "open wide the door to frauds innumerable and to an extent almost incalculable." Until the patent issues, we think that the rule caveat emptor applies with peculiar force to purchasers of lands from pre-emption entrymen.

Chief Justice TRIPP, of Dakota, in the case of United States v. Edward H. Dudley, 1887,¹ rendered an exhaustive opinion as to the authority of the land department to cancel a final certificate issued to a pre-emptor, in which he reviews and comments upon numerous decisions of the supreme court of the United States and decisions of the highest courts of many of the states and territories, and arrives at the following conclusions, to-wit: "I am clearly of the opinion that the supervisory and appellate powers vested in the secretary of the interior, and the commissioner of the general land-office, under his direction, gives them the right to examine all acts of the register and receiver. In matters of fact left to the determination of the local officers, the jurisdiction of the secretary and commissioner may be exercised by appeal and a re-examination of the facts themselves, or by examination of their action, and requiring them again to examine the questions of fact involved, and in all cases to supervise the purely administrative or executive acts of the local officers. The power of supervision given the secretary and commissioner is a general one over all the acts of the register and receiver. There is no exception made in the matter of the issuing of final certificates; and, if the position here contended for be the correct one, to-wit, that the commissioner must issue a patent at once upon the presentation of the certificate, and that issue of the certificate would conclude all inquiry into matters settled by its issue, then it would conclude all supervision by the superior officers; and on that reasoning the patent might as well issue by the local as by the supervisory officers. I am led to adopt the contrary of this reasoning. Besides, any other view would lead to hopeless conflict between the department and the courts. Our calendars would be crowded with land contests, and the action of the department would be indefinitely postponed. The only true doctrine, in my opinion, is that announced by the supreme court,—that the jurisdiction of the court commences when that of the department ceases; and that, until the patent issues, and while the matter is still pending before the department, the question is not one of private right upon which the courts have power to act." We are of the opinion that if a pre-emptor has not complied with the law, and procures a final certificate through fraud or perjury, a purchaser from him gets no better title than such pre-emptor obtained, and, if such fraud or failure to comply with the law is established to the satisfaction of the land department, under its rules and regulations, before patent has been issued, the land department has the authority to cancel such certificate. In re Cogswell, 8 Dec. Dep. Int. 23, and authorities there cited. Those decisions which hold that a final certificate is equivalent to a patent issued proceed upon the theory that the pre-emptor has complied with the law as to residence and improvement and all other requirements, and that such certificate was not procured through fraud or perjury. The judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

STATE v. LYNCH.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—INDICTMENT—INTENT.

In an indictment for an assault with intent to kill, after properly charging the assault, the intent may be alleged by averring that the assault was made "with the intent him, the said J. B., then and there to kill and murder."

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; L. B. STEARNS, Judge.

The charging part of the indictment is as follows: "The said Tony Lynch, on the 20th day of October, A. D. 1890, in the county of Multnomah and state of Oregon, was armed with a dangerous weapon, namely, a pistol loaded with gunpowder and leaden balls, and, being so armed with such dangerous weapon aforesaid, did then and there unlawfully and feloniously assault one James Brown with such dangerous weapon by then and there shooting at him, the said James Brown, with said loaded pistol, with intent him, the said James Brown, to then and there kill and murder." A general demurrer to this indictment was interposed and overruled. Upon a trial the jury found the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and he was sentenced to the penitentiary, from which judgment he has appealed to this court.

H. E. McGinn, A. F. Sears, Jr., and N. D. Simon, for appellant. T. A. Stevens, Dist. Atty., and W. T. Hume, for the State.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) There was but one question presented upon the argument that we deem necessary to notice, and that is the sufficiency of the indictment. The appellant's contention is that the indictment is fatally defective for the reason that it fails to charge that the assault was made maliciously, or of deliberate and premeditated malice, and this is the only question necessary to be decided. The indictment is founded on section 1740, Hill's Code, which is as follows: "If any person shall assault another with intent to kill, to rob, or to commit a rape upon such other," etc. The indictment charges that the assault was made upon the prosecutor "with the intent him, the said James Brown, to then and there kill and murder." It may be safely conceded that the authorities are not uniform on this subject, and probably the weight of authority is with the appellant; but in State v. Doty, 5 Or. 491, a conviction was upheld upon an indictment for this crime which certainly was not drawn with as much technical accuracy as the one now before the court. After disposing of some other questions presented in that case the court said: "But we do not think it can be maintained that this indictment does not charge a crime within the meaning of subdivision 4, § 123, of the Criminal Code. The charge is in the language of the statute, and the legal signification of the term 'assault with intent to kill' implies the unlawful and felonious attempt to take the life of another." This is a construction of this provision of the Code by this court which has never been questioned, and which we do not feel at liberty to disregard. Mr. Bishop, in his work on Directions and Forms, is in accord with this construction. In section 553 this distinguished author says: "In general, the verb 'to kill,' in such a connection, requires only the intent to do what would constitute, if done, either murder or manslaughter." And he adds, in section 555: "The common and prudent method of alleging this intent, not inquiring whether any other is permissible, is after its legal effect in distinction from its outward form; as, 'with intent to kill the said X.,' or 'with intent to murder the said X.,' or 'with intent to kill and murder the said X.,' or 'with intent feloniously and of his malice aforethought to kill and murder the said X.,' or 'with intent feloniously and of his malice aforethought to commit murder in the first degree.'" And in effect the same doctrine is announced in People v. Congleton, 44 Cal. 92; People v. Swenson, 49 Cal. 388. The intent necessary to constitute a crime under this section of the Code is stated with as much particularity as could be reasonably desired. The assault was made with intent to kill and murder, and the circumstances of the assault are stated with particularity. In addition to this, the court instructed the jury in effect that they must find that the assault was made of deliberate and premeditated malice or maliciously before they could find the defendant guilty. Practically the defendant had the benefit of every principle of law for which he has contended on this appeal. Finding no error in the judgment appealed from, the same must be affirmed.

BEAN, J., (concurring.) I concur in the opinion of the chief justice in this case solely upon the ground of stare decisis. It seems to come within the doctrine of State v. Doty, 5 Or. 491; and, while I think that case is not supported by the better authority, I do not feel at liberty to disturb it at this time. I am authorized to say that Justice LORD concurs in this view.

CADWELL v. BRACKETT.

MECHANIC'S LIENS—CONTRACT—EVIDENCE.

In an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien on defendant's property for services by plaintiff as superintendent of buildings thereon, plaintiff testified that defendant employed him, but he made no definite statement of the manner of his employment, and admitted that he came to take charge of the work under contract with defendant's architects to superintend their buildings, including defendant's. Defendant denied having employed him, and was corroborated by the arohitects, who testified that the employment was by them, that they were to pay him, and defendant only to make up to them a certain amount of his wages. Held, that a judgment for plaintiff was unwarranted.

Appeal from superior court, Kittitas county.

Action by W. H. Brackett to foreclose mechanics' liens on property owned by E. P. Cadwell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Frederick Bausman, for appellant. Welsh & Warner and Reavis & Mires, for appellee.

DUNBAR, J. From a careful investigation of the evidence in this case, we are unable to arrive at the conclusion reached by the lower court. It is true that Brackett testified that he was employed by Cadwell to superintend his building, but makes no definite statement as to the manner of his employment, while he admits he came to Ellensburg under contract with Proctor & Dennis at a stipulated price of six dollars per day. Cadwell, on the other hand, who, for all the record shows, is entitled to as much credit as Brackett, and whose interest is the same, testifies positively that he never employed him at all; that all the contract or understanding he ever had concerning his work was with Proctor, and that the agreement with him was that he (Cadwell) would make up to Proctor & Dennis any deficiency that might exist to bring Brackett's wages to six dollars per day after they had appropriated a certain per cent. that they were to receive on other buildings; and that, in consideration of such deficiency being made up to them, Brackett was to superintend the construction of his (Cadwell's) buildings, in common with the other buildings which Proctor & Dennis were under contract to superintend in Ellensburg. This statement of Cadwell's is explicitly corroborated by Proctor, who, in his direct testimony, says: "The defendant was to pay the deficiency that might accrue from the proceeds of our work on the other part of it. You [meaning defendant] were to make that up, so that we would not lose anything by bringing Brackett up here at $6 per day." He also testifies that when he put Brackett to work on their buildings, under their contract with him, the defendant's buildings were included in the lot; nor can we see anything in the cross-examination of the witness that substantially affects his direct testimony. The testimony of the witness Loyd might seem to support the theory of the plaintiff. His testimony, admitted by the court as rebutting testimony, was as follows: "There was one interview between Cadwell, Proctor, and myself, in which Mr. Proctor desired to make some arrangement for a superintendent. He stated he could not furnish a superintendent, as his contract did not contemplate a superintendent; and in discussing the matter something was said with reference to compensation, and Mr. Proctor said that, generally, the services of such a man was worth $10 or $12 a day, but he thought in this case the better way was to prorate the expenses among the different buildings, and he intimated that he thought about two per cent. would be about the compensation on that sort of a building." Conceding that this testimony is literally true, it does not appear that Cadwell responded in any way, or that the "intimation" resulted in a contract, and in no way disputes the testimony that Cadwell and Proctor afterwards agreed on the terms which they both swear to. Tending to weaken plaintiff's claim is the testimony of his successor in the work, Mr. Paul, who swears that when Brackett quit work he told witness that Cadwell owed him $40 or $50, and said that he would not pay him, and that he was going to sue him if he did not pay it. Counsel for appellee in his brief says that the testimony of Mr. Paul is indefinite, but it seems to us about as definite as any testimony in the case. We do not see any force in the argument of appellee that the exhibits and testimony show that Cadwell treated and recognized Brackett as superintendent; for Cadwell does not deny that Brackett superintended his work, but claims that he did not employ him, and that he was to pay Proctor & Dennis for his services, not at the rate of 2 per cent. on the value of the buildings, but according to the contract testified to by him. The superintendent's duties would be the same under either theory of employment, and Cadwell would have a right to give him the same recognition and authority under one theory as he would under the other. It appears from the testimony that another arrangement was afterwards made between Brackett and Proctor & Dennis in regard to Brackett's compensation, but it does not satisfactorily appear that this new arrangement was ever brought to the knowledge of Cadwell, but, on the contrary, it does appear that when it came to his knowledge that Brackett was intending to hold him responsible for his services, he immediately discharged him. From the whole testimony, it seems to us that Brackett has already received more than he was entitled to under his contract, and that he ought not to recover anything against the defendant in this action. With this view of the testimony, it is not necessary to investigate the law questions involved. The judgment of the lower court is reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to the court to enter judgment for the defendant for costs.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—CIVIL DAMAGE SUIT—PARTIES.

Code Wash. § 2059, provides that "every husband, wife, child, parent, guardian, employe, or other person, who shall be injured in person or property or means of support, by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of the intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, shall have a right of action in his or her own name, severally or jointly, against any person or persons who shall, by selling or giving intoxicating liquors, have caused the intoxication, in whole or in part, of such person; and a right of action is also given against the owners of the building in which the liquor was sold or given, where they knew of or permitted it. Held, that the words "severally or jointly" refer to defendants, and, where a widow and her minor children sue jointly for the death of the husband, there is a misjoinder of parties plaintiff.

Appeal from superior court, King county.

Richard Osborn, Thompson, Edsen & Humphries, and Lewis & Gilman, for appellant. N. Soderberg and T. C. McDivitt, for appellees.

HORT, J. The widow and three minor children joined in an action under section 2059 of the Code to recover for the death of the husband and father, brought about by his intoxication caused in part by liquor sold him by the defendant. The record presents many important questions, but the argument here has been almost exclusively confined to two of them, and, as the others are doubtful and unimportant, we shall only decide those argued. The first claim of appellant is that there was a misjoinder of parties plaintiff. That the four plaintiffs who, under our statute, each have a separate cause of action, could not join in an action, unless by statute authorized so to do, is elementary. It is contended, however, that the section under which the action was brought specially authorized them to sue jointly or severally. The section is as follows: "Every husband, wife, child, parent, guardian, employe, or other person, who shall be injured in person or property, or means of support, by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of the intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, shall have a right of action in his or her own name, severally or jointly, against any person or persons who shall, by selling or giving intoxicating liquors, have caused the intoxication, in whole or in part, of such person; and any person or persons owning, renting, leasing, or permitting the occupation of any building or premises, and having knowledge that intoxicating liquors are to be sold therein, or who, having leased the same for other purposes, shall knowingly permit therein the sale of any intoxicating liquors, shall, if any such liquors sold or given therein have caused, in whole or in part, the intoxication of any person, be liable, severally or jointly, with the persons selling or giving the intoxicating liquors as aforesaid, for all damages sustained, and the same may be recovered in a civil action, in any court of competent jurisdiction. A married woman may bring such action in her own name, and all damages recovered by her shall inure to her separate use; and all damages recovered by a minor under this chapter shall be paid either to such minor, or to such person in trust for him, and on such terms, as the court may direct. In case of the death of either party, the action and right of action to or against his executor or administrator shall survive."

It is contended, on the one hand, that the words "jointly and severally" refer to the plaintiffs; and on the other, that they refer to the defendants. We think the latter construction the true one. The other construction would lead to such absurd results that it could not be presumed to have been intended by the legislature. Under the section thus construed, it would be competent for any number of persons, however differently injured, to join in one action; and we might have a case where one person was seeking to recover for the killing of a horse, and another for the loss of an arm. That causes of action thus distinct and several could not properly be joined in an action is too manifest for argument; and even if the statute had provided, in express terms, for such joinder, there could be no real unity of interests between the plaintiffs, for the reason that, though the remote cause of the loss to each would be the same, the immediate cause might be entirely and widely separated acts of the intoxicated person. Besides, the elements that entered into the question of damages would have nothing in common. We think the legislature has not used language that compels us to adopt such an absurd construction. On the contrary, the language can be given its full force, and the words "jointly or severally" held to apply to the defendants, which not only avoids any absurdity, but tends greatly to increase the benefits of said section, by allowing the injured party in one suit to sue any or all who have contributed to the intoxication of the person through whom the injury was received.

The appellant also contended that the evidence showed that the death of the husband and father was not caused by his intoxication, and that for that reason the verdict is wrong. But as this question is one of fact for the jury, under proper instructions, and as the facts may be different upon a retrial of the cause, it would be profitless to discuss it now. The effect of the instructions have not been largely commented upon, and we shall not review them more than to say that there was nothing in the case to authorize any recovery other than for loss of support, and the instructions should have confined the jury to that element of damages. The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

REPLEVIN—TITLE TO SUPPORT AGAINST WRONG-DOER.

1. A company leased state land, and afterwards discovered building stone thereon, which they quarried and sold, together with the lease, to plaintiff. Defendant, without right, but in collusion with plaintiff's agent, removed the stone. Held that, although the quarrying of the stone was waste, plaintiff could replevy it where his possession was under bona fide claim of ownership.

2. Under Code Wash. § 247, a finding by the court stands as a special verdict, and will not be disturbed unless so clearly unfounded that it would be set aside if made by a jury.

Appeal from superior court, King county.

Geo. D. Blake and W. Lais Hill, for appellants. Cole, Blaine & Devries, for appellees.

STILES, J. The court below found as a fact that appellees were in possession of the stone in controversy at the time when appellants entered upon the lands where it lay and removed it. Considering the character of the property,—newly-quarried stone,—we cannot say that the court was not warranted in its finding. Unless the finding was so clearly unfounded as that it should have been set aside had it been made by a jury, we should not disturb it. It stands as a special verdict, and must be so treated. Code, § 247. Being in possession, then, it further appeared that appellees claimed to hold the stone under the following circumstances: A corporation known as the "Builders' Material Company" in 1889 obtained from the board of commissioners of Whatcom county a lease of certain lands in section 36, and thereafter, having discovered a ledge of building stone thereon, opened a quarry, and took therefrom the stone in question; and while the stone was still lying at the quarry the Builders' Material Company assigned its lease, and made a bill of sale of the stone, to the appellees. The appellants, without any right in them, entered upon the leased land, and took away the stone by collusion with the appellees' agent, who resided upon the land, near the quarry, and had charge of the property. The complaint alleged appellees to be the owners and entitled to the possession of the property, and that appellants had wrongfully taken it from their possession. The answer was a general denial. Judgment was for the appellees. Appellants contend that, inasmuch as the stone was quarried from lands belonging to the state, and that the act of quarrying was waste by the tenant, the possession of the lessee and of its grantee under the bill of sale was wrongful, and not sufficient to base thereon an action for the taking and detention. But, inasmuch as the appellees were in possession of the stone, under a claim of ownership, made in good faith, although perhaps erroneous, we hold that the orderly administration of affairs in the community requires that the defendants should not be allowed to get and retain the property in the manner shown by the record. The appellees' possession was rightful as against every one, with the exception, possibly, of the state, and was good as against any mere wrong-doer. Wells, Rep. § 110; Cobbe, Rep. § 136; Sprague v. Clark, 41 Vt. 8. The judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed, with costs.

BOUNDARIES—GOVERNMENT SURVEYS—STATEMENT ON APPEAL.

1. In construing a deed describing land by the government survey the court must ascertain the corners of the survey as actually established, and not as they ought to have been established; but the presumption that the deed was intended to convey according to the established corners may be rebutted by evidence that the parties were mistaken as to the location of the government line, and intended to convey a definite tract.

2. A statement of facts will not be stricken from the files of the supreme court on the ground that it is misleading if the record shows that it was substituted by order of the court for an original statement which had been lost, and which had been signed by the attorneys for both parties, and certified by the judge.

Appeal from superior court, Pierce county; FRANK ALLYN, Judge.

Action by George H. Greer against William Squire, involving the location of a section corner by government survey. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Town & Likens, for appellant. C. P. Culver, for appellee.

DUNBAR, J. We do not think that the point raised in appellee's brief, that the statement of fact was misleading, or not understood by the court, is well taken: The record shows that the statement of fact was agreed upon, and regularly signed, by the attorneys of both parties to the action, and certified to by the judge; and that the statement of facts presented here was by the order of the court substituted for the original statement of facts, which had been lost. Nor do we think that the decisions cited by appellee, to-wit, Mulkey v. McGrew, 2 Wash. T. 262, 5 Pac. Rep. 842; Breemer v. Burgess, 2 Wash. T. 290, 5 Pac. Rep. 733, 840; Swift v. Stine, 3 Wash. T. 520, 19 Pac. Rep. 63,—are adverse to appellant's right to this appeal. Those cases only go to the extent of refusing to decide questions of fact further than the records disclose the facts. While the record here does not disclose the testimony sufficient for this court to determine definitely the rights of the parties, it does disclose enough to show error in the court, in that the conclusions of law were not justified by the statement of facts; and we conclude that the judgment of the court was rendered on the theory that the court could correct the government surveys, and establish government corners at points other than the points located by the government. This seems to have been the theory on which the case was tried. The presumption is that the grantor intended to convey the lands embraced within the boundaries described according to the government survey; and the investigation of the court must be directed towards ascertaining the fact where the government corners are actually established, and not where they ought to have been established. But this presumption is by no means conclusive; and, while parol evidence will not be admitted to dispute the written contract, it may be admitted to explain it, and to show their understanding. This was a conveyance between private parties; and, if the intention was to convey a certain definite piece of land, and especially if the land was actually located, that could be shown, or any circumstance tending to show the intention of the parties. In conveyances by private parties descriptions by legal subdivisions are used for convenience, and it would be a hard and unjust rule to hold parties to a conveyance of property not intended to be conveyed, through mistaken understanding of where a government line was located, especially when it can be shown that the government survey was misleading, and the lines of survey deviated from their proper and intended course; but, as we have before said, the presumption is that the deed conveys all the land within the subdivisions described according to the actual survey. The judgment is reversed, and the case is remanded to the lower court, with instructions to retry the same in accordance with this opinion.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—INDORSEMENT BY WIFE —COMMUNITY PROPERTY.

Where a note, payable to a married woman or order, is indorsed for value before maturity to one who supposes her to be married, but has no notice that the note is community property, a valid title passes, and the indorsee can recover against the maker, although the husband intervenes to disaffirm the indorsement.

Appeal from superior court, Kittitas county.

Davidson & McFalls and Reavis & Mires, for appellant. Pruyn & Ready, for appellees.

HOYT, J. Defendant W. H. Peterson made his negotiable promissory note to Mrs. Eliza E. Pool or order for the sum of $1,070. This note the payee sold to the plaintiff for a valuable consideration, and indorsed the same, and delivered it to said plaintiff before its maturity. Plaintiff sought in this action to recover upon said note against the maker. L. Pool, the husband, intervened in the suit, and alleged that the money loaned for which the note was given was community property, and claimed that the transfer to plaintiff was void, and that he had no title upon which he could recover of the maker. The court below sustained this contention of the husband, and gave judgment for defendants. There was no evidence tending to show bad faith on the part of plaintiff, and the only circumstance relied upon to charge him with notice that the note was claimed by the community was the fact that it was payable to a woman whom he supposed to be married. Under these circumstances, we think plaintiff took such a title to the note that he should have been allowed to maintain his action against the defendants. The maker promised to pay Mrs. Eliza E. Pool, or order, and in making the note so payable he guaranteed, to every person taking such note in good faith, her ability to order the same paid to another,—that is, to indorse it,—and as to every such person buying in good faith and for value such guaranty was conclusive. That the maker of negotiable paper thus guarantees the capacity of the payee to indorse and transfer the same seems to arise from the necessity of the case, and the rule is therefore founded upon reason. It is likewise abundantly supported by authority. See Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 98, and cases there cited. This rule has been frequently applied to notes made to and transferred by infants. See section 227 of authority above cited. Likewise to married women under the disabilities of the common law. See same authority, section 242. In the case of a married woman under the disabilities of the common law such a note was the property of her husband, and besides she had absolutely no power to make a contract of any kind, and if, as we have seen, the maker of a note to such person could not dispute the title of her indorsee, it is evident that he could not do so in the case at bar. Under our law the wife is fully competent to make a personal contract, and an indorsee of such married woman stands in a much stronger position than under the common law. Any other rule as to the passing of title to negotiable paper would be contrary to the universal practice of the commercial world in its dealing therewith. An indorsee knows that he is responsible for the genuineness of the indorsement under which he holds, and he understands that in further transferring it he guarantees that the first indorser is the payee, and that the indorsement of each special indorsee is the genuine signature of the person so named; but we think that it would work a great revolution in business circles, and cause an unheard-of panic therein, if the doctrine was once established that, in addition to the responsibilities above named, he also assumed that of a guarantor of the title and capacity to sell of all prior indorsers. We do not lose sight of the fact that all property, personal as well as real, acquired after marriage, is prima facie that of the community; but we hold that, from the very nature of negotiable paper, one who makes it payable to the order of any person cannot be allowed to say to a bona fide holder that the authority which he in terms gave to such person to order the same paid to another is void. We think, moreover, that, from the nature of such property, money and negotiable paper bear a different relation to the community than other property. Not that they do not belong to the community, as between the spouses and all others having full knowledge of all the facts, but that, as between the one who is in possession thereof and one dealing in good faith and for value, they should be treated as the separate property of such possessor. We cannot see that public policy would be subserved by holding the presumption as to ownership of such possessor to be less than that of another person who is in the possession thereof without any semblance of title except such possession. Yet the books are full of cases where the title to purchasers in good faith of such property has been sustained although it appeared that the one from whom title was received had none except possession. The possession of these classes of property raises a much greater presumption of title than the possession of other classes, and we think that the rules of the law-merchant in relation thereto have not been changed by our statute. The claim of intervenor is so unconscionable that courts would not give it effect unless the statute very clearly warranted his contention. He says that the community had $1,070; that it loaned it, and obtained the note in question; that it delivered said note to plaintiff, and received therefor $1,070, and is thus placed in exactly the same position as before the note was taken; but that it is still entitled to recover of the maker of the note another $1,070, thereby, without any consideration having passed therefor, doubling its money, and this at the expense of the plaintiff, who, though having contributed his $1,070 to the community, is turned out of court without a cent. The judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

APPEAL—NOTICE.

1. In a suit against several defendants to restrain them from diverting a natural water-course, where the court decrees the rights of defendants, as against each other, in the water-course, as well as the rights of plaintiff, an appeal by one defendant, without notice to his co-defendants, is not properly taken, under Act Wash. March 22, 1890, requiring a party on appealing to serve notice on "the prevailing party."

2. Appellant cannot sustain his appeal in such case on the ground that the court had no right under the pleadings to determine the rights of defendants as between each other, since, the court having had jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, the decree is voidable, and not void.

Appeal from superior court, Kittitas county.

HOTT, J. Appellee brought an action against a large number of defendants to restrain them from diverting the waters from Wilson creek so as to prevent a certain flow therein through his land situated on said creek. Some of the defendants, by way of answer, set up a claim to certain water of said creek, and asked that it be decreed to them. Upon the trial of the cause the question of the rights of the respective parties as to the waters of such creek were gone into, and the decree of the court established the same, not only as between each of such defendants and the plaintiff, but also as between such several defendants themselves. From this decree a part of the defendants have attempted to appeal. But they did not join their co-defendants, nor were notices served upon them; and it is contended that, for want of such joinder or notice, the attempted appeal is insufficient to give this court jurisdiction. It has been decided by this court that, where a part of several co-parties appeal, they must serve notice thereof upon all the other co-parties, as required by section 454 of the Code, and that a failure so to do would deprive this court of jurisdiction. See Cline v. Mitchell, (Wash.) 23 Pac. Rep. 1013; Nelson v. Territory, Id. These cases are decisive of the one at bar, if said section 454 and the other sections of the Code to be construed in connection therewith are still in force. But appellee insists that these sections have been repealed by the act of March 22, 1890. We are inclined to think that this act does not repeal the sections of the Code in question. But it is not necessary that we should here decide that question, as this attempted appeal is insufficient under the said act of March 22, 1890. By that act the party desiring to appeal must serve notice on the prevailing party; and the decree in this case was such that several of the defendants, who did not join in the appeal, were prevailing parties, as against those who did, and should have been served with notice.

Appellants practically concede this to be true by the terms of the decree, but they contend that the said decree is void, so far as it attempts to determine the rights of the defendants among each other; their contention in that regard being that the pleadings upon the part of such defendants did not state facts sufficient to entitle them to the relief granted. We agree with appellants that such pleadings were insufficient, and that it was error on the part of the trial court to decree affirmatively in their favor, as it did. But we cannot agree that such parts of its decree were void. It had jurisdiction of the persons; and the pleadings, though insufficient, gave it jurisdiction of the subject-matter; from which it must follow that any decree rendered therein, however erroneous, was voidable only, and not void. Until reversed, such parts of said decree were binding on all the parties to the action, and, being to a certain extent adverse to the appellants, those in whose favor they established rights were prevailing parties, within the meaning of said act, and should have been joined in the appeal, or served with notice thereof. The motion to dismiss must be granted.

CROSS-APPEALS — AFFIRMANCE — DISMISSAL — ASSESSMENT — BOARD OF EQUALIZATION.

1. Where the state and defendant, in an action against a railroad company for taxes, both appeal, the former on the ground that the judgment should have been greater, and the latter on the ground that it should have been less, and the judgment is affirmed on defendant's appeal, and it thereupon pays the amount of the judgment below, it does not estop the state from prosecuting its appeal to recover a larger amount.

2. Gen. St. Nev. § 1091, provides that the board of equalization shall have the power to determine all complaints in regard to the assessed value of any property, but makes no provision for a new trial or rehearing. Held that, after the board has heard a complaint and fixed the value of property, it cannot reconsider the matter, and reduce the assessment.

Appeal from district court, Lander county: A. L. FITZGERALD, Judge.

The Attorney General, W. D. Jones, and Henry Mayenbaum, for the State. Baker & Wines, for respondent.

BIGELOW, J. This action was brought to recover from the defendant the taxes due Lander county for the year 1889. Included in the property assessed are 29.15 miles of road-bed and main track of the railroad, at a valuation of $14,000 per mile. Upon the trial, under proper allegations, the records of the board of equalization of Lander county were offered in evidence by the defendant. They show that on September 24, 1889, the defendant filed a complaint with the board asking that its assessment be reduced to $9,000 per mile. At the same time one Dickson also filed a complaint asking that it be raised to $20,000 per mile. The two complaints were heard together, and on the same day the board made an order that the assessment remain, as fixed by the assessor, at $14,000 per mile. On October 7, 1889, the board met again, and a motion to reconsider their former action was adopted. Thereupon another motion was made, and also adopted, to reduce the assessment to $12,000 per mile. To the offer of these records the plaintiff objected, upon the ground that the action of the board on September 24th was final and conclusive, and could not be reconsidered on October 7th; that in making the last-named order the board acted without authority or jurisdiction. The objection was overruled, and the records admitted. The defendant also claimed that 76-100 miles of the road assessed was in dispute between Lander and Eureka counties, and that under the statute authorizing such payment it had paid the taxes thereon to Eureka county. Judgment was rendered for the state for 28.89 miles of road at a valuation of $12,000 per mile. Both parties have appealed; the defendant upon the ground that the valuation of $12,000 per mile was excessive, and that a certain school tax was improperly included in the judgment. Upon this appeal the judgment was affirmed, (25 Pac. Rep. 296,) and upon the return of the remittitur to the court below it was paid in full to the district attorney. The plaintiff's appeal is founded upon the claim that the judgment should have been for the full number of miles of road assessed, valued at $14,000 per mile.

1. The defendant now moves to dismiss this appeal upon the grounds that the acceptance by the district attorney of the money due upon the judgment as affirmed is a waiver by the state of the errors assigned, that the state cannot both enforce the judgment and appeal from it. A party may appeal from the whole or any part of a judgment, (Gen. St. § 3353; Hayne, New Trials & App. § 185;) and upon the hearing of an appeal the supreme court may reverse, affirm, or modify a judgment, or affirm it as to some issues and reverse as to others, (Gen. St. § 3361; Hayne, New Trials & App. § 295.) Under these circumstances, it would seem reasonable, where several independent issues are tried in a case, and the appeal is only taken from the judgment upon some of them, that, if error is found, the reversal should only be as to the issues appealed from, leaving it to stand upon the others. Even where the appeal is from the whole judgment, in which several independent issues have been determined, it would seem proper that it should only be reversed as to those in which error is found. In this case the judgment was for the plaintiff upon some issues, and for the defendant upon others. Each party has appealed from that which was against itself. The appeals are separate and distinct, upon different questions, and the judgment upon one need not in any manner affect the other. After the affirmance of the judgment upon the defendant's appeal there could be no further question that the plaintiff was entitled to the money thereby awarded to it. That is settled; and the only question now is, whether it is not entitled to more. Why, then, should the acceptance of this money, which was unquestionably due it, and which the reversal of the judgment upon this appeal will not require it to pay back, or in any manner affect, work a waiver of the right to appeal upon other issues decided against the plaintiff? Where a reversal upon the plaintiff's appeal would require him to refund to the defendant money or property which he has obtained under the judgment, there is reason for holding that the acceptance of the benefits of the judgment is a waiver of the right to appeal. Having elected to receive the fruits of the judgment, he is estopped from attempting to destroy the very foundation of his right to receive them. But where a reversal would not work this result, where his right to what he has received would still remain intact, it is difficult to conceive why he should not be allowed to take what is now, and always will be, his, and still prosecute his claim for more. This dis-

tion is quite clearly drawn in Embry v. Palmer, 107 U. S. 3, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 25; Bennett v. Van Syckel, 18 N. Y. 481; Keynes v. Dumont, 130 U. S. 394, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486,—and other cases, which support the conclusion to which we have come. There are decisions which seem to hold the contrary, but, if so, we decline to follow them, believing that they are not founded upon principle, and are contrary to the weight of authority. The motion to dismiss must be overruled.

2. The court found that the 76-100 of a mile of the road upon which no taxes were allowed in the judgment was claimed by both Lander and Eureka counties; that it was duly assessed in Eureka county, and the taxes thereon paid to that county by the defendant prior to the commencement of the action. This finding is abundantly supported by the evidence and the plaintiff's admissions, and constitutes a complete defense to that portion of the action. Gen. St. § 1205.

3. Did the court err in admitting in evidence the records of the board of equalization of October 7, 1889, and in finding that the value of the road had been thereby duly equalized and fixed at $12,000 per mile, instead of $14,000? A board of equalization is of special and limited jurisdiction, and, like all inferior tribunals, has only such powers as are specially conferred upon it. It is essential to the validity of its actions that they should be authorized by some provision of the statute, otherwise they are null and void. State v. Commissioners, 5 Nev. 317; State v. Commissioners, 6 Nev. 95; State v. Railroad Co., 9 Nev. 79. Gen. St. § 1091, provides that the board shall have power to determine all complaints made in regard to the assessed value of any property. Without a complaint is made, it has no jurisdiction to act in the premises, (People v. Goldtree, 44 Cal. 323; State v. Northern Belle Co., 12 Nev. 89;) and, after a complaint is once heard and determined, there is no provision for a new trial, a rehearing, or any further consideration of the matter. It follows from the principles already stated that the power to reconsider, not being expressly given, does not exist. This statement of the law is fully borne out by the adjudicated cases. People v. Supervisors, 35 Barb. 408; Hadley v. Mayor, 33 N. Y. 603; People v. Ames, 19 How. Pr. 551; Mechem, Pub. Off. § 509. In People v. Supervisors, 35 Barb. 408, the board of supervisors of Schenectady county had met and legally apportioned and equalized the assessment of property among the several towns and wards of the county. The next day they reconsidered their action, and again apportioned and equalized the assessment, but upon a different basis. It was held, upon a very full review of the authorities, that in common with all other inferior jurisdictions they had by their first action exhausted their discretion over that subject; that such act was in fact a judgment, and they had no power to reconsider, to review, reverse, or annul their own judicial action. In Hadley v. Mayor, 33 N. Y. 603, it was held that the common council of the city of Albany, having once legally canvassed the votes returned for the election of mayor of said city, have exhausted their power over the subject, and cannot afterwards reverse their decision by making a different determination. The same rule applies to justices of the peace, (People v. Lynde, 8 Cow. 134;) the courts established by statute, (People v. Marine Court, 12 Wend. 220;) and to the district courts of this state, except in the manner authorized by law, (State v. District Court, 16 Nev. 372.) There is, indeed, but one case that we have found—Hough v. Bridgeport, 57 Conn. 294, 18 Atl. Rep. 102—that even seems to hold the contrary; and it is probable that the ruling there was based rather upon the view that the common council had not by their first action finally disposed of the matter than with any intention of holding that they could reconsider and reverse themselves at their discretion. We conclude that the court erred in this ruling admitting in evidence the records of the board of October 7, 1889, and in deciding that the plaintiff was only entitled to recover upon a valuation of the road at $12,000 per mile. All other defenses having been heretofore decided against the defendant, it is therefore ordered that this case be reversed, and remanded to the district court, with instructions to modify the judgment already entered herein by adding thereto the taxes and penalties due upon 28.39 miles of the road-bed and main track of the railroad at a valuation of $2,000 per mile.

BOWLER v. CURLER et al. (No. 1,336.)

CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS — STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

Where one without consideration conveys land to one standing in a confidential relation with him, with the understanding that he shall hold it for the benefit of the grantor, equity will raise a constructive trust, which may be established by parol; and Gen. St. Nev. § 2624, providing that no trust concerning lands shall be created except by act or operation of law, or by deed or conveyance in writing, etc., will not apply.

Appeal from district court, Esmeralda county; RICHARD RISING, Judge.

R. M. Clark, for appellant. A. W. Crocker, T. Coffin, and P. M. Bowler, Jr., in pro. per., for respondent.

BELKNAP, C. J. The plaintiff conveyed certain real property described in the complaint to his father-in-law, the appellant. The deed of conveyance states that it was made in consideration of the sum of $1,200. Plaintiff claimed, and the court and jury found, in substance, that the title to the property was conveyed to the appellant, without consideration, upon his promise to hold it in trust for the benefit of the plaintiff, and, in case of the plaintiff's death, for the benefit of his infant daughter; and that the conveyance was made because of the confidential and influential relation which existed between the parties. A decree was entered in favor of the plaintiff, requiring the defendant's son, who was also a defendant in the case, and who received the title to the property without consideration, to make a deed of conveyance thereof to the plaintiff. Appellant claims that parol evidence was inadmissible to prove the trust. The claim is based upon the statute of frauds. The statute provides: "No estate or interest in lands, * * * nor any trust or power over or concerning lands, or in any manner relating thereto, shall hereafter be created, granted, assigned, surrendered, or declared, unless by act or operation of law, or by deed or conveyance in writing, subscribed by the party creating, granting, assigning, surrendering, or declaring the same. * * *" Section 2624, Gen. St.

[If the statute is applicable to the case, the trust is void, because it is an express trust, established by parol evidence only. Nor is the trust one arising by act or operation of law, within the meaning of the statute, for the law never implies a trust when there is an express one declared by word or writing. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 470; Dennison v. Goehring, 7 Pa. St. 176. But the statute of frauds has no application. The plaintiff conveyed the property to the defendant because of the confidence reposed in him, without consideration other than he should hold it subject to the trust mentioned. If defendant were permitted to retain it, plaintiff could be defrauded, and the statute, which was intended to prevent frauds, would be the means for the accomplishment of a fraud. To prevent such a result, equity raises a constructive trust in the grantee, and in favor of the grantor.] In the case of Cox v. Arnemann, 76 Ind. 212, a husband and wife conveyed land to a person without other consideration than that he should immediately reconvey it to the wife. It was held that the land was taken in trust for the wife. The court said: "The trust in the present case, being an express trust in relation to land, cannot be proved by parol without violating the statute, unless there is some equitable rule of construction which takes such a case out of the statute. There are in equity certain trusts called 'constructive trusts,' which do not arise by implication of law. They are not resulting trusts, but are said to be in the nature of resulting trusts. Perry, Trusts, §§ 240, 241. Thus equity will raise a constructive trust to prevent a fraud. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 476. And whenever property is acquired by fraud, or when, though originally acquired without fraud, it is against equity that it should be retained by the party, then equity raises a constructive trust, which is held to be not within the statute, (Id. 482.) and which may be proved by parol. Thus in the case of Hayden v. Denelow, 27 Conn. 335, there was an agreement between father and son, by which the son was to convey land to the father, and the latter was to hold it in trust for the son's wife. It was held that, when a deed is given and received for such a purpose, a constructive trust arises, which will be enforced in equity, and that the facts out of which such trust arises may be proved by parol. So, in the case of Hoge v. Hoge, 1 Watts. 163, it was held that, if a testator be induced to make a devise, by the promise of the devisee that it should be applied for the benefit of another, equity, upon these facts, would create a constructive trust, which might be established by parol." Another case similar in principle is that of Wood v. Rabe, 96 N. Y. 422. In that case, as in this, the trust was oral. The courts said: "But, being oral, the trust was void, within the sixth section of the statute, unless the transaction constituted a trust by implication or operation of law, and was therefore within the exception in the seventh section. It is not easy to ascertain from the adjudged cases the exact scope of the exception in the statute, Car. 11., of trusts arising by 'implication or construction of law,' or of the equivalent exception in our statute of trusts arising by 'implication or operation of law.' It is not difficult to name trusts which unequivocally are trusts arising by implication or operation of law. Trusts arising from the presumed intention of the parties, indicated by their acts, although not expressly declared, and those arising from the application of some settled principle of equity to the situation, furnish many instances of implied or constructive trusts. Resulting trusts at common law, arising from the payment of purchase money, or when the trust is not declared, or is declared only in part, or for any reason fails, are illustrations of the former class, and those arising by equitable construction, independently of intention, from dealings by trustees or quasi trustees with trust property, furnish many examples of the latter. But there is a large class of so-called 'constructive trusts,' or trusts ex maleficio, where courts of equity treat the holder of the legal title to land as a trustee, and, through the medium of an assumed trust, makes that title subservient to the circumvention of fraud and the attainments of justice. Trusts of this character are not, I assume, within the exception in the statute. * * * But see Davies v. Otty, 35 Beav. 208; Sechrist's Appeal, 66 Pa. St. 237. So, where a trust is sought to be established from the violation of an oral agreement purporting to create a trust, and a court of equity upholds the trust, and enforces specific performance, the trust is not an implied or constructive trust, within the statute. See Bellasis v. Compton, 2 Vern. 294. The court in granting relief in case of an oral agreement proceeds upon the ground of fraud, actual or constructive, and enforces the agreement, notwithstanding the statute, by reason of the special circumstances." The two principles upon which equity proceeds in this character of case are thus stated: "One is that it will not permit the statute of frauds to be used as an instrument of fraud; and the other that when a person, through the influence of a confidential relation, acquires title to property, or obtain an advantage which he cannot conscientiously retain, the court, to prevent the abuse of confidence, will grant relief." Page 425. Some of the decided cases hold that trusts arising out of facts similar to those of the present case arise by implication or construction of law, and are therefore within the exception in the statute of frauds; others, that such cases do not fall within the exception; but all agree that either by the exception, or notwithstanding the statute of frauds, relief may be granted in a proper case. Appellant also claims that if any trust was established it was for the benefit of plaintiff's daughter, and not for himself. The complaint alleges a trust in favor of the daughter, and also a trust for the benefit of plaintiff, and, in the event of his death, then for the benefit of his daughter. The pleading is ambiguous in this respect, but the objection was not taken, and the evidence was sufficient to support the finding of fact upon this point. The judgment and order are affirmed.

PUBLIC LANDS — RAILROAD GRANTS — PRIOR PRE-EMPTION — EVIDENCE.

1. The affidavits and declaratory statements of persons who have entered on public lands under the pre-emption laws of the United States, filed in the proper land-office, are conclusive evidence of the existence of all facts necessary to give the right of pre-emption, and under Gen. St. Nev. § 8613, such papers may be proved by copies certified by the register of the land-office.

2. Act Cong. July 1, 1862, as amended by act of July 2, 1864, granted to the C. P. R. Co. alternate sections of land, to aid in the construction of its road, but reserved any land to which a pre-emption or homestead claim might attach before the line should be definitely fixed. Ten months before the line of the road was definitely fixed land covered by the grant was settled upon and improved, and ten days before the line was fixed the settlers filed their affidavits and declaratory statements in the proper land-office. Held, that the land did not pass under the grant.

Clark & Jones, for appellant. R. H. Lindsay and Baker & Wines, for respondents.

MURPHY, J. It appears from the records of this court that the plaintiff P. Martinoni has died since the rendition of the judgment and denial of the motion for a new trial in the district court, and by order of this court J. V. Peers, public administrator of Washoe county, has been substituted as plaintiff and appellant in place of deceased. This action was brought by P. Martinoni, now deceased, to recover possession of a tract of land situate in Washoe county. James Murphy and ——— Murphy were sued, but, they having disclaimed any interest in or right of possession to the land, it was stipulated that judgment might be rendered against them for the land, but not for damages. The cause was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment was given in favor of Joseph Deluchi and Angelo Deluchi. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and, the motion being denied, appeals from the judgment and order. The land in controversy is situate within the limits of the grant to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, by an act of congress passed July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, to secure to the government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes." 12 U. S. St. at Large, p. 489. Section 3 of said act reads as follows: "And be it further enacted that there be, and is hereby, granted to the said company, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores thereon, every alternate section of public land, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five alternate sections per mile on each side of said railroad, on the line thereof, and within the limits of ten miles on each side of said road, not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may not have attached, at the time the line of said road is definitely fixed. * * * This act was amended by section 4 of the act of July 2, 1864, (13 U. S. St. at Large, 358,) by inserting the word "ten" instead of "five," and "twenty" instead of "ten," and then reads: "And any lands granted by this act or the act to which this is an amendment, shall not defeat or impair any pre-emption, homestead, swamp land, or other lawful claim, nor include any government reservation or mineral lands, or the improvements of any bona fide settler. * * * It is conceded that the land in controversy is a part of an odd section; that the line of the road was definitely fixed on the 14th day of October, 1867; and that the plaintiff had obtained a deed from the railroad company to the land prior to the commencement of this action; and that the title of the railroad company was perfect, when it made the deed to Martinoni under the grant found in the above-mentioned act, unless it comes within some of the exceptions mentioned in said grant. The attorney for appellant contends that the evidence introduced on the part of the defendants was "incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and did not tend to prove the existence of a pre-emption claim to the land." The defendants in their answer denied the plaintiff's ownership and right of possession to the land. They also introduced in evidence the following exhibits: "Martin Groten, being duly sworn, deposes and says: I reside in Storey county, Nev. I settled upon and commenced improving the south-east quarter of the south-west quarter of section sixteen, (16,) and south half of south-west quarter and north-west quarter of south-west quarter of section fifteen, (15,) township nineteen (19) north, of range 21 east, about the 15th of February, 1864. Said land was then unsurveyed. I have not seen any notice of publication of the reception of the township plat at the land-office at Carson City, Nev., and did not know that the plat was at the land-office until a few days since, or I should have filed on the land long ago, or within the time prescribed. I now ask to be allowed to file my declaratory statement upon the above described land. MARTIN GROTEN. Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 4th day of October, 1867. WARREN T. LOCKHARDT, Register." "Declaratory Statement: I, Martin Groten, of Storey county, Nev., being a married man, and a native-born citizen of the United States, did, on or about the 15th day of February, A. D. 1864, settle and improve the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 16, and S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of S.

W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 15, in Tp. 19 N., of R. 21 E., in the district of lands subject to sale, at the land-office at Carson City, Nev., and containing one hundred and sixty acres, which land has not yet been offered at public sale, and thus rendered subject to private entry; and I do hereby declare my intention to claim the said tract of land as a pre-emption right, under the provisions of the act of congress approved the 4th of September, A. D. 1841. Given under my hand and seal this 4th day of October, A. D. 1867. [Seal] MARTIN GROTEN. In the presence of WARREN T. LOCKHART, Register.

There were two similar papers made out and sworn to by John P. Myers on the same day, and before the same officers, the only difference being Myers was a resident of Washoe county, a single man over the age of 21 years, and had settled and commenced improving the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, and S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, and the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, of section 15, in township 19 N., of range 21 E., on the 1st day of January A. D. 1864, and had resided on the land and made it his home from the date of his settlement until the time of filing his declaratory statement. All the papers are duly certified to by O. H. Gallup, as register of the United States land-office at Carson City, Nev., as being full, true, and correct copies of the originals thereof filed in his office, and that he was the custodian of the same. Plaintiff objected to the introduction of said declaratory statements, and to said affidavits, and to each of them, on the grounds following, to-wit: "That they were incompetent, and not the best evidence; that the matters set out in said exhibits, and each of them, could not be proved by such exhibits; that the evidence offered was ex parte; that the facts recited therein could not be so established in this case; that it was not competent to prove by said exhibits that the persons named therein were pre-emptors, or were entitled to the rights of such, or that they had settled upon the land, or otherwise complied with the law." The affidavits and declaratory statements are in the form as prescribed by the commissioner of the general land-office for the guidance of the local land-officers. Whenever a party makes application to pre-empt land, the register of the land-office must satisfy himself that the land is within his district; that it is subject to entry; that it has not been reserved by any act of congress, or of the proper department; and that it has not been sold. He must also be satisfied that the party making the application to pre-empt possesses the necessary qualifications to entitle him to do so, and has made the settlement on the land as required by the pre-emption laws. These are all questions of fact for the register to decide, and in deciding them he requires the exercise of judgment and discretion, and when he has decided his action is final until reversed or set aside by the commissioner of the general land-office. When the proof establishes the facts to the satisfaction of the register, that the party is entitled to enter the land, the declaratory statement, and all papers connected therewith, are filed and become a part of the records of the land department. They are kept in the office, so as to show what lands are taken under the pre-emption, homestead, or other laws of the general government. The records are in the custody and under the control of the register, and are kept under the official sanction of the government; their contents have always been considered and always have been received in courts of justice as evidence of the facts stated. In the case of Courchaine v. Mining Co., 4 Nev., 375, Lewis, J., said: "The paramount proprietor of the soil, having an unrestricted right of disposition, has established certain regulations by which persons producing the requisite proof are entitled to purchase. * * * The decision of the proper officers is therefore evidence, not only of the fact that he in whose favor it is rendered is entitled to the patent, but also that he has settled upon and improved the premises claimed by him, and is certainly a direct acknowledgment that such settlement and possession is lawful, and in accordance with the will of the general government. The register and receiver of the local land office are the officers appointed by the government to take the proof; decide upon the merits of the application. The law requires the proof in all cases to be made to their satisfaction. Where the proof is so made, and their decision rendered, how can it be said that such decision is not evidence of right of possession in him in whose favor it is given? It is a decision made by officers appointed by the government to determine such rights. Their decision is the decision of the government itself, and should therefore be accepted as evidence of superior rights. The conclusion arrived at by the land-officers, although not strictly a judicial decision, bears nevertheless a strong analogy to it, and it seems to us should be received as evidence of the right to the possession, and, indeed, of all the facts which it is necessary for the pre-emptor to prove before the land-officers." And in the case of McFarland v. Culbert, 2 Nev. 285, the same judge said: "In any event, if the defendants wished to derive any advantages from the filing of a declaratory statement, they should have introduced the statement itself, or a certified copy of it, so that the court below might judge of its effect." In the case of Baldwin v. Stark, 107 U. S. 465, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 473, Mr. Justice MILLER, speaking for the court, said: "It has been so repeatedly decided in this court, in cases of this character, that the land department is a tribunal appointed by congress to decide questions like this, and when finally decided by the officers of that department the decision is conclusive everywhere else as regards all questions of fact, that it is useless to consider the point further;" and the decision of the supreme court of Nebraska was reversed because they had re-examined the evidence upon which the officers of the land department had acted, and held the same to be insufficient.

Section 3618, Gen. St. Nev., reads: "A copy of any record, document, or paper in the custody of a public officer of this state, or of the United States, within this state, certified under the official seal, or verified by the oath, of such officer to be a true, full, and correct copy of the original in his custody, may be read in evidence in any action or proceeding in the courts of this state, in like manner and with the like effect as the original could be produced." The papers were admissible in evidence as tending to show that, at the time of the location of the route of the Central Pacific Railroad, there was a pre-emption claim to the land. It appears from the record submitted to us that on the 15th day of June, 1886, the railroad company made application to the land department of the government for a patent to the lands in question, which application was denied. It, now, we apply these doctrines which have been established by repeated decisions of the supreme court of the United States, this case before us will be readily disposed of. The plaintiff relies upon the title of the railroad company to the lands under the grant mentioned in the act of congress. Defendants deny the title of the railroad company to the lands under the grant, and have introduced testimony to show that at the date of the definite location of the route, and the filing of the map with the secretary of the interior, there was a pre-emption claim attached to said lands, and by reason thereof that the lands in dispute were exempt from the operation of said grant. In this we think they are correct. From the testimony it appears that, 10 months prior to the line of said road being definitely fixed, Groten, for himself and Myers, on his own behalf, settled upon and improved the lands in controversy, and, 10 days before the location of said line of road opposite said lands, the said Groten and Myers presented themselves at the United States land-office at Carson City, and made the proofs, to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, and made a pre-emption claim to said lands, and, from the time of receiving and filing the declaratory statements in the United States land-office, the said lands no longer remained a part of the public lands of the United States, and would never become a part of the public domain, until such time as the officers of the land department should take action, and cancel the applications of Groten and Myers; and to allow the conclusions of the officers of the land department, on questions of fact, to be subject to review by the courts in cases of this kind, would open the door to endless litigation. As said by Mr. Justice LAMAR, in the case of Railroad Co. v. Whitney, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 115: "When these three requisites are complied with, and the certificate of entry is executed and delivered to him, the entry is made,—the land is entered. If either one of these integral parts of an entry is defective,—that is, if the affidavit be insufficient in its showing, or if the application itself is informal, or if the payment is not made in actual cash,—the register and receiver are justified in rejecting the application. But if, notwithstanding these defects, the application is allowed by the land-officers, and a certificate of entry is delivered to the applicant, and the entry is made of record, such entry may be afterwards canceled on account of these defects by the commissioner, or on appeal by the secretary of the interior; or, as is often the practice, the entry may be suspended, a hearing ordered, and the party notified to show by supplemental proof a full compliance with the requirements of the department, and, on failure to do so, the entry may then be canceled. But these defects, whether they be of form or substance, by no means render the entry absolutely a nullity. So long as it remains a subsisting entry of record, whose legality has been passed upon by the land authorities, and their action remains unreversed, it is such an appropriation of the tract as segregates it from the public domain, and therefore precludes it from subsequent grants. In the case before us, at the time of the location of the company's road an examination of the tract-books and the plat filed in the office of the register and receiver, or in the land-office, would have disclosed an entry of record, accepted by the proper officers, in the proper office. Such an entry attached to the land a right which the road cannot dispute for any supposed failure of the entry-man to comply with all the provisions of the law under which he made his claim." Railway Co. v. Dunmeyer, 118 U. S. 629, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 566; Newhall v. Sanger, 92 U. S. 761; Railroad Co. v. Whitney, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 112; Whitney v. Taylor, 45 Fed. Rep. 616, (U. S. Cir. Ct. Cal.) opinion by HAWLEY, J. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

OAKES v. NORTHERN PAC. R. CO.

CARRIERS—LOSS OF BAGGAGE—LIABILITIES.

1. Carriers of passengers are responsible for the carriage and safe delivery of such baggage as, by custom and usage, is ordinarily carried by travelers; and the payment of the usual fare includes, in legal contemplation, a compensation for the conveyance of such baggage.

2. They are insurers of such baggage in the same manner and to the same extent as for goods or freight.

3. Baggage, within the rule of such liability, is confined to such articles as are usually carried as baggage, for the personal use of the passenger, or for his convenience, instruction, or amusement on the journey, and does not include that which is carried for the purposes of business, such as merchandise or the like.

4. While the obligation of a carrier of passengers is limited to ordinary baggage, yet if the carrier knowingly permit a passenger, either on payment or without payment of an extra charge, to take articles as personal baggage which are not properly such, it will be liable for their loss or destruction, though without fault.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,401.25 on account of the alleged failure of the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff certain personal property, specifically enumerated in the complaint, and constituting the contents of seven trunks.

The complaint alleges that at the time therein mentioned the plaintiff, together with his wife and several other persons, naming them, constituted the Oakes Comedy Company, an organization giving theatrical entertainments in the villages and cities situated on the line of the company's road, and that on said day, or the night thereof, the plaintiff, as proprietor of said theatrical organization, had engaged and advertised his company to give an entertainment at Thompson's Fall, Mont., and had started with said company of people and baggage, by the defendant's line of road, to said place from Hope, in Idaho; that prior to starting he applied to defendant's ticket agent at said Hope for transportation for himself and other persons aforesaid, and their trunks and contents and other movable property necessary and proper to be used by them in the business in which they were engaged, and necessary and proper as their wearing apparel; that he informed said ticket agent that he desired transportation for said persons and property, and said agent informed him that it would be necessary for plaintiff to buy five first-class tickets for the sum therein specified to secure such transportation; and that thereupon plaintiff purchased said tickets, and secured said transportation and carriage, etc., and delivered said property to its agents and servants, which was accepted and taken in their charge and care, and for which he received checks in addition to his said tickets; that it refused and failed to deliver, etc.; and through its own negligence said train was wrecked, and a large part of the property was destroyed by fire, etc. The answer of the defendant put in issue all the allegations of the complaint, or that it had any knowledge or information as to the contents of such trunks, or the value thereof, etc. Upon the trial, the jury, at the request of the defendant, were required to find special answers to the following questions: "First. What do you find to be the value of the baggage belonging to the plaintiff and his company which was lost in the wreck of the defendant's cars March 25th last, aside from the stage properties, costumes, musical instruments, and theatrical property of the comedy company? Answer. $381.25. Second. What do you find to be the value of the stage properties, musical instruments, advertising matter, tickets, stage costumes, and stage paraphernalia destroyed in the wreck on the 25th of March last? Answer. $754.75." At the same time the jury found a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,136, being for the full value of all the property belonging to the plaintiff and his company which was lost in the wreck. The counsel for the defendant moved to set aside the general verdict because the same was inconsistent with the special findings found by the jury, and moved the court to render a judgment upon such special findings in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $381.25, which the court refused to do, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,136.

Dolph, Bellinger, Mallory & Simon, for appellant. Jones & Stuart, for respondent.

LORD, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The defendant does not deny liability for the loss or destruction of the personal baggage of the plaintiff and the members of his troupe, but it denies liability for property other than actual personal baggage. In determining the question presented by this record it is necessary to understand the nature and extent of the obligation which a carrier of passengers by rail assumes as respects the personal baggage of the passenger. That obligation requires it not only to carry the passenger, but also to carry a reasonable amount of his personal baggage. "The carriage of the baggage of the passenger," said ANDREWS, J., "under reasonable limitations as to amount, is the ordinary incident to the carriage of the passenger; and the duty arises on the part of the company to carry the baggage of the passenger as incident to the principal contract, without any specific agreement or separate compensation." Isaacson v. Railroad Co., 94 N. Y. 278. As respects such baggage, a carrier of passengers is held to the same liability as a common carrier of goods. For its loss or destruction, save by the act of God or the public enemy, it must respond, though without fault on its part. To this extent it is an insurer, and is responsible for the carriage and safe delivery of such baggage, the same as goods intrusted to it as freight. But it is only to such articles as may be legally termed "baggage" that such liability attaches, no matter what may be the contents of the bag or trunk. As to what constitutes "baggage" in the legal sense, or "ordinary baggage," or "personal baggage," as commonly used in England, it has been found by the courts difficult, if not impossible, to define with accuracy within the meaning of the rule of the carrier's liability. "It is agreed on all hands," said ERLE, C. J., "that it is impossible to draw any very well defined line as to what is and what is not necessary or ordinary baggage for a traveler. That which one traveler would consider indispensable would be deemed superfluous and unnecessary by another. But the general habits and wants of mankind must be taken to be in the mind of the carrier when he receives a passenger for conveyance." Phelps v. Railroad Co., 19 C. B. (N. S.) 321. In a general sense it may be said to include such articles as it is usual for persons traveling to take with them for their pleasure, convenience, and comfort, according to the habits and wants of the class to which they belong. In Weeks v. Railroad Co., 9 Hun, 669, it is said that a passenger may carry with him "such articles of necessity and convenience as are usually carried by passengers for their personal use and comfort, instruction, and convenience, or protection." In Jordan v. Railroad Co., 5 Cush. 69, the rule is stated to be "that baggage includes such articles as are of necessity or convenience for personal use, and such as is usual for persons traveling to take with them." In Johnson v. Stone, 11

Humph. 419, the court said: "It is not practical to state with precise accuracy what shall be included by the term 'baggage.' It certainly includes articles of necessity and personal convenience usually carried by passengers for their personal use; and what these may be will very much depend upon the habits, tastes, and resources of the passenger." In Railroad Co. v. Swift, 12 Wall. 262, Mr. Justice FIELD said that the contract "to carry the person only implies an undertaking to transport such a limited quantity of articles as are ordinarily taken by travelers for personal use and convenience, such quantity depending, of course, upon the station of the party, the object and length of his journey, and many other considerations." In Macrow v. Railway Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 612, COCKBURN, C. J., said: "Whatever the passenger takes with him for his personal use and convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities or to the ultimate purpose of the journey, must be considered as personal luggage. This would include," he continues, "not only articles of apparel, whether for use or ornament, * * * but also the gun-case or fishing apparatus of the sportsman, the easel of the artist on a sketching tour, or the books of the student, and other articles of analogous character, the use of which is personal to the traveler, and the taking of which has arisen from the fact of his journeying. On the other hand, the term 'ordinary luggage' being thus confined to that which is personal to the passenger, and carried for his use and convenience, it follows that what is carried for the purpose of business, such as merchandise and the like, or for larger and ulterior purposes, such as articles of furniture or household goods, would not come within the description of 'ordinary luggage' unless accepted as such by the carrier." See, also, 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, "Baggage," 1042; 2 Ror. R. R. 988; Hutch. Carr. §§ 677, 683, 686. So that it would seem that baggage, in the sense of the law, may consist of such articles of apparel as, through necessity, convenience, comfort, or recreation, the passenger may take for his personal use, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities or the ultimate purpose of the journey. The question what articles of property, as to quantity and value, contained in a trunk, may be deemed baggage within the rule, is to be determined by the jury according to the circumstances of the case, subject to the power of the court to correct any abuse. Railroad Co. v. Fraloff, 100 U. S. 24; Bomar v. Maxwell, 9 Humph. 622; Brock v. Gale, 14 Fla. 523; Mauritz v. Railroad Co., 23 Fed. Rep. 765. As the contract of the carrier of passengers is to carry a reasonable amount of baggage for the accommodation of the passenger, it follows from the nature and object of the contract, as observed by APPLETON, C. J., "that the right of the passenger is limited to the baggage required for his pleasure, convenience, and necessity during the journey." Wilson v. Railroad Co., 56 Me. 62. Articles of whatever kind that do not properly come within the description of ordinary baggage are not included within the terms of such contract, nor is the carrier liable for their loss or destruction, in the absence of negligence. Stage properties, costumes, paraphernalia, advertising matter, etc., are not articles required for the pleasure or convenience or necessity of the passenger during his journey, but are plainly intended for the larger or ulterior purposes of carrying on the theatrical business. They do not fall, therefore, under the denomination of "baggage," and, in the absence of negligence, no liability can arise against the carrier for their loss or destruction, unless accepted as baggage by the carrier. And so the special verdict of the jury found. They segregated the articles which might properly be termed "baggage" from those carried for the purposes of business, and found separately the value of each, but by their general verdict found the company liable for the full value of the property upon the assumption that the trunks and their contents were received by the company as baggage. The bill of exceptions discloses that the court charged the jury, among other things, as follows: "There is another phase of this question. If you find from all the evidence in the case that these trunks were brought to the agent of the company, and their appearance indicated that they might not only contain the personal baggage, in the strict sense of the word, of the party, but that other things than baggage were received without objection, and no fraud or concealment was practiced by the plaintiff, if the trunks on their face advertised fully what their contents were, and their agents received them under these circumstances, and gave checks for them, and the company, through these agents and employees, took them into its charge without making any objection, then the defendant is to be deemed to have taken these articles as baggage," etc. In substance, the complaint alleges that the defendant was fully informed of the contents of the trunks prior to their delivery, and that the defendant received and checked them as baggage, which is put in issue by the denials of the answer. Although the bill of exceptions contains no evidence, nor is any certified to us by this record, the issue permitted, and the instruction was designed to meet, the evidence upon this phase of the case. Under such circumstances, we are bound to assume that there was evidence tending to show that the defendant had notice of the nature of the property, and received it as baggage for transportation. In this view, the general verdict is not inconsistent with the special findings, for if the defendant knowingly permitted the plaintiff to take as baggage articles that would not come under that description, it is liable for their loss, though not arising from its negligence. While it is true that passenger carriers are not liable for merchandise and the like when packed up with a traveler's baggage, if the baggage be lost, yet if the merchandise be so packed as to be obviously merchandise to the eye, and the carrier takes it without objection, he is liable for the loss. Story, Bailm. § 490. Thus, in the case of Railway Co. v. Shepherd, 8 Exch. 80, PARKE, B., said: "If the plaintiff had carried these articles exposed, or had packed them in the shape of merchandise, so that the company might have known what they were, and they had chosen to treat them as personal luggage, and carry them without demanding any extra remuneration, they would have been responsible for the loss. So, also, upon any limit in point of weight, if the company chose to allow a passenger to carry more, they would be liable." And in Macrow v. Railway Co., supra, COCKBURN, C. J., said: "If the carrier permits the passenger, either on payment or without payment of an extra charge, to take more than the regulated quantity of luggage, or knowingly permits him to take as personal luggage articles that would not come under that denomination, he will be liable for their loss, though not arising from his negligence." In Sloman v. Railway Co., 6 Hun, 546, GILBERT, J., after stating and citing authorities to sustain the proposition that railroad companies are not liable for the loss of merchandise delivered to them under the guise of baggage for transportation along with a passenger, said: "They are liable, if they knowingly undertake to transport merchandise in trunks or boxes, which have been received by them for transportation, in passenger trains, unless the agent who receives the packages for that purpose violates a regulation of the company by so doing, and the passenger or owner of the goods has notice of such regulation;" citing Butler v. Railroad Co., 3 E. D. Smith, 571, and other cases. See, also, 2 Wait, Act. & Def. 82. "Doubtless," said MITCHELL, J., "if the carrier had actual notice of the nature of the property, and still received it as baggage, he would be liable." Haines v. Railway Co., 29 Minn. 161, 12 N. W. Rep. 447. So, in Railway Co. v. Capps, 16 Amer. & Eng. R. Cas. 118, it was held that where a railroad company, through its baggage or ticket agent, receives articles for transportation as baggage, knowing at the time that such articles are not properly baggage, the company will be responsible therefor as a common carrier, and will be estopped from denying that the same was baggage. Railroad Co. v. Conklin, (Kan.) 8 Pac. Rep. 762; Minter v. Railroad Co., 41 Mo. 503. Again, in Hoeger v. Railway Co., 63 Wis. 100, 23 N. W. Rep. 435, a traveling agent applied to a railroad company to transport his sample trunks as baggage, and the company, knowing their contents, received and checked them as baggage, and carried them as such on the passenger train on which he rode; and the court held that both parties were estopped to claim that such trunks were not baggage, and to be treated as such, and not as ordinary freight. So that, while the obligation of a carrier of passengers is limited to ordinary baggage, yet if it knowingly permits a passenger, either on payment or without payment of an extra charge, to take articles as personal baggage which are not properly such, it will be liable for their loss or destruction, though without fault. Now, the issue invites and the instruction indicates that there was evidence tending to prove that the contents of the trunks were fully advertised, and that the agent of the defendant knew that they contained, besides personal apparel, stage costumes and properties, and that they were received and checked as baggage; and in such case the defendant is liable for their loss, though without fault, as the jury have found by their verdict, and the court affirmed by its judgment. In this view there is no inconsistency in the general verdict with the special findings, and the judgment must be affirmed.

QUIETING TITLE—RIPARIAN OWNERS—ACCRETION—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

In a suit to quiet title to certain alluvion claimed by the plaintiff and defendants, who were all riparian owners, when the question was left in doubt by the evidence, owing to its apparent conflict, as to the questions of fact, and it was manifest that some or all of the parties were entitled to the land in controversy as an accretion, held, that the court would divide the land in controversy between the respective claimants on equitable principles, and quiet the title of each riparian owner to the parcel allotted to him.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court. Multnomah county; L. B. STEARNS, Judge.

This is a suit to quiet the title to a parcel of land situate in Multnomah county. The referee found against both claimants,—that is, that neither of them was entitled to the land in controversy,—which finding was confirmed by the court, and a final decree entered dismissing the suit, from which both parties have appealed. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

R. Williams, for plaintiff. F. A. E. Starr, for defendants.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) The land in controversy is situated in the Columbia river, three or four hundred yards from its south bank, and near its confluence with the Willamette. An island called "Percy's Island" lies in the Columbia river, just below the land in dispute. This island was surveyed by the United States, and the plaintiff duly acquired the title of the United States thereto under the donation law. The land in controversy is situated at the upper end of Percy's island, and consists of a sandbar, which has been slowly increasing in size for a great many years, until a considerable part of it is now covered with a growth of willow and cottonwood, and it yields grass. Percy's settlement was in 1851, and before the land was surveyed. Not far from the same time William Bybee and James Bybee each made a settlement on separate parcels of land lying on the south bank of the Columbia river, and bounded thereon. These settlements were also under the donation law, and in due time their titles were perfected by final proof and the issuance of patents to the respective claimants. These claims are opposite to the land in controversy. The defendant Adams has succeeded to all the rights of James Bybee in the lands patented to him as a donation claim. William Bybee claims so much of this sand-bar as lies in front of his claim, as an accretion thereto, and Adams sets up the same claim to all lying in front of the James Bybee claim; while the plaintiff Percy claims the entire bar as an accretion to his island claim. So far these conflicting claims all turn upon questions of fact which must be determined by the evidence. The plaintiff rests his claim on the fact that this alluvion formed at the head of his island, and connected itself therewith, and thereby became a part of said island. There is what is called a "depression" at the head of the island, several feet below the surface of the accretion, on the bottom of which grass and some willows grow; and for a long time, unless the water was very low, there was water in this "depression," and, in the earlier years of the settlement of the country, this depression formed a channel through which water-craft often passed. It is being constantly filled up, however, by natural causes, so that it now produces some vegetation. The claim of the defendants, William Bybee and Park Adams, is about as follows: That at the time of the settlement of William Bybee and James Bybee upon their donation land claims the sand-bar in dispute was formed in front of their respective land claims, and was connected with the shore at the upper and lower ends thereof; that it continued to form and rise above the water constantly thereafter until the water, which then was between this bar and the shore, had so far receded that at low water a person could pass dry shod from the shore to the sand-bar. All the parties claim to have been in possession ever since the time of their respective settlements, using the same mainly for pasturage. Under these facts the defendants claim the sand-bar as alluvion attached to the shore, and as an accretion to their lands, respectively. On all of these questions the evidence is very conflicting, though this conflict may be more apparent than real. Time and tides have wrought many changes in the formation and location of the bars and channels about this island in the last 25 or 30 years. No doubt the witnesses narrated events as they now remember them, and the changes occurring by natural causes would account for many of the apparent discrepancies. However this may be, it seems hardly practicable to decide the disputed questions of fact so as to fully sustain the contention of any of the parties. If full credit be given to all of the plaintiff's witnesses, and assuming the facts are as his evidence tends to prove them to be, then his contention is made out, and his right to the sand-bar in question is established. On the other hand, assuming that the defendants' witnesses are to receive full credit, and that the facts are as narrated by them, then the plaintiff's case is met and overthrown, and the defendants would be entitled to the premises in dispute, or a considerable portion thereof. We have no means of determining these disputed questions of fact otherwise than by attentively weighing and considering the testimony of the witnesses, and we have seen that amidst this conflict it is impossible to determine just where the truth lies. The plaintiff's assertion of title to this land commenced earlier than the defendants', and he has exercised greater control over it, and, amidst the conflict and doubt surrounding the case, a somewhat stronger equity seems to be with him in the evidence. We have therefore concluded to quiet his title to one-half of the land in controversy lying immediately above what is known as "Percy's Island," and abutting thereon, and the other half thereof to the defendants. A decree will therefore be entered here to that effect, and the cause will be remanded to the court below, with directions to cause the lines to be marked and ascertained; and, if the defendants desire it, the half decreed to them may also be partitioned and set apart by the court below, at the same time to be held by the defendants, respectively, in severalty. These conclusions lead to a reversal of the decree of the court below. Neither party will recover costs against the other, either in this court or the trial court.

MURPHY V. CITY OF ALBINA.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—RATIFICATION OF CONTRACT.

1. Under section 18 of the charter of the city of Albina (Sess. Acts 1887, p. 176) the city of Albina may, through and by its officers and agents, render itself liable for work in improving its streets, without an ordinance first passed authorizing the same. The mayor and common council are the governing body of the corporation, and it may act through these officers, or any of them, authorized for the purpose, or it may appoint agents to carry into effect the power of improving its streets.

2. If work was done in improving the streets without regular authority by direction of the mayor and members of the council, and afterwards the council accepted the same on behalf of the city, this would be a ratification, and equivalent to an original authority.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

This action is prosecuted by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover the sum of $422.60 for grading, cutting, and filling Margaretta avenue, one of the defendant's streets, which work is alleged to have been done at the special instance and request of the defendant. The answer denies the material allegations of the complaint, and then alleges, in substance, that on the 23d day of June, 1888, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract by the terms of which plaintiff agreed, among other things, to do all the work necessary and required to be done in and about the improvement of Margaretta avenue, and for a certain distance along said avenue, in consideration of certain payments in said contract mentioned, which have been fully made; and all of the grading in the complaint alleged was done under and in accordance with this agreement. It is then alleged that the plaintiff agreed to look for payment to a fund to be raised by an assessment upon the property liable to pay for such improvement, and that defendant assessed, collected, and paid into its treasury the whole sum which plaintiff was entitled to receive for said work. The reply denied the new matter in the answer, and then sets out the contract referred to therein, and then adds: "That, subsequent to the making of said contract, and after the plaintiff had graded, excavated, and filled Margaretta avenue to the full extent required by the specifications and estimates prepared by the defendant, and under which said contract was entered into, and had fully complied with the terms of said contract on his part to be done and performed, defendant changed the grade of said street, and added to the work to be done 700 yards of cut and 942 yards of fill, which is the work sued for in this action." Upon a trial before a jury a verdict was rendered for the defendant, upon which a judgment was entered, from which this appeal is taken. The bill of exceptions shows that upon the trial the plaintiff gave evidence tending to prove that plaintiff performed the work and labor named in the complaint; that he had not been paid therefor; that the work was done by order of the city surveyor of the city of Albina, and was not included in the contract set up in defendant's answer; that the grade of said street, as provided for in said contract, was changed by order of the city surveyor of Albina, and that such change in the grade necessitated the doing of the work named in the complaint; that when said change was ordered plaintiff complained of the same to two members of the council and to the mayor of the city of Albina, and that he was told by them to go on and do the work as directed, and follow the instructions of the city surveyor; that when said work was completed as ordered by the city surveyor the same was accepted by the city of Albina, and that the reasonable value of the same was the sum of $466.20, and that said work was for the benefit of said city of Albina. At the conclusion of the evidence the plaintiff asked the court to instruct the jury that, if they should find that the work sued for was performed by plaintiff by order of the city surveyor and street supervisor of said city of Albina, acting for and on behalf of said city, and that said city, acting through its proper officers, accepted said work, and that said work was outside of and not included in plaintiff's contract with said city, and that said city received the benefit of the same; that the plaintiff notified the mayor of said city and the only councilman to be found at the time such work was so ordered of the said order of the city surveyor and street supervisor, and that said mayor and said councilman directed the plaintiff to proceed and obey the instructions of said city surveyor and street supervisor; and that, while said work was in progress, said city knew of the same,—then the city would be responsible for such work done and not paid for. This instruction was refused, and an exception was taken. The court then, among other things, instructed the jury as follows: "If the work that he has done, however, is outside of what is required by this contract,—that is to say, its grading, excavating, and filling, which brings the grade of the street above the established grade,—then he is not entitled to recover for that unless some particularly constituted authority of the city of Albina has authorized the survey of the city to be made higher than the established grade. The only authority which could thus change the grade of the street is the city council and the mayor, proceeding in the manner prescribed by charter—by ordinance—to change the grade. Unless it appears there was some such proceeding had, then any work that was done to bring the surface of this Margaretta avenue above the established grade is not authorized, and cannot be paid—cannot be lawfully paid—by the city. It may be there has been a mistake in the estimate; that the contract was framed so low by the city, and was taken by the plaintiff here upon a false basis originating in the mistake of the surveyor, whereby more work was actually done by the plaintiff than was estimated by the surveyor and street commissioner. If that was the case, I think the remedy of the parties should have been to have asked the city to revise the work of the surveyor, and, before settling with them for a price, to have had a correction then and there."

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) Whether the rulings of the trial court can be sustained must depend on the charter of the defendant and upon the facts disclosed by the record. The defendant corporation was incorporated by an act approved February 4, 1887, (Sess. Acts 1887, p. 176.) By section 18 of the charter the council is given authority to make by-laws and ordinances not in conflict with the laws of this state or of the United States, and all necessary provisions for carrying them into effect. Subdivision 6 of the same section confers upon the council power to "grade, gravel, plank, or otherwise improve and keep in repair highways, streets, and alleys: provided, that no property shall be assessed for the construction of such improvements for more than one-half of its last county assessed valuation: * * * and provided, further, that in case of proposed street improvement, when the improvement proposed is to be made at the expense of the property adjacent thereto, thirty days' notice of such intention shall be given by posting three notices thereof in public places of said city." This section confers upon the council very full power over the subject-matter named in it. It may make the improvements therein named, and pay the expenses thereof out of the general fund of the city, or, by giving thirty days' notice of such intention, it may tax the adjacent property for such proposed improvement, provided that the assessment shall not be more than one-half of the last assessed county valuation of such property. Under this provision of the charter we think the city of Albina might, through its officers and agents, render itself liable for work on its streets, without an ordinance first passed authorizing the same. The mayor and common council are the governing body of this corporation. The corporation may act through these officers, or any one of them, authorized for the purpose, or it may appoint agents to carry into effect the power of improving streets. It might confer that authority upon the street supervisor, or it might appoint a city surveyor, and vest him with authority in the premises; or, if work was done improving the streets, without regular authority by the direction of the mayor and members of the council, and afterwards the council accepted the same on behalf of the city, this would be a ratification, and would be equivalent to an original authority, and of equally binding force. Whether the work was done, and under and by what authority, and whether the same was accepted by the council, were all questions which ought to have been submitted to the jury. It appeared upon the trial that the mayor and two members of the council in effect directed the extra work to be done, and told the plaintiff to obey the orders of the city surveyor. Assuming that the two councilmen who were not consulted, so far as appears, did not consent to this, still the two that did act with the mayor would constitute a majority of the council. Upon the hearing here it was urged by respondent's counsel that it must appear that the council met and acted before any liability could arise. Two of the members of the council, and the mayor, who authorized the work, had knowledge of their own acts in directing the work to be done, and, when they met and accepted it, it is difficult to see why the city was not thereby rendered liable. The officers of the city directed the plaintiff to render valuable services for it in improving one of its streets, which he was then doing under an express contract with it; but the new or increased services were additional, and beyond those required by the original contract, which services, when performed, were accepted and used by the city with the other work performed under the express contract. In such case fair dealing requires that such labor should be paid for, when it appears that all concerned acted in good faith. The ruling of the court in giving and refusing instructions not being in harmony with what is said in this opinion, its judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

RECORD ON APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where, on appeal from an order made after final judgment, directing payment to respondent of a sum of money for the purpose of defraying expense of counsel, the transcript showed that certain affidavits and testimony of witnesses were used at the hearing of the motion, and there is no bill of exceptions, the appeal will be dismissed, under rule 32, supreme court of California, providing in such cases that the papers and evidence used on hearing the motion must be preserved by bill of exceptions.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. R. GARBBER, Judge.

E. D. Wheeler and Barclay Henley, for appellant. Henry E. Bighton and McPike & Cooper, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an appeal from an order made after final judgment, directing the appellant to pay to the respondent the sum of $7,500, for the purpose of paying certain of her attorneys for professional services rendered in the action. The respondent moves to dismiss this appeal upon the ground, among others stated: "The order appealed from was made after final judgment, and no bill of exceptions to the making of said order was ever served, settled, allowed, or filed." The transcript on appeal herein purports to show that certain affidavits and testimony of witnesses were used upon the hearing of the motion, which resulted in the order appealed from, but there is no bill of exceptions in the record. In the case of Somers v. Somers, 81 Cal. 608, 22 Pac. Rep. 967, the members of this court were divided as to the proper practice to be pursued in authenticating the record on appeal from this class of orders; but since then the court has adopted rule 32, which we think should be deemed as settling the practice, so far as relates to appeals taken since it went into effect; and, this appeal having been taken since that date, the rule is decisive of the question arising on this motion. The rule is as follows: "In all cases of appeal to this court from orders of inferior courts, the papers and evidence used or taken on the hearing of the motion must be authenticated by incorporating the same in the bill of exceptions, except where another mode of authentication is provided by law." Appellant suggests a diminution of the record so as to have the transcript herein properly certified by the clerk of the court below; but it is manifest that such certificate could not supply the place of a bill of exceptions, which is required by the rule just quoted. Appeal dismissed; remittitur stayed for 30 days.

IRRIGATION BONDS — NOTICE OF PETITION — JURISDICTION.

1. St. Cal. 1889, p. 212, provides, in proceedings for the issue of bonds of irrigation districts, that the court shall direct publication of a notice of the filing of the petition in the same manner and length of time that a notice of special elections is provided for, stating the time and place for the hearing the prayer of the petition, and that any person interested in the organization may on or before the day of hearing demur to or answer said petition. Held, that the notice prescribed by the statute was sufficient to confer jurisdiction upon the superior court.

2. Under St. Cal. 1889, p. 212, in proceedings for the confirmation of the issue of bonds of an irrigation district, the prayer of the petition is sufficient if it prays for the examination, approval, and confirmation of the proceedings "aforesaid" for the issue and sale of bonds of the district.

3. The notice is sufficient if it states the substance of the prayer in the petition.

4. Under St. Cal. 1889, p. 212, supplemental to an act providing for the organization of irrigation districts, approved March 7, 1887, authorizing the directors to institute proceedings for the confirmation of the issue and sale of bonds, the directors of the M. district issued bonds to the amount of $800,000, and, failing to dispose of them, issued another series upon vote of the stockholders to the amount of $400,000. They filed a petition setting forth the last issue, published a notice praying for confirmation of the issue and sale, and designated the time when any interested person might demur or answer. Thereafter the directors filed an amended petition, alleging the issue of the first series of bonds, and stated that the $400,000 were part of the original series, but no notice of the changes introduced in the amended petition was published or served save on defendant. The court below confirmed the order relating to the sale of both series of bonds. Held that, where the petition was amended by setting out new orders of the board, the court acquired no jurisdiction to confirm same without publication of a new notice, and the decree is void as to the $800,000 issue.

5. St. Cal. 1887, p. 30, § 2, provides: "Nor shall any lands which will not, in the judgment of said board, be benefited by irrigation by said system, be included within said district." Held, that a city or town, or a portion thereof, may, in a proper case, in the discretion of the board of supervisors be included in an irrigation district.

6. Upon the question of fact as to what lands will or will not be benefited by irrigation the decision of the board of supervisors is conclusive.

7. St. Cal. 1889, p. 23, § 6, provides that, if there be any outstanding bonds, no order of exclusion of part of the district can be made without consent of the bondholders. There was an understanding between the bidders and directors that the former were not to be held to their offer unless they could effect a sale of the bonds. The bonds were never issued or paid for, and prior to the order of exclusion the bidders had been released from their offer. Held, that the decree of validity of the order of exclusion rendered by the lower court was proper.

8. Under a petition in proceedings to confirm the sale of $400,000 of bonds issued by an irrigating district evidence applicable thereto was taken. Held, that on the filing an amended petition it was not error of the court below to refuse to try the case de novo.

9. St. Cal. 1887, p. 35, § 15, which provides the manner of giving notices for special elections for voting bonds for irrigating districts excludes the notice provided by section 5 of the act, which provides for general elections.

10. Under St. Cal. March 16, 1889, the directors of irrigation districts may commence confirmation proceedings as soon as any resolution for the issue and sale of bonds has been adopted by them.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; D. O. MINOR, Judge.

Geo. D. Schell, C. W. Eastin, and T. B. Bond, for appellant. C. C. Wright and C. A. Stonesifer, (A. L. Rhodes, of counsel,) for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a special proceeding instituted in pursuance of the act of March 16, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 212,) for the purpose of obtaining judicial confirmation of the validity of certain bonds of the respondent, which it has ordered to be issued and sold. The act referred to is supplemental to the act entitled "An act to provide for the organization and government of irrigation districts, and to provide for the acquisition of water and other property, and for the distribution of water thereby for irrigation purposes," approved March 7, 1887, and commonly known as the "Wright Law." St. 1887, p. 29. The original act, as its title imports, provides for the organization of irrigation districts, and for the adoption and carrying out of plans for the irrigation of the lands embraced therein. Among other things so provided for is the issuance and sale of the bonds of the several districts. Before any such bonds can be issued or sold the directors of the district are required to submit the proposition to a vote of the electors at a special election, and to order and give notice of such election in a manner particularly prescribed. As the validity of the bonds, when issued, depends upon the regularity of the proceedings of the board, and upon the ratification of the proposition by a majority of the electors, it is matter of common knowledge that investors have been unwilling to take them at their par value while all the facts affecting their validity remain the subject of question and dispute. To meet this inconvenience—for the security of investors, and to enable the irrigation districts to dispose of their bonds on advantageous terms—the supplemental act, under which this proceeding was instituted, was passed. It provides that the board of directors of any irrigation district may "commence a special proceeding in and by which the proceedings of said board and of said district providing for and authorizing the issue and sale of the bonds of said district, whether said bonds or any of them have or have not been sold, may be judicially examined, approved, and confirmed." The proceeding is commenced by the filing of a petition in the superior court of the county in which the lands of the district, or some portion thereof, are situate, praying the confirmation of the proceedings of the directors; whereupon the court is required to make and publish an order stating the prayer of the petition, and fixing a time and place for the hearing. Any person interested may demur to or answer the allegations of the petition, and the issues of law and fact are tried and determined by the court as in other cases, under the ordinary rules of practice. The court has power, upon the hearing, to examine and determine the legality and validity of the organization of the district, and all matters affecting the legality and validity of the bonds and the order for their sale, and has the power to confirm the proceedings in whole or in part, according to the facts. In this case the proceeding in the superior court resulted in a judgment affirming the regularity of the organization of the respondent as an irrigation district, and the legality and validity of its orders for the issuance of its bonds to the amount of $800,000, and for the sale of $400,000 thereof. The defendant, a resident and property owner of the district, who contested the validity of the respondent's proceedings, appeals from the judgment of the superior court, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Numerous errors are assigned and argued, but they are all involved in, and may be disposed of by, a consideration of a few general propositions:

First it is contended that there was no sufficient notice of this proceeding to give the superior court jurisdiction to render a judgment binding upon the lands of the district and their owners. There seems to be a claim under this head, though it is not particularly insisted upon, that the notice prescribed by the statute is not sufficient. The object of the proceeding is, of course, to compel every person interested in the district, and whose property is to be bound for the payment of its debts, to come into court, and within the time limited present and submit to judicial investigation any and all objections he may have to the regularity of the organization of the district, and all other matters affecting the validity of the bonds, so that it may be finally and conclusively determined, by a judgment which neither he nor his successors in interest can thereafter question, whether such bonds are legal and valid or not. Notice must therefore be given to all persons so interested. But it need not be a personal notice. It not only may be, but, to secure the ends of the statute, it must be, a general notice by publication in some form. It is unnecessary to take up time in the discussion of this question, which has long since ceased to be an open one in this state. Without referring to many earlier and later decisions bearing more or less directly upon the point, it is sufficient to say that the statute and proceedings under review in Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 404, 14 Pac. Rep. 71, were in all essential respects similar as to their objects and the substance of their provisions to the statutes and proceedings in question here, and the notice of this proceeding prescribed by the statute of 1889 is for every purpose as ample and beneficial as the notice to property owners, which was, in that case, held sufficient to give validity to the proceedings by which the lands of the local assessment district were subjected to a lien for the payment of the Dupont-Street bonds. The provisions of the supplemental act in regard to this matter are found in section 3, St. 1889, p. 212, which reads as follows: "The court shall fix the time for the hearing of said petition, and shall order the clerk of the court to give and publish a notice of the filing of said petition. The notice shall be given and published in the same manner and for the same length of time that a notice of special election, provided for by said act to determine whether the bonds of said district shall be issued, is required to be given and published. The notice shall state the time and place fixed for the hearing of the petition, and the prayer of the petition, and that any person interested in the organization of said district, or in the proceedings for the issue or sale of said bonds, may, on or before the day fixed for the hearing of said petition, demur to or answer said petition. The petition may be referred to and described in said notice as the petition of the board of directors of ——— irrigation district, (giving its name,) praying that the proceedings for the issue and sale of the bonds of said district may be examined, approved, and confirmed by said court."

But it is further contended that, even conceding the sufficiency of the notice prescribed by the statute, the notice actually given of this proceeding did not comply with the statute. In order to a proper understanding of the several objections falling under this head it is necessary to state generally the facts concerning the organization of the respondent as an irrigation district, and its subsequent proceedings. The petition to the supervisors of Stanislaus county, in which all its lands are situate, for the formation of the district, was filed May 11, 1887; and the order of the board declaring the due organization of the district was made July 18, 1887. Thereupon the directors of the district organized, caused surveys and estimates of the cost of acquisition and distribution of water to be made, and on November 19, 1887, fixed the sum necessary to be raised by the issuance of the bonds of the district at $800,000. The proposition to issue this amount of bonds was at a special election submitted to a vote of the electors of the district, who, by a considerable majority, voted in favor of the proposition. Upon ascertaining the result of this election, the directors, on the 3d day of January, 1888, "resolved and ordered that the bonds of said district in the sum of $800,000 be issued in the manner and form prescribed by said act." After resolving upon the issuance of said bonds, several unsuccessful efforts seem to have been made to dispose of a portion of the amount authorized, and finally, on July 1, 1889, the following resolutions were adopted by the board of directors: "It is hereby ordered that the bonds of this district be issued in the amount of $400,000 of the following denominations: 760 bonds of the denomination of $500 each, and 200 bonds of the denomination of $100 each; and that the said bonds shall in form and substance conform to the provisions of the act of the legislature of the state of California entitled 'An act to provide for the organization and government of irrigation districts, and to provide for the acquisition of water and other property, and for the distribution of water thereby for irrigation purposes,' approved March 7, 1887, and that they be signed, sealed, and numbered as in said act provided. It is further ordered that the bonds of the district, conforming to the provisions of said act and to this order, be prepared, executed, and issued in such manner and form in all respects that they shall become and be ready for sale by this board, and on behalf of this district. Resolved, that this board hereby declares its intention to sell the bonds of this district to the amount of $400,000, to-wit: 760 bonds of the denomination of $500 each, and 200 bonds of the denomination of $100 each; and it is therefore ordered that a notice that sealed proposals will be received by this board at its office in the city of Modesto, up to the hour of 1:30 o'clock P. M. of the 3d day of September, 1889, for the purchase of said bonds be published for twenty days before the said date in the following newspapers: The Daily Alta, published in the city of San Francisco; the Record Union, published in the city of Sacramento; and the Daily Times, published in the city of Los Angeles. On motion duly made, seconded, and carried, it was ordered that the board of directors of this district commence special proceedings in and by which the proceedings of said board and of said district for and authorizing the sale of the bonds of said district may be judicially examined, approved, and confirmed." In pursuance of this resolution the original petition in this case was filed in the superior court of Stanislaus county on the following day, August 1, 1889. In this petition the due organization of the district under the act of March 7, 1887, is alleged to have been effected on the 18th day of July, 1887. It is alleged that certain persons—naming them—were then duly elected, and have ever since been the directors of the district; that all its lands are in Stanislaus county; that as soon as practicable after its organization, to-wit, on November 19, 1887, the directors duly estimated the cost of acquiring water-rights and constructing irrigation works for the district at $800,000, and that it was necessary to issue the bonds of the district to that amount, and that the same should be sold, provided the electors of the district should vote in favor of their issuance. It is alleged that a special election was immediately called, at which the proposition should be submitted and voted upon, of which the notices required by the statute were duly published and posted; that at the time appointed the election was in fact held; that the returns of said election were duly made and canvassed, and the result duly declared and recorded, and that the vote was 439 in favor of and only 76 against the proposition. The original petition fails at this point to state the next steps actually taken by the board of directors, viz., its resolution of January 3, 1888, to issue the $800,000 authorized by said vote, and its unsuccessful efforts to sell portions of such issues. Omitting all reference to these proceedings, it alleges the orders and resolutions of July 31, 1889, above quoted, directing the issuance and sale of bonds to the amount of $400,000, and closes with the following prayer: "Wherefore your petitioner prays that the proceedings aforesaid for the issue and sale of said bonds of said irrigation district may be judicially examined, approved, and affirmed by said court." Upon the filing of this petition the judge of the superior court made an order fixing the 24th day of August, 1889, for the hearing of the petition, and ordered the clerk to cause notice of the filing of the petition to be given and published as prescribed by law. In pursuance of said order the following notice was issued and published for the prescribed period: "In the superior court of the county of Stanislaus, state of California. In the Matter of the Modesto Irrigation District, No. 1,008. Notice is hereby given that the petition of the board of directors of the Modesto Irrigation district, praying that the proceedings for the issue and sale of the bonds of said district may be examined, approved, and confirmed, was on the 1st day of August, 1889, filed in said court; that said court fixed as the time for the hearing of the said petition the 24th day of August, 1889, at the court-house, in the city of Modesto; and notice is further given that any person interested in the organization of said district, or in the proceedings for the issue or sale of said bonds, may, on or before the day last above mentioned, demur to or answer said petition. By order of the court. Attest: E. D. McCABE, Clerk. By A. J. Lewis, Deputy-Clerk. [Indorsed.] Filed October 21, 1889. E. D. McCABE." The defendant, on the 24th day of August, 1889, appeared in the proceedings by his attorney, and filed a demurrer to the petition, which was overruled by the court, and on September 3d he filed an answer, and the issues were set for trial on October 21, 1889, upon which day the trial commenced, and continued until both parties closed their evidence on October 26th, whereupon the court adjourned until October 28th. When the hearing was resumed on the 28th, and after the argument had commenced, the petitioner asked and obtained leave to file and serve an amended petition, and defendant was granted leave to demur to or answer such amended petition within 10 days after service of an engrossed copy. On the 30th day of October the amended petition was filed, which, in addition to the allegations of the original petition, alleged the order of the board of directors of January 3, 1888, for the issuance of the $800,000 of bonds voted by the electors, and also that the $400,000 of bonds ordered issued and sold by the resolution of July 31, 1889, were a part of the amount of $800,000 ordered issued by the resolution of January 3, 1888. The prayer of the amended petition was a repetition of the original prayer. The defendant, upon being served with the amended petition, again demurred, and, his demurrer being overruled, he again answered, specifically denying everything alleged in the petition, and setting up several matters of defense. He then demanded that the whole case should be tried de novo, disregarding all the evidence that had been taken; but the court refused this demand, holding that the evidence already taken might properly be considered, but allowing the parties to introduce evidence as to the new matters embraced in the amended pleadings. In pursuance of this order the trial was resumed on November 21st between the petitioner and defendant, and thereupon the case was argued, submitted, and decided. No notice of the changes introduced into the petition by the amendments above mentioned was ever published or served in any manner except upon the defendant, but the court in its findings and decree confirmed and declared valid not only the order of July 31, 1889, relating to the issue and sale of the $400,000 of bonds, but also the order of January 3, 1888, relating to the issue of $800,000, which, as we have said, was mentioned for the first time in the amended petition.

Such being the case, the appellant objects to the published notice of the filing of the petition—First, that it was insufficient as a notice of the original petition; and, second, that it could not possibly confer upon the superior court any jurisdiction to confirm the proceedings alleged for the first time in the amended petition. The statute (section 3) requires that the notice shall state, among other things, the prayer of the petition; and it is contended that this notice did not state the prayer of the petition; but we think the notice contained everything necessary to a substantial compliance with the law. The prayer of the petition must be read in connection with the petition itself in order to understand its meaning, but, so read, it is clear and intelligible, and is in effect a prayer for the judicial examination, approval, and confirmation of all the proceedings set out in the petition, including those for the organization of the district, for they, like the rest, were essential to the legality and validity of the bonds; and, accordingly, the statute (section 5) expressly confers power and jurisdiction upon the court in all proceedings for the confirmation of bonds to examine and determine, approve and confirm, the proceedings for the organization of the district, as well as all other proceedings that may affect the legality and validity of the bonds and the order for their sale. The prayer, therefore, was sufficient, when read in connection with the petition; but to have repeated it in its literal terms in the notice would have been meaningless, and the only way to "state" it was to give its substance, as was done. Of course, to a person entirely ignorant of the law authorizing and regulating the proceedings, the notice may have been unintelligible; but it would have been equally so to such a person if the prayer of the petition had been as full and specific as the allegations upon which it was founded, and had been copied verbatim in the notice. A knowledge of the law is, however, imputed to every one interested in the proceeding; and it is decided in Lent v. Tillson, supra, that the notices required in cases of this character are to be construed and aided by reference to the statute. So read and construed, we think that the notice in this case was in substantial compliance with the statute, and imparted sufficient notice to all the world that the directors of Modesto irrigation district, No. 1,008, would, on the 24th day of August, 1889, submit the question of its corporate existence and the regularity of all its proceedings for the issuance and sale of its bonds, so far as the same were set out in its petition on file, to the superior court of Stanislaus county, and would ask the court to decree the regularity of all such proceedings; and we think that all persons interested in the district, being so notified of the time of the filing of the petition and of the office in which it remained as a public record, were bound to take notice of its specific allegations, and, if they had any objection to the confirmation of the orders and proceedings referred to in the prayer of the petition, that they were required to present their objections to the court at the time and place mentioned in the notice, or be forever precluded—they and their successors—from questioning the validity of the bonds issued in pursuance of such proceedings.

But could the court, without the publication of a new notice for the statutory period, acquire jurisdiction to examine and make a valid confirmation of the proceedings not set out in the petition on file when the original notice was published, and to which alone it referred? Or, to state the question more precisely, could the court, by giving notice of a petition to confirm an order for the issue and sale of bonds to the amount of $400,000, acquire jurisdiction to confirm an order for the issuance of bonds to the amount of $800,000? We do not think it could. The only answer which respondent makes upon this point to the contention of appellant is that he had notice of the amended complaint; that he demurred and answered to its allegations, and therefore cannot be heard to object that other persons had no notice. Of course, in ordinary proceedings intended to fasten a liability upon particular defendants, and in which each may be made independently liable, this would be a sufficient answer. But here the proceeding is in rem, and its object is to establish the validity of the bonds as against the irrigation district and all persons interested in the district. To be effective for the protection of investors or the advantage of the district, the judgment would bind all the world. A judgment binding upon the appellant alone must be, in effect, a nullity, leaving the district in precisely the same position it was in before the proceeding was commenced. Such being the case, this appellant, as a land-owner of the district, directly interested in the price to be realized upon a sale of its bonds, has a right to insist that the steps necessary to give the court jurisdiction to pronounce a binding decree shall be regularly taken. And we can see no escape from the conclusion that this decree, so far as it attempts to confirm the order of January 3, 1888, for the issuance of $800,000 of the bonds of the district, is erroneous, and void for want of jurisdiction; but we think there is no doubt that the superior court had jurisdiction, acquired by full compliance of the law, to examine into and confirm the order of July 31, 1889, for the issuance and sale of $400,000 of the bonds of the district, and that, as to that order, the decree may be affirmed, if it, and the proceedings upon which it was founded, were regular and legal. To sum up in this branch of the case, we are told, with reference to the points presented by appellant, as follows: The object of the act of March 16, 1889, is to provide a security for investors, and promote the advantage of the irrigation districts by enabling the courts of the state to render a judgment binding on all the world as to the validity of bonds to be offered for sale by such districts. To obtain such judgment the petition should set forth the particular orders for the issuance and sale of bonds, confirmation of which is desired. How fully the preliminary proceedings must be alleged is a question which does not arise here, but with respect to the organization of the district it is only necessary that its due organization and the election of its first board of directors should be alleged in general terms. The prayer of the petition is sufficient if it prays for the examination, approval, and confirmation of the proceedings "aforesaid" for the issuance and sale of bonds of the district; and the notice is sufficient if it states the substance of such prayer, and in other respects conforms to the statute. But the decree of the court cannot go beyond the orders for the issuance and sale of bonds which are alleged in the petition; and, in case the original petition is amended by setting out other orders for the issuance or sale of bonds, the court will not acquire jurisdiction to confirm such orders without the publication of a new notice of the amended petition. A decree, however, confirming all the orders alleged in the original and amended petitions, is not void for want of jurisdiction as to the orders set out in the original petition merely because no new notice has been given of the filing of the amended petition. If there was due publication of sufficient notice of the original petition, the decree of the court confirming the orders for the issuance and sale of bonds therein specifically alleged, and of all the preliminary proceedings affecting their validity, including those for the organization of the district and the election of its first board of directors, is within the jurisdiction of the court, and can be assailed only by those who have contested the proceeding, and by them only upon the ground of prejudicial errors affecting their substantial rights, which have been duly excepted to. In this case, accordingly, we hold that so much of the decree as confirms the order for the issuance of $800,000 of bonds of the district dated January 3, 1888, is void, but that it should be affirmed, so far as it confirms the order of July 31, 1889, for the issuance and sale of $400,000 of the bonds of the district, unless in conducting the proceeding the superior court committed error to the prejudice of this appellant.

The first point urged by the appellant upon this branch of the case is that the superior court erred in confirming the proceedings of the board of supervisors in organizing the district because said board, by including therein the city of Modesto, had violated the following provision of the Wright law: "Nor shall any lands which will not, in the judgment of said board, be benefited by irrigation by said system, be included within such district." St. 1887, p. 30, § 2. It appears from the record that the district as originally organized contained about 108,000 acres of land, including the city of Modesto, a town covering about 2,000 acres and having about 3,000 inhabitants and about 600 dwelling-houses, besides shops, stores, etc.

One proposition of the appellant seems to be that the mere fact of the corporate existence of a town or city, though situate in the midst of a district susceptible of irrigation by one system, necessarily deprives the board of supervisors of the county of the power to include any of the lands within the corporate limits of such city or town in an irrigation district. We say this seems to be a proposition of the appellant, because, although it is not expressly stated in terms, it appears to be necessary to sustain his contention; for, if it lies within the discretion of the board to include in an irrigation district any part of the lands of a town or city upon the ground that in their judgment such part will be benefited by irrigation under the system proposed, and if the judgment of the board upon the question of benefits is conclusive of the fact,—as we shall show that it is,—there is no ground upon which a court can say that an order including all the lands of a city or town in such district is void. The idea of a city or town is, of course, associated with the existence of streets, to a greater or less extent lined with shops and stores, as well as of dwelling-houses, but it is also a notorious fact that in many of the towns and cities of California there are gardens and orchards inside the corporate boundaries requiring irrigation. It is equally notorious that in many districts lying outside of the corporate limits of any city or town there are not only roads and highways, but dwelling houses, outhouses, warehouses, and shops. With respect to these things, which determine the usefulness of irrigation, there is only a difference of degree between town and county. The advantages of irrigation to a town like Riverside, in San Bernardino county, for instance, no one could deny; and the difference between such a town and these places where irrigation would be as manifestly out of place are not marked by any hard and fast line which would enable a court to lay down a rule of discrimination. The question whether in any particular case a town will, as a whole, be benefited directly by the application of water for irrigation, is in its nature, and under existing conditions must remain, a question of fact to be decided by that tribunal to whose discretion it had been committed by the legislature. It is very certain that the legislature intended that cities and towns should, in proper cases, be included in irrigation districts, for the act expressly provides for the assessment and taxation according to their value not only of city and town lots, but also of the improvements thereon. St. 1887, p. 37, § 18 et seq. And this feature of the law was made an argument against its constitutionality in the case of Irrigation Dist. v. Williams, 76 Cal. 360, 18 Pac. Rep. 379, in which its constitutionality was affirmed. Such having been the intention of the legislature, as is clearly apparent, and it being equally clear and notorious as matter of fact that there are cities and towns which not only may be benefited by irrigation, but actually have in profitable use extensive systems for irrigating land within their corporate limits, it cannot be denied that the supervisors of Stanislaus county had the power to determine that the lands comprising the city of Modesto would be benefited by irrigation, and might be included in an irrigation district. There was, it appears, a large majority of the electors of Modesto in favor of such inclusion; but the appellant, and others owning buildings, objected to being included in the district, on the ground that their lots, covered with stores, shops, and warehouses, would not be benefited. If this objection was good ground for excluding the city from the district, it is probable that no district could ever be successfully organized; for, in the nature of things, an irrigation district must cover an extensive tract of land, and, no matter how purely rural and agricultural the community may be, there must exist here and there within its limits a shop or warehouse covering a limited extent of ground that can derive no direct benefit from the use of water for irrigation. Here, again, the difference between town and county is one of degree only, and a decision in the interest of shop-owners in towns that their lots cannot be included in an irrigation district would necessarily cover the case of the owner of similar property outside of a town. It is nowhere contended by the appellant that in organizing irrigation districts it is the duty of the supervisors to exclude by demarkation every minute tract or parcel of land that happens to be covered by a building or other structure which unfits it for cultivation, and certainly the law could not be so construed without disregarding many of its express provisions, and at the same time rendering it practically inoperative. We construe the law to mean that the board may include in the boundaries of the district all lands which in their natural state would be benefited by irrigation, and are susceptible of irrigation by one system, regardless of the fact that buildings or other structures may have been erected here and there upon small lots, which are thereby rendered unfit for cultivation at the same time that their value for other purposes may have been greatly enhanced. So construed, we can see no objection to the law upon constitutional grounds or grounds of expediency. As to owners of such property, it seems reasonable to assume that they must participate, indirectly at least, in any benefits the district may derive from the successful inauguration of a system of irrigation; but, aside from this, the law contains an express provision designed to secure to them a benefit exactly corresponding to any burden to which they may be subjected, and in that respect is far more equitable than many of the assessment laws which have been upheld here and elsewhere. The provision referred to is this: Every taxpayer of the district receives a portion of all the water distributed exactly equivalent to his proportion of the total tax levied, and this water is his to use or to sell, as he may elect; so that, if his lot is not fit for cultivation, he nevertheless gets a full equivalent for the tax assessed to him. St. 1887, p. 34, § 11. Upon these grounds we hold that a city or town, or a portion thereof, may, in a proper case, be included in an irrigation district. As to what is or what is not a proper case for such inclusion, the decision of that question has been committed to the several boards of supervisors, whose discretion is not subject to the control of any court. Upon matters affecting their jurisdiction the orders of the board of supervisors may be open to review, but upon the question of fact as to what lands will or will not be benefited by irrigation their decision is final and conclusive. See section 2 of the act, St. 1887, p. 30.

The formation of irrigation districts is accomplished by proceedings so closely analogous to those prescribed for the formation of swamp-land reclamation districts that the decisions with respect to the latter are authority as to the former, and we cite, as conclusive of this point, People v. Hagar, 52 Cal. 181; 66 Cal. 60, 4 Pac. Rep. 951. Many other decisions to the same effect are cited in the briefs of counsel, but we deem it unnecessary to refer to them here. The superior court did not err, therefore, in refusing to allow the appellant to introduce evidence for the purpose of proving that his and other lots in the city of Modesto would not be benefited by the proposed system or any system of irrigation. Nor did the court err in refusing the offer of appellant to prove that the board of supervisors wrongfully included the city of Modesto in the irrigation district, for the purpose of carrying out the scheme of organization against the wishes of the farmers outside the city. To entitle the appellant to prove that the board and its members, well knowing that the lands of the city would not be benefited by irrigation, had nevertheless included them for the corrupt purpose suggested, and not in the exercise of their honest judgment and discretion, the facts constituting the fraud should have been fully pleaded in the answer; but no such facts as he offered to prove were pleaded. It is, indeed, alleged that the order including the city was not made in the exercise of the judgment and discretion of the board, but contrary thereto. This allegation is part of a separate defense, in which it is coupled with other allegations, going to show that the lands of the city would not be benefited by irrigation; but it is nowhere alleged that the board, or any of its members, actually believed at the time they offered such lands to be included in the district that they would not be benefited. The court therefore properly sustained the objection that the offered evidence was immaterial. As to all such matters as were alleged in the answer, the evidence shows that the board of supervisors acted with the utmost deliberation upon the petition for the organization of the district; that they heard and considered numerous objections and the testimony offered in support of them, and did not make their final decision until the time allowed for deciding had nearly elapsed.

The next point urged for appellant arises out of the fact that, after the original organization of the district including 108,000 acres, and after the proposition to issue $800,000 of bonds had been ratified by a vote of the electors of the district, and after the resolution of the directors to issue the bonds to that amount, the board of supervisors had ordered a portion of the district embracing 28,000 acres to be cut off and excluded therefrom. It is contended that this order, which was one of the proceedings confirmed by the superior court, was void for want of jurisdiction in the board to make it. The proceedings for the exclusion of lands from an irrigation district, of which they form a part, are authorized and prescribed by another act amendatory and supplemental to the Wright act, approved February 16, 1889. St. 1889, p. 21. This act provides for the filing of a petition for exclusion by owners of lands within the district; notice of the filing of such petition, and time and place of hearing; the presentation of objections by parties interested; and, in certain cases, for a submission of the question of exclusion to a vote of the electors of the district. Among other things it is provided that, if there be any outstanding bonds of the district, no order of exclusion can be made without the consent in writing of the holders of such bonds, acknowledged as deeds of conveyance are required to be acknowledged. It is contended by the appellant that at the time the petition for the exclusion of the 28,000 acres was filed, and during the greater portion of the time the notice of the hearing was being published, there were outstanding bonds of the district, and that no written consent of the holders of said bonds was ever given to the making of the order. But the fact is, there never were any outstanding bonds of the district. Its bonds, as above stated, had more than once been offered for sale, and at one time a bid for $50,000 of the bonds had been made by Tucker and Perley, and formally accepted by the directors. But the evidence shows that at the time of the making and accepting of this bid there was an understanding between the bidders and the directors that the former were not to be held to their offer unless they could succeed in negotiating a sale of the bonds to some outside party, and, as they failed to do so, the bonds had never been issued or paid for; and prior to the making of the order of exclusion, Tucker and Perley had, upon their written request, been released from their offer by formal resolution of the board of directors. Such being the case, it is clear that there had not only never been any outstanding bonds of the district, but that at the date of the order of exclusion there was not even a subsisting contract for the issuance of the bonds. We cannot perceive, therefore, that the court committed any error in decreeing the validity of the order of exclusion. But, even if the decree had been in that respect erroneous, it is by no means clear that it would have been material; for the order of exclusion is not one of the orders set out in the petition of the respondent, confirmation of which is prayed. It is alleged for the first time in the answer of appellant, and its invalidity charged as matter of defense, and as a ground for refusing confirmation of the order for the issuance and sale of bonds. It is therefore material only so far as its validity or invalidity affects such order for the issuance and sale of bonds, and we do not understand how that order would be any more or less valid whether the order of exclusion was legal or not.

The superior court did not err in holding that the $400,000 of bonds ordered to be issued and sold by the order of July 31, 1889, was part of the issue of $800,000 proposed and voted and ordered issued January 3, 1888. The evidence fully sustains the finding, and there is nothing really opposed to it, except the mere fact that the resolution of the board of directors does not in express terms couple the issue and sale of the $400,000 of bonds with the previous proceedings authorizing the issuance of $800,000 of bonds. The fact that when the proposition for the issuance of $800,000 was ratified by a vote of the electors, the plan in contemplation was to bring water from the Stanislaus river sufficient to irrigate 108,000 acres, and that the order for the issuance and sale of $400,000 was made after a change in the district and a change of plan contemplating the bringing the water from the Tuolumne river sufficient only for the irrigation of 80,000 acres, does not destroy the relation between the last order for the sale of bonds and the original authority to issue them. The authority to issue bonds is wholly independent of the source of supply of water or any plans for obtaining it. There is nothing in the law to prevent the directors from changing their plans in this respect whenever they find it to the advantage of the district to do so; and any order they may make for the issuance and sale of bonds must be referred to the proceedings by which alone such order is authorized whether they are expressly referred to or not.

The superior court did not err in refusing to try the case de novo after the filing of the amended petition. All the evidence that had been taken was applicable to the issues formed by the amended pleadings; and, indeed, the principal object and only effect of the amendments to the petition were to make it conform to the evidence already in. It would therefore have been a mere waste of time, as well as a most unusual practice, to have introduced anew the evidence already before the court.

It is contended that the board of directors never had any authority to issue any bonds of the district, because no legal notice was given of the special election at which the proposition to issue bonds was submitted to a vote of the electors. The point of this objection is that the general notice prescribed by section 5 of the Wright act (St. 1887, p. 31) was not posted in the office of the board; but this was a special election held under section 15 of the act, page 35, and the notices prescribed by that section were duly given. As we construe the law, that section applies to such special elections, to the exclusion of section 5.

It is contended that this judgment cannot be sustained because the proceeding was commenced before any bonds had been issued. According to appellant's construction of the supplemental act, no proceeding can be commenced under it until bonds have been actually issued. There may be something in the literal terms of the title and one or two clauses of the act to countenance this construction, but, read as a whole, and with reference to its manifest purpose, and the evil it was intended to correct, it must be construed as allowing the proceeding to be commenced as soon as any resolution has been adopted for the issue and sale of bonds.

Finally, it is contended by appellant that the authority originally granted to the directors to issue bonds to the amount of $800,000, at the time when the district embraced 108,000 acres, ended with the order excluding 28,000 acres; for, he says, even if the legislature intended to bind the new or reconstituted district by a vote of the old district, the law, to that extent, would be unconstitutional; citing sections 11, 12, and 13 of article 11 of the constitution of California, and section 10, art. 1, of the constitution of the United States. If, after this district had actually incurred a debt by the issuance of bonds, a portion of the lands of the district had been excluded without the consent of the owners of the lands remaining, the argument of appellant on this point would have had much force, and would at least have been deserving of serious consideration. But the facts being that, at the time of the exclusion of 28,000 acres from this district, it had no debt, and that, after notice of the proceeding, no objection was made to such exclusion by any person, there is no basis for any claim of injustice or violation of constitutional rights. The identity of the district was not destroyed by the exclusion of a part of its lands. Those who remain in the district will receive all the benefits of the expenditures of the proceeds of its bonds. They will not be compelled to pay for anything for the benefit of others. Nor is there anything in the law to compel the directors of the district, as constituted, to expend the whole amount of bonds authorized, if such amount shall not be needed. The provision of section 15 for the issuance of the bonds voted is merely directory, leaving it in the discretion of the board to issue and sell such amount of bonds, within the amount voted, and at such times, as they may find expedient. Upon a review of the whole case, we conclude that all the proceedings examined, approved, and confirmed by the superior court were regular and valid, but that the court did not acquire jurisdiction to confirm the order or resolution of January 3, 1888, for the issuance of $800,000 of the bonds of the district in this proceeding. That order, however, is not essential to the validity of the order for the issuance and sale of $400,000 of bonds, which depends upon and is sustained by the other proceedings for the organization of the district and the issuance of bonds. It is therefore ordered that the judgment and decree of the superior court be, and the same is hereby, modified by striking out so much thereof as confirms said order of January 3, 1888, for the issuance of $800,000 of bonds of respondent, and, as so modified, the judgment and decree, as well as the order overruling appellant's motion for a new trial, are affirmed.

OHM V. SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (No. 13,679.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES BY DECEDENT — ACTION TO SET ASIDE.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 1589, 1590, which direct the administrator, on the application of creditors of the decedent, to sue for the purpose of setting aside fraudulent conveyances made by the decedent in his life-time, only such creditors whose claims have been allowed by the administrator, or who have established them by judgment, can compel the administrator to bring the action.

2. A creditor of an estate may bring an action in his own name to set aside a conveyance made by the decedent in his life-time in fraud of creditors, or the administrator may be compelled to bring the action in a proper case; and an order of the superior court, directing a creditor to commence and prosecute the action in the name of the administrator, will be annulled on a writ of review brought for that purpose.

In bank. On writ of review.
W. C. Belcher, for petitioner.

PATERSON, J. The petitioner is administratrix of the estate of E. F. Ohm, deceased. On March 23, 1889, Mrs. Judge filed a petition in the superior court, asking for an order directing the administratrix to allow her name to be used in an action to be brought against the surviving wife of the deceased (Augusta L. Ohm) to set aside a conveyance of certain land made by E. F. Ohm in his life-time to his said wife, with intent to defraud his creditors. It was alleged that at the time of the conveyance E. F. was indebted to sundry persons in the sum of about $90,000, including a debt to petitioner of about $5,000; that the conveyance was made without consideration, and to defraud creditors; that deceased left no estate, except what was conveyed to his wife as aforesaid, with which to pay the claims of creditors; that the administratrix, though requested to do so, refused to bring suit to set aside the conveyance. A hearing was had upon the allegations of the petition, and the court ordered that Mrs. Judge be allowed to sue in the name of Anna A. Ohm, the administratrix, on condition that Mrs. Judge defray all expenses of the action, and save the administratrix harmless therefrom. Thereupon the administratrix filed a petition herein for a writ of review, the writ was issued, a return has been made setting forth the facts substantially as narrated above, and showing the additional facts in a bill of exceptions, which is made a part of the return; that in due time Mrs. Judge presented her claim against the estate for over $5,000; that the claim was rejected; and that she commenced an action against the administratrix on said rejected claim, which action is still pending.

The question is presented, therefore, whether a person whose claim has been disallowed by the administratrix, and for the establishment of which as a claim an action is pending and undetermined, is a creditor, within the meaning of section 1590 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section reads as follows: "No executor or administrator is bound to sue for such estate, as mentioned in the preceding section, for the benefit of the creditors, unless on application of creditors, who must pay such part of the costs and expenses of the suit, or give such security to the executor or administrator therefor, as the court, or judge thereof, shall direct." Under the provisions of this section, and the provisions of sections 1589 and 1591 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is clear that the administratrix would have no right to commence an action to set aside a deed of her intestate as void against creditors, unless "there is a deficiency of assets," (section 1589,) and there are creditors for whose benefit "all real estate so recovered must be sold," (section 1591.) Any creditor is entitled to maintain an action to set aside such a fraudulent conveyance, (Hills v. Sherwood, 48 Cal. 392,) but he must be a creditor whose claim has been allowed by the administrator, or is evidenced by a judgment. Mesmer v. Jenkins, 61 Cal. 153; McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 300. And the statute of limitations does not bar an action by the creditor until three years after the judgment establishing the creditor's claim. Forde v. Fire Co., 50 Cal. 302. In New York it is held that the debt must be ascertained by judgment, and that the reason of the rule "does not fall by the death of the debtor before judgment recovered for the debt." Estes v. Wilcox, 67 N. Y. 264. And in Michigan, under statutes similar to our own, it has been decided that, until the estate has been charged with claims by allowance or judgment, "there is no basis for a bill against a decedent's fraudulent conveyance in order to recover means to pay them." O'Connor v. Boylan, 49 Mich. 209, 13 N. W. Rep. 519. To the same effect is the decision of the court in Fletcher v. Holmes, 40 Me. 364.

It is claimed that the order cannot be annulled in this proceeding; that the court below had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, and, if it decided wrongfully on the evidence adduced at the hearing, it is a case of mere error, and review will not lie. If the order of the court directed the administratrix to commence an action, it would be conclusively presumed that the evidence taken by the court was sufficient to support the order. The order, however, is not that the administratrix herself commence and prosecute the action, but that Mrs. Judge do so in the name of the administratrix. This gives to Mrs. Judge, one of the alleged creditors, control of an action in the name of the representative of all who are interested in the estate,—heirs as well as creditors. We are unable to find any warrant in the statute for such authority, and no case has been cited which upholds it. There certainly is no necessity for such action. The creditor may bring an action in his own name. The statute does not exclude him,—he has his remedy independently of the administrator. Hills v. Sherwood, 48 Cal. 392. Furthermore, the court can compel the administratrix to bring suit in a proper case. The statute declares that the "executor or administrator must commence and prosecute to final judgment any proper action for the recovery of the same." Section 1589. Obedience to this mandate and the order of the court may be compelled by proceedings for contempt, or the letters may be revoked, and an administrator appointed who will prosecute a proper action. The order of the court under review herein is annulled.

FOX, J., MCFARLAND, J., and SHARPSTEIN, J., concurred.

WORKS, J. I concur in the judgment.

PEOPLE ex rel. FINIGAN v. PERKINS. (No. 13,535.)

STATE OFFICER — QUALIFICATION — DIRECTOR OF STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE.

1. Pol. Code Cal. § 907, requires an officer to qualify (1) within 10 days after notice of his appointment or election; or, (2) when no such notice has been given, within 15 days from the commencement of his term of office. Held, that one appointed, without any knowledge on his part, as director of the state board of agriculture, may qualify within 10 days after the receipt of his commission from the governor; and the fact that it was not received by him until after the expiration of 15 days from the commencement of his term will not render his qualification invalid, as the second clause of section 907 applies only when the officer has knowledge of his election or appointment.

2. Since the appointee had no knowledge of his appointment until after the receipt of his commission, his failure to qualify within the 15 days from the commencement of his term was not a "refusal or neglect" to qualify, within the meaning of Pol. Code Cal. § 908, which provides that an office becomes vacant on the "refusal or neglect" of the appointee to file his official bond within the time prescribed by law.

3. St. Cal. April 15, 1880, declares the "state agricultural society" a state institution, to be managed by the "state board of agriculture," consisting of 12 directors, to be appointed by the governor. Held, that the qualification of one appointed a director of the "state board of agriculture" is not vitiated by the fact that his official oath designated the office as that of director of "the state agricultural society;" the variance being unimportant.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Edward P. Cole and M. M. Estee, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Johnson, W. W. Foote, and Thomas J. Clunie, for respondent.

GIBSON, C. On the 18th day of January, 1887, Gov. Bartlett issued a commission to the relator, appointing him a director of the state board of agriculture for the term of four years, which began on February 1st of the same year, as prescribed by section 4 of the act of 1880. St. Cal. 1880, p. 49. The commission was forwarded from the capitol, at Sacramento, to San Francisco, by Wells, Fargo & Co.'s express, addressed to the relator at the latter place, but was not received by him until the 17th day of February, 1887, prior to which time he had no notice of his appointment or the issuance of the commission. The day after he received the commission he qualified by taking and subscribing the oath of office, which was filed the next day—February 19, 1887—in the office of the secretary of the state. Upon the filing of his official oath he immediately entered into and commenced to exercise the functions of the office, and continued to hold and discharge the duties of such office, until he was ousted therefrom by the defendant, Dana Perkins, on the 27th day of January, 1888, who claimed the office by virtue of a commission issued to him by Gov. Waterman on the 3d day of January, 1888, and under which he had duly qualified. To determine the defendant's right to the office, the relator caused this action to be prosecuted, which resulted in a judgment removing the defendant from and letting the relator into the office. Thereupon the defendant appealed.

The main question to be determined is whether the relator, in not qualifying under the commission until nearly 30 days after it was issued to him, forfeited his right to the office, under sections 907 and 996 of the Political Code. The first of the sections referred to provides that, when a different time is not prescribed, the oath of office must be taken, subscribed, and filed within 10 days after the officer has notice of his election or appointment, or, when no such notice has been given, then within 15 days from the commencement of his term of office; and the other section provides that an office becomes vacant upon the happening of certain events, one of which is the refusal or neglect of one who is elected or appointed to an office to file his official oath or bond within the time prescribed. These provisions of the law are mandatory. The official oath or bond must be filed within the prescribed time, or the right to the office becomes forfeited. People v. Taylor, 57 Cal. 620; Payne v. San Francisco, 3 Cal. 122; People v. Brite, 55 Cal. 79; Hull v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 174; People v. Hartwell, 67 Cal. 11, 6 Pac. Rep. 873. See, also, Ball

v. Kenfield, 55 Cal. 320, and People v. Perry, 79 Cal. 105, 21 Pac. Rep. 423.

Now, can it be said that the relator refused or neglected to file his official oath within the proper time? We think not. To "refuse" is to decline the acceptance of something offered, or to fail to comply with some requirement. Neglect imports the omission or disregard of some duty. How could the relator refuse the appointment, or disregard the duty to qualify connected with it, until he received information of his appointment? The power to refuse a thing or neglect a duty must necessarily be based upon a knowledge of the existence of the thing or the duty. The relator did not receive his commission until February 17, 1887, nor have any knowledge of his appointment until that time; hence he could not have acted upon it before that date. It is conceded that he filed his official oath two days after he received his commission. Treating his commission, then, as notice of his appointment, he qualified in time. In cases of elections, it seems that the commissions of state officers elect, except governor and lieutenant governor, are the only notices of their election that are provided for. The issuance of commissions to such officers devolves upon the governor under section 1291 of the Political Code, wherein it is prescribed that the governor shall, upon receiving from the secretary of state, in accordance with section 1290 of the same Code, a copy of the statement of the vote cast at the election, issue commissions to the persons who from such statement appear to have received the highest number of votes for office. It is the same with regard to the certificates of election to county officers. In their case the county clerk must, as soon as the result of the election is declared by the board of supervisors, make out, under the seal of the superior court, certificates of election, and deliver one to each person declared elected by the board of supervisors. Pol. Code, §§ 1283, 1284. These are the only notices provided for; and unless the legislature intended that the receipt of the commission in the one case, or of the certificate of election in the other, should operate as a notice, then that portion of section 907 of the Political Code, requiring officers to qualify within 10 days after the officer has notice of his election or appointment, can have no effect. But, as the construction of statutes which leads to such a result is not favored, we must where possible, as in the case before us, adopt one that will give effect to every part; hence we think that it must have been the intention of the legislature that the receipt of either a commission or a certificate of election should be deemed a notice of an election. This view is sustained by People v. Taylor, 57 Cal. 620. There, it seems, a certificate of election as sheriff issued to the relator, and he failed to qualify within 10 days thereafter, and it was accordingly held that the certificate of election was notice of his election, and, having failed to qualify within 10 days thereafter, the office became vacant. We are also of the same opinion regarding the receipt of the commissions by appointees of the governor.

To them the governor must also issue commissions, (Pol. Code, § 891,) and there is no provision for any other notice to them of their appointment. The other portion of section 907, which requires an officer elected or appointed to office to qualify within 15 days from the commencement of his term of office, evidently applies where an officer is elected at a general or special election, the result of which, when legally declared, is presumed to be known to him, and he fails to receive his commission or a certificate of his election, in which event he must qualify within 15 days after his term of office begins. Or where he is an appointee of the governor, and, as in the case of the relator here, the commencement of his term of office is fixed at a time different from that of other offices, and he knew of his appointment when it was made, which became effective upon the issuance of the commission to him, (Ball v. Kenfield, 55 Cal. 320; People v. Whitman, 10 Cal. 38; Conger v. Gilmer, 32 Cal. 80; Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137,) and he fails to receive his commission, he is then required to act upon such knowledge, and qualify within 15 days from the commencement of his official term. The relator in the present case had not, as appears from the evidence, applied personally, nor through any one else, for the office, and had no knowledge whatever of his appointment until he received his commission. He therefore had 10 days thereafter to qualify, and, having qualified within that time, he is entitled to the office.

The remaining question is, did the relator qualify as a member of the state board of agriculture? The appellant contends that he did not, as the act of April 15, 1880, provides for two separate and distinct institutions, viz., state board of agriculture and state agricultural society, and the relator qualified as a director of the state agricultural society. The act referred to is entitled "An act to provide for the management and control of the state agricultural society of the state." By the act the state agricultural society was declared to be a state institution; and a "state board of agriculture," to consist of 12 directors, to be appointed by the governor, was also provided for the exclusive control and management of the said "state agricultural society, as a state institution. The relator was commissioned as a director of the "state board of agriculture," and he qualified as a "director of the state agricultural society." The commission followed the designation of the office in the act by which it was created, and we think it therefore sufficiently definite and certain. The slight difference between that and the designation of the office in the relator's official oath we deem of no importance whatever. He qualified as a director of the state agricultural society. This is the equivalent of qualifying as a member of the board of directors, and also as a member of the society; for it is clear he could not be a director without being a member, nor be a director without being a member of the only board of directors designated and provided for in the act. The questions being thus disposed of adversely to the appellant, it results that the judgment should be affirmed.

FOOTE and VANCLIEF, CC., concurred.

DUNN v. TRAVIS.

APPEAL — SETTLEMENT OF CASE — EXTENSION OF TIME.

An order, made by a judge of one of the judicial districts of this state, extending the time within which a case for the supreme court could be served, settled, and signed, the judge being in the state of Illinois at the time the order was made and signed, is a nullity; and, the case not having been served and settled within the time prescribed in the original order, the petition in error must be dismissed.

(Syllabus by Simpson, C.)

Commissioners' decision. Error to district court, Pratt county; S. W. LESLIE, Judge.

Huron & Davis, for plaintiff in error. Noffsinger & Carskadon and E. A. Austin, for defendant in error.

SIMPSON, C. In the month of September, 1887, the plaintiff in error, S. W. Dunn, as constable, served an order of attachment upon goods claimed to have belonged to, and to have been in the possession of, John J. Davis. This order of attachment was issued by a justice of the peace of Pratt county in an action pending before him, wherein Cones, Son & Co. were plaintiffs and Davis was the defendant. After the levy of the order of attachment the defendant in error, D. W. Travis, commenced this action in replevin in the district court of Pratt county, claiming that he was the owner of a certain part of the goods seized upon by the attachment. Travis claimed 23 suits of clothes and 5 pairs of pants, of the value of $304.80, that were included in the attachment levy; and that Dunn wrongfully detained them; and that he had demanded the delivery of them to him of Dunn; and claimed $500 as damages for their detention. A trial was had in the district court on the 26th day of April, 1888, to a jury, and a verdict was returned for Travis "that he is entitled to the possession of said goods, and that the value thereof is $304.80, with 7 per cent. interest, and that plaintiff has sustained damages in the sum of $257.95." A motion for a new trial was overruled, and the case is here for review.

The defendant in error claims in his brief that the record affirmatively shows that all the evidence is not contained therein, and that all the instructions are not contained therein; and he also claimed at the argument that the record did not show that the defendant in error or his attorneys had notice of the time of settling and signing the case made, and hence we cannot consider the errors assigned in the petition in error. As to the last objection, it appears from the certificate of the trial judge to the case made that it was settled and signed on the 23d day of Deember, 1888, and was attested by the clerk on the 24th day of December, 1888. The trial was had at the April term, 1888. That the defendant was granted 60 days to make a case for the supreme court, and plaintiff was allowed 30 days to suggest amendments, and 5 days were allowed thereafter to settle and sign such case made. That on the 19th day of June, 1888, and before the time first granted to make a case for the supreme court, to-wit, the 27th day of June, 1888, the defendant applied for further time to make such case for the supreme court; and that on the 26th day of June, 1888, the judge of the district court of Pratt county extended said time 30 days from the 27th day of June, 1888, granting plaintiff 20 days thereafter to suggest amendments, and allowing the case made to be settled on 5 days' notice. A motion to dismiss the case was filed and considered by the court at the May sitting in 1889. That motion was then overruled (no opinion) on the ground that the recitations in the record could not be controverted, but that ruling is now reconsidered and modified to the extent that questions of jurisdiction may be examined, and, if it is shown that the court or the judge at chambers has made an order that neither the court nor judge at chambers had the power to make, the want of jurisdiction may be shown to impeach the record. It is established beyond question now that at the time the judge made the order extending the time for the service of the case made and its settlement and signing the same was made in the state of Illinois, while the judge was away from this state on a visit to that state. The order extending the time is therefore a nullity, as it will not be seriously contended that he could make judicial orders while absent from his district. The case not having been served and settlement made within the time originally granted by the court for that purpose, we cannot review it. It is recommended that the petition in error be dismissed.

PER CURIAM. It is so ordered; all the justices concurring.

BANNER et al. v. MAY et al.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—EVIDENCE.

In an action by creditors to set aside fraudulent conveyances it appeared that when M.'s creditors were pressing her, her husband brought one S., to whom M. transferred all her property, reciting a consideration of $33,000, but the consideration claimed to have been paid by S. was his debt, $30,000, and other debts of M. to third persons, and $10,000 cash, actually paid, amounting together to $39,000. The property was worth $20,000 more. Shortly before the transfer S. had represented to some of M.'s creditors that she was perfectly solvent. After the transfer M.'s husband remained in possession, ostensibly as S.'s agent, and continued to dispose of the stock on hand, allowing some of M.'s creditors to purchase on their debts against her; and it was not shown that he accounted to S. Afterwards M. took possession. Only one of the new books alleged to have been opened after the transfer was produced, and it seemed to have been gotten up as an after-thought. The other books were claimed to have been lost. S. was a business man of large interests, and required his other agents to keep books. Held, that the transfer was fraudulent and void.

D. J. Crowley and Whitson & Parker, for appellants. Reavis & Mires and W. Lair Hill, for appellees.

STILES, J. The plaintiffs below, who are appellants here, were judgment creditors of the appellee Laura J. May, who for a number of years carried on business as a merchant, with her separate property, at Yakima city. Mrs. May, in addition to her stock of merchandise, owned a number of town lots, and several hundred acres of farming land, and a flour mill. The mill was at Yakima city, and was operated by her. D. B. May was the husband of Mrs. May, but had no interest in the property or business involved in the cause. Prior to March 14, 1881, Mrs. May had carried on her mercantile business, and on that day she bought from the defendant Snipes a stock of goods then at Yakima city, and in payment thereof gave him her note for $16,213, payable 10 months after date, with interest at 1 per cent. per month. On the day of its date $530 was credited on the note, leaving its actual principal $15,683. No further credits appear upon the note. On December 11, 1883, Mrs. May executed to the defendant Snipes a bill of sale of her stock of goods, and the appliances and appurtenances connected therewith, and her safe, all book-accounts, wheat and flour at the mill, a lot of hogs, hay, horse, wagon, and harness, and two lots of bacon, stored in Yakima; and at the same time she executed to the same party a deed of all her real estate in and about Yakima, excepting 80 acres of land called the "family homestead." These two conveyances embraced all of Mrs. May's property excepting the homestead and household goods. The consideration expressed in the bill of sale was $16,150; that in the deed was $17,225.25. The consideration claimed to have been paid was $10,505 in money, the principal of the note above alluded to, ($15,683,) and interest thereon to date, $5,159.75, the sum of $5,548.75, due to one Murray, and the sum of $2,400, due to the First National Bank of Yakima; making a total of $39,311.14, or $5,935.48 more than was expressed in the conveyances. The amounts due Murray and the First National Bank were secured by attachments upon more or less of the property, and were assumed by Snipes; and we find that these amounts and the $10,505 cash were actually paid by him; in all $18,453.75. Of the amount involved in the note we shall speak later. The conveyances above alluded to were made under the following circumstances: Mrs. May, in addition to Murray, the bank, and Snipes, owed numerous other creditors in Portland, Or., San Francisco, Cal., and the territory of Washington, various sums, aggregating, according to her statement, some twenty or thirty thousand dollars. Her creditors in Portland were pressing her for money, and the attachments of Murray and the bank had just been levied.

Mrs. May was sick, and confined to her room. It does not appear what occurred between her and Mr. May; but on the evening of December 8th he left Yakima, and drove by team to The Dalles, Or., about 95 miles distant, found Snipes, and returned with him to Yakima; arriving back about 2 o'clock on the morning of the 11th. Between that time and the evening of the 11th the bill of sale and the deed were agreed upon, prepared, executed, and delivered; Snipes giving his check, payable to Mrs. May, for $10,505. The auditor's office was then closed, but Snipes found the auditor, and left the conveyances with him for record. They were recorded the following morning at 9 o'clock. Snipes left again for The Dalles on the night of the 11th, and May, with his wife's indorsement on the check, proceeded with such expedition that the check was paid December 13th by French & Co., bankers at The Dalles. The money, the proceeds of the check, was kept by May at The Dalles thereafter. Certain of the Portland creditors of Mrs. May, finding her without property or apparent means of paying their claims, agreed with her to a settlement of 50 cents on the dollar; 30 cents of which was to be paid in cash, to be produced by Mr. May at the proper time, and the balance in deferred notes. This settlement involved the payment of about $5,000, and was carried out about the month of May, 1884, by one Williams, an agent of the creditors, at Yakima. The contract of compromise was prepared at Portland, and taken by Williams to Yakima. There, however, was difficulty in concluding it, as May did not have the money there. The business of the settlement was carried on by Williams, May, Snipes, and the counsel of the latter; Williams insisting that Snipes should pay the money, as otherwise the creditors would attach him on the ground that the sale by Mrs. May to him was fraudulent. May claimed that he could have the money in a few days, and it was finally agreed that Snipes should give his check for the amount necessary, but that it should not be presented for a certain number of days,—time enough for May to produce the money. The check was given and paid and the settlement made; and in due time May brought the money, in coin, to Snipes' place of business at The Dalles. Other creditors, who were not included in the settlement above mentioned, got judgment on their claims, and in December, 1884, brought this action to have the conveyances of Mrs. May declared to have been a fraudulent assignment, and for other appropriate relief. The testimony was taken before a referee, and, upon submission to the court, judgment was rendered for the defendants.

Appellants maintain that the decision should have been otherwise, upon several grounds, viz.: (1) Representations made by defendant Snipes to Mrs. May's creditors as to her solvency; (2) the circumstances of the transfer; (3) the conduct of the parties after the transfer, the property having been left entirely in the hands of the Mays; (4) the inadequacy of the consideration alleged to have been paid; (5) alleged credits which should have been made on the note; (6) the books of account, their condition, and the absence of some of them. Defendant Snipes was in Portland about November 30, 1883, only 10 days before the transfer, and called upon several of the creditors of Mrs. May, told them she had asked him to see them about certain accounts against her which had been sent to Yakima for collection; assured them that she was perfectly solvent, if not pressed; that she owed him a small amount; that if he had any money to loan he would lend it to her as soon as to any one; and that, if he got money he expected shortly, he would advance enough to her to pay them. These statements were made for the purpose of quieting all the May creditors, and, had Murray been content like all the rest, the transfers might never have been made to Snipes; but they showed knowledge on the part of Snipes that Mrs. May had pressing creditors, whether he knew her actual financial condition or not. He denied such knowledge, and gave a somewhat different version of the Portland interviews; but we are constrained to conclude as above under the testimony. With the property under attachment in the Murray and national bank suits, May, with little or no consultation with his wife, made the trip to The Dalles and return, traveling 36 hours without rest at the rate of 5 miles an hour. His object was to borrow enough money from Snipes to pay off Murray and the bank, and thus relieve the pressure from other creditors. Snipes refused to make the loan, but, acting on the information conveyed to him by May, started back to Yakima with him at once to secure himself. He was prepared to attach, so as to be secured ahead of the Portland and other creditors except Murray and the bank, when the proposition was made by May to sell him the whole property. What terms the first proposal was based upon was not shown, but an agreement was very soon reached by which Snipes, in addition to his existing claim of upwards of $20,000, should forthwith pay out nearly $18,500 in cash. He might have attached, and, after paying out the Murray and bank claims would have saved his $10,505 check, and whatever surplus there was after reimbursing him would have gone to other creditors. The plan adopted gave him everything, and placed the $10,505 out of the state, and beyond the reach of creditors, except by such chance as might favor them. In this proceeding we conclude that Snipes willingly assisted the Mays, both to prefer himself and to put other creditors at such a disadvantage as would compel them to accept such terms of settlement as might be offered, as was done in the case of creditors represented by Williams, thus hindering and delaying them. The deed and bill of sale having been executed and recorded, as was before stated, Snipes returned to The Dalles, and May went there also. No third person was put in charge of the property which was released from the attachments, and everything seemed to be in the possession of Mrs. May as before. But it was shown that, whereas Mr. May had before man aged the business and property as the agent of Mrs. May, he was now appointed to manage it as the agent of Mr. Snipes, with the exception that the mill was now managed by the miller. Mrs. May's name was painted out of the store sign, leaving the space blank. Business at the store was resumed, and goods sold for cash and on credit; accounts were collected, buildings were rented, farm products were gathered and sold, and in a few instances local creditors of Mrs. May were allowed to credit goods sold them upon their claims, with the knowledge and assent of Snipes. In like manner, in other instances notes held by Mrs. May at the time of the transfer were given to her creditors, and the proceeds allowed to be retained by them in satisfaction of their demands. No new goods were purchased, but Snipes did not pay any personal attention to matters, and rarely saw any of his property. It was said that new books were opened the next day after the transfer, but, although strenuously demanded at the hearing, they were not produced, with the exception of one, which will be alluded to further on. These books, however, were not claimed to have contained any statement of account between Snipes and his agent, May. No cash account whatever was kept. No agreement was made with May as to his compensation for his services as agent, and no settlement was ever made between the employer and his agent, although it was stated by Mrs. May that the money received was turned over to Mr. Snipes; but when, and how much, did not appear, and Snipes did not so testify. This state of things continued from December 11, 1883, until a certain day in June, 1885, when owing to disagreements between May and his wife, he left Yakima, never to return. A divorce was procured by her soon after; May going into the employ of Snipes elsewhere, and Mrs. May remaining at Yakima. The significant matter in this was that, although it was claimed that May was the agent, he went away, while the wife remained, and, without any word of arrangement between her and Snipes, went on with the business as though her husband had never been there. Mrs. May kept on gradually closing out the goods until July, 1886, when a mere remnant remained, and when, with this remnant and $600 in money, furnished her by Snipes, she removed to North Yakima, and set up a millinery and fancy goods store. This store, she testified, belonged to Snipes, she acting as his agent for a percentage of the profits, but what percentage she could not state; and the fact was that she conducted it as her own business, and advertised it in the papers as hers. But of this stock, even, goods were given to one of her old creditors on account until the testimony was being taken in this case.

From these facts appellants contend the proper deduction to be that the deed and bill of sale of Mrs. May were colorable only, and were intended, while they secured Snipes, to leave her to do practically as she pleased with the personal property at least, and the rents and proceeds of the lots and land, without possibility of interference from her creditors. Concerning the value of the property there was much controversy. The values fixed by the court below, however, were just what was admitted by the defendants, and nothing more, viz., the mill and appurtenances, $5,000; the stock of goods, $14,000; the other personal property, $3,500; a total of $22,500. It also allowed a balance on the books of Mrs. May against Snipes of $5,939.48, but where this came from we are unable to ascertain. Nobody testified to it, or anything like it, except that Snipes said that was the amount agreed upon when the transfer was made. The only ledger produced by the defendants showed a balance of account due Mrs. May from Snipes, June 27, 1882, of $9,325.24. The journal following immediately upon this ledger, and running to December 11, 1883, contained further charges against Snipes of $4,530; and other memorandum account-books covering the same period contain charges against him of $840. These made a total of $14,795.24. Upon the same journal and memorandum books appear credits to Snipes of $7,945.50, including a disputed item of $7,000. Deducting the credits from the charges, the balance is $6,849.74, which seems to be correct, and made an error in Snipes' favor of $910.26. Again, Snipes admitted that the merchandise he obtained from Mrs. May was to be credited upon his note; but no credit was ever made, and he was allowed interest on the whole principal to the date of the transfer—two years and nine months—at 1 per cent. per month, amounting to $5,159.75. Had there been a careful settlement of the matter between the parties, each being mindful of his rights, this interest charge would have been reduced by nearly one-half. Next, although the transfer included all the accounts, etc., held by Mrs. May, no value whatever was allowed for them. As the face of the books presented, it was not disputed that some $30,000 of charged accounts appeared, exclusive of those against Snipes, all, with the exception of about $2,000, having been entered since June 27, 1882. The court below made no finding at all as to these accounts. They were of some value, for it was proven that certain of them were paid after the transfer; but we cannot undertake to say more than that they actually increased the value of the property to some extent. Lastly, the real estate. The court below estimated all of it, exclusive of that upon which the mill stood, at $12,223, just $2.25 less than the consideration expressed in the deed. There was no testimony whatever to support this valuation, excepting that of Snipes, who fixed no value upon any parcel but the town lots. These he admitted to have been worth $50 each, or $3,300 for the 66; and the improvements at $1,500; and remarked that he paid more than lots and land were worth. The land amounted to about 400 acres, and cost him $7,423, or $18.55 per acre. Plaintiffs called five disinterested witnesses of the vicinity, fairly qualified to judge of the values of the real property. Of these the lowest gave the value of the land at $13,000, of the lots $6,600, and of the improvements, $6,400; making a total of $26,000, as against $12,225.25, admitted to have been paid. None of these witnesses fixed the total value of the property conveyed, exclusive of the book-accounts, at less than $48,960. In the face of such testimony we can see no reason why the statement of the defendants should have been accepted as verity, unaccompanied as it was with any particularization, and unsupported by any disinterested witness; and we conclude that the property conveyed was undervalued to the extent of at least $20,000, so that Snipes, instead of paying $10,500 to the Mays, should have paid nearly or quite three times that amount on any fair basis of calculation.

Mrs. May kept a set of mercantile books from the inception of her business in 1879 until the date of the transfer, December 11, 1883. From that time on, it was claimed, a new set of books was kept, at least until June, 1885, when her husband went away. Mr. May was the book-keeper. At the hearing before the referee, which commenced in February, 1886, and on May 4th thereafter, the referee ordered the defendants to produce their books. Various adjournments were had until July 30th before any books were forthcoming. Mr. May in the mean time testified that on May 30, 1884, three of the important books were taken from the store by some one unknown, and he was able to produce only Mrs. May's first ledger, covering her business from 1879 to June 27, 1882; her journal day-book from the last date to and including December 10, 1883; 19 small memorandum books, from some of which the journal appears to have been posted, and the last of which stops with December 10; and one sale memorandum book, commencing December 12, 1883, and running to September 23, 1884, "Exhibit E." The ledger was well kept, and showed long and hard usage, and with a single exception the accounts in it ended July 27, 1882, and where they were unbalanced showed transfers to "Ledger B." But the account of Leonard Thorp was continued to the 2d of August following. The journal or day-book was a very much newer book, and had few signs of wear, though it covered a period of 16½ months, and had nearly 500 pages of entry. Appellants claim that this book was made up by defendant May between the time the books were called for in May, 1886, and the time when they were produced in July. This we think to be a well-founded claim, based upon three grounds, viz.: At the head of several pages near the beginning of the book the year 1882 is written over the date 1883, a thing not likely to occur when a book is posted up with any regularity; some forty names of persons here and there appear with items charged or credited, and no amounts carried out, showing hasty work, and no posting to a ledger; and, lastly, the items in the ledger account of Leonard Thorp, which were presumably posted from this journal, on the debtor side, show them as transferred from pages 16, 27, 52, 57, and 59, whereas in the journal they appear on pages 11, 15, 36, 41, and 42, and on the credit side items from pages 6, 16, and 27 appear in the journal at pages 4, 11, and 19, showing almost to a demonstration that this journal has been shortened up, so that the business recorded in it does not occupy as many pages as the book from which the ledger was posted. But no great moment would be attached to these matters, since the journal in the main contains a correct transcript of the memorandum books, were it not that the item of $7,000, alleged by Snipes to have been given to May, September 20, 1882, has no other support than that it appears on that date in the memorandum book No. 9, and at the corresponding place in the journal. No writing whatever was taken by Snipes for this advance, and no time was stipulated for its return. The entry in the memorandum book was made in lead-pencil, as were all the other entries in it, but this one was clearly made over other previous entries which were partially rubbed out with an eraser. It is at the top of the page, and the same entry was made on the bottom line of the same page, and partly rubbed and partly scratched out. Had the defendants been examined upon the condition of these books, and of this item especially, as it appears in the books, and had they given no reasonable explanation of the matter, we should reject the item of $7,000 as fraudulent; but no question was asked them concerning it, and it will therefore stand. The way in which the defendants treated the matter of the books is one of the strongest proofs against them. From early in 1884 they knew that creditors were claiming their transaction of December 11, 1883, to have been fraudulent, and suits were pending against Mrs. May which were intended to be the basis of this suit. Snipes was a man of very large business affairs, with mills, stores, cattle, and other property scattered over a large area in Oregon and Washington. He was not a book-keeper himself, and had no knowledge of accounts; but he knew the importance of them, and had his agents in other branches of his business keep them; and it is beyond conception that in so questionable a transaction as this was on the face of it, he should entirely have neglected so important an element of defense by suffering honestly kept books of account to be lost when there was a very expensive safe among the very property turned over to him. This concludes the review of the main facts as disclosed by the evidence.

The law of the case is very simple. It is that, when such facts are shown to exist, they tend to prove a legal fraud upon creditors; and when many such facts exist together, each with its tendency to prove fraud, they compel the belief that a fraud was intended by the Mays, and was assisted in by Snipes. If it were otherwise, the defendants, though having the opportunity, wholly neglected to explain any of the many damaging circumstances appearing against them. Therefore the judgment of the lower court must be reversed. The judgment will be that the bill of sale and deed of December 11, 1883, be declared null and void as against the appellants' several judgments; that the property covered thereby, and still remaining in the hands of the defendants, or either of them, and not transferred to innocent third parties, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be sold, and the proceeds paid to the appellants, according to their said judgments; that if the said proceeds of sale shall not be sufficient to pay said judgments, then the said defendant Snipes is adjudged to be liable for the deficiency to the extent of $17,500, being the admitted value of personal property received by him, with interest thereon at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from December 11, 1883, and upon the ascertainment of the amount of said deficiency, if any, execution may issue against the property of said Snipes therefor. Costs to appellants.

BOUNDARIES—EVIDENCE—DEED—DESCRIPTION—COURSES—PRESUMPTION.

Plaintiff's deed described the land as "commencing at a point 60 rods west of the north-east corner of section 8, * * * running thence west * * *. The north line of the section did not run due west, as indicated by the true meridian. Held, that the presumption is that the line commenced at a point west of the north-east corner of section 8, according to the true meridian, but may be rebutted by extraneous testimony.

Ejectment by the Tacoma Building & Savings Association against Alexander Reed and Louise D. Reed, his wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Doolittle, Pritchard & Stevens and R. B. Lehman, for appellants. Garretson, Bracket & Rosling, for appellee.

DUNBAR, J. The description of the lands in the deed to plaintiff's grantor of that tract of land which is claimed to have been platted into Cavender's first addition is in the words and figures following, to-wit: "Situate, lying, and being in the county of Pierce, territory of Washington, and bounded and described as follows, to-wit: Commencing at a point 60 rods west of the north-east corner of section 8, in township 20 north, of range 3 east; running thence west 20 rods, south 8 rods; thence east 20 rods; thence north 8 rods,—containing one acre." The plaintiff proved a straight title to the premises in question from the United States patent down to and including the deed received by him from his grantor; but the north line of said section 8 did not run due west, as indicated by the true meridian, or, in other words, it did not run parallel with the meridian line, but diverged from the true west line to the north. So that the main question was as to the actual location on the face of the earth of the north line of the north-east quarter of section 8 as the same runs west from the north-east corner of said section, and whether the deed should be construed to mean west according to the true meridian, or west according to the government survey. On this question the court instructed the jury as follows: "Plaintiff also introduces in evidence a duly-certified copy of the several deeds and plats under which it claims title to said lots of land. I instruct you as a matter of law, therefore, that, according to the meaning of the language in those deeds, the north line of Cavender's first addition to Tacoma, W. T., in Pierce county, should be laid out on an east and west line starting from the north-east corner of section 8, in township 20 north, of range 3 east, and running thence west according to the United States survey; and that when those deeds upon which the plaintiff relies for its title mentioned as a beginning point sixty rods west of the north-east corner of said section 8, the construction in law is that such beginning point is on the north line of section 8 according to the United States survey thereof,"—which instruction defendant duly excepted to, and assigns as error herein. There were some subsequent instructions that might tend somewhat to modify the rule laid down by the court in the instruction quoted; but that the court substantially instructed the jury that the presumption was conclusive, that west in said deed meant west according to the government survey, and that that was plaintiff's theory of the case, is borne out by the oral argument of the attorneys for appellee, as well as by the statement in his brief that, "unless defendants' counsel can maintain their claim upon the main question of a right to controvert the government's surveys, the rulings and instructions are clearly right. If they can maintain that claim it would be a waste of time to discuss the rulings, as they assume the contrary." We think it is clear that under the description above set forth the government surveys may be contradicted, or, probably more properly stated, ignored. Of the many cases cited by counsel we have been unable to find any that will elucidate or throw any light on the very practical question involved in this case. We do not think that the mere reference to the north-east corner of section 8, as it is referred to in the deed, is sufficient to raise the presumption that the parties intended to be governed by the United States surveys, but that it was referred to simply as a known point, the same as any monument or specific permanent object might be referred to. If the language of the deed had been, "60 rods west of the north-east corner of section 8 on said section line," then the word "west" would have been construed in connection with the section line, and the presumption would have been that the conveyance was made with reference to the established government survey; but the language is quite different. If the words of a deed are ambiguous, or susceptible of two constructions, testimony will be allowed to prove the meaning of the deed, although this manner of ascertaining the intention of the parties must not be invoked when the description can be ascertained from the deed itself. Title to land must not rest upon the fallible memory of witnesses when it can be avoided. Appellee in this case argues with a considerable degree of plausibility that there is nothing doubtful in the language of this deed; that the word "west" means "west;" that it is in no sense ambiguous, and will not admit of any construction to explain its meaning. However, considering the importance of this decision to the public, and recognizing the probability that the city of Tacoma was uniformly platted and located according to one or the other of the theories urged here, and that structures and improvements amounting to many millions of dollars have been made throughout the city, which would probably be affected by this decision, its results reaching far beyond the parties to this action, we are of the opinion that public policy demands that the custom of surveyors, in locating town plats in the state of Washington, and especially in the city of Tacoma, may be submitted to the jury, to aid them in construing the intention of the parties to the deed. The jury should be instructed that, under the language of the deed in question, the presumption is that the north line of Cavender's first addition commences at a point 60 rods west, according to the true meridian, of the N. E. corner of section 8 in township 20 N., of range 3 E., and running thence west, according to the true meridian, etc.; but that such presumption may be rebutted by extraneous testimony. The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded to the court below, with instructions to proceed in accordance with this opinion, with leave to amend pleadings.

INSOLVENCY—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS—ATTACHMENT.

1. Code Wash. § 2022, requires the court, when ordering the meeting of creditors in insolvency proceedings, to stay all actions against the debtor, providing that such stay shall not prevent the appointment of a receiver to care for the debtor's property "for the benefit of all his creditors." Held that, after an assignment, appointment of receiver, and stay of proceedings the court has no authority to set the stay aside, and permit attachments to issue.

2. Section 2046 provides that, after the surrender of the debtor's property, it shall not be liable to execution, but shall "be fully vested" in the assignee, who may claim and recover it all "for the benefit of creditors." Held that, when once vested in the assignee, the debtor's property cannot be divested or affected by his failure to receive a discharge.

Andress*, 31 Ill. 322; Thurber v. Blanck, 50 N. Y. 80.

DUNBAR, J. This is a suit in equity in the nature of a creditors' bill, brought by the plaintiffs in error in their own behalf against the defendants to obtain relief by having various conveyances executed by the individual defendants F. D. Van Wagenen, C. E. Sackett, and William Page to their wives set aside, canceled, and decreed to be fraudulent and void as against creditors. To this bill certain of the defendants, among them, F. D. Van Wagenen and wife, C. E. Sackett and wife, and William Page and wife, demurred. It appears by the bill of complaint demurred to that the defendants F. D. Van Wagenen, C. E. Sackett, and William Page were copartners in trade under the firm name of the Buckley Lumber & Shingle Manufacturing Company, and as such copartners had become indebted by notes and accounts at different times to the plaintiffs, respectively, in different amounts. That said copartners owned property, both real and personal, as copartners, on the 22d day of January, 1890, at which time they executed and filed application to the superior court of Pierce county as "insolvent debtors" for a discharge from their debts, and made and delivered therewith an assignment of all their property; and an order staying all proceedings upon the part of their creditors was thereupon duly made by the court, and the usual order to show cause was made by the court and published, and a receiver to take charge of the property was duly appointed. Afterwards, upon application of the plaintiffs severally applying, said superior court set aside the stay of proceedings previously ordered, and allowed each of the plaintiffs to commence an action at law upon their several notes and accounts, and to issue attachments against the assigned property and such other property of said insolvents as might be found. That afterwards, and under color of said attachments, the sheriff of Pierce county attempted to levy the same upon certain premises or lands of the defendant Sarah Ann Page, described in the complaint, which was land acquired previous to the formation of said copartnership by the joint labors of said William Page and Sarah Ann Page, his wife, which was held by them as community property until the 28th day of September, 1889, when a portion thereof was transferred by him to her for a valuable consideration, and on the 18th day of January, 1890, the remainder thereof was likewise sold and deeded to his said wife, who was then the sole owner. That after filing notice of levy of aforesaid attachments upon said premises the plaintiffs, by leave of the court, upon separate motion filed the bill of complaint herein, to which defendants separately demurred. That said several individual actions at law in which said several attachments were issued have not been tried, and the plaintiffs have not obtained judgment in any of said actions, but have jointly filed the bill of complaint herein upon the same several alleged claims and indebtedness set forth for cause of action in each of said actions at law pending and upon which said attachments were issued.

The grounds of demurrer alleged were "that the court had no jurisdiction of the persons of defendants or the subject-matter of the action; that there was another action pending between the same parties for the same cause; that several causes of action were improperly united in said complaint; that the plaintiffs had no legal capacity to sue; that there was a defect of parties defendant; that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." Certain of the defendants also interposed motions to the complaint embracing substantially the same grounds of objection as set forth in the demurrer. There were two separate demurrers filed by counsel representing different defendants, but they raise substantially the same questions and will here be considered together. The demurrers were sustained by the court below, and an order made dismissing the bill of complaint. From this order plaintiffs have appealed to this court.

The constitutionality of the insolvent act is questioned in appellants' brief, but was practically abandoned in the oral argument of the case. No sufficient reason appears for pronouncing the law unconstitutional. It is contended by appellees that an attachment lien before judgment is not a sufficient basis for an action in the nature of a creditors' bill. On the other hand, while it is conceded by appellants that formerly it was the generally recognized rule that a creditors' bill to set aside fraudulent conveyances could not be obtained until after judgment, the issuing of execution, and the return of nulla bona, yet it is contended that the current of authorities is to the effect that a creditor having an attachment lien may maintain a creditors' bill, especially where it is shown that he has exhausted all legal remedies; and many authorities are cited in support of both contentions. Whatever may be the law as to the general proposition, there is one element in this case that is not reached by the cases cited by the appellants; that is the question whether or not, conceding that a creditors' bill can be maintained by virtue of an attachment lien, it can be maintained against a defendant who has surrendered his estate for the benefit of his creditors under an insolvency law similar to the insolvency law of the Code of Washington, and especially by virtue of an attachment issued in an action commenced after proceedings in insolvency have been instituted. Several cases have been cited from New Jersey, but there the statute by special provision makes the levying of the attachment a lien for the equal benefit of all the creditors who shall apply to the court or to the auditor for that purpose, and holds the property of the defendant bound for the satisfaction of all the applying creditors. The case of Kahn v. Salmon, 10 Sawy. 183, 20 Fed. Rep. 801, is an Oregon case, and the attachment was issued prior to the assignment. Also under the laws of Oregon an attachment can only issue upon due proof of the plaintiff's claim, (Code Civil Proc. § 143;) and the court in the case cited commented upon that provision as follows: "As between the parties to the action, the fact of the indebtedness is thereby established until the attachment is vacated or discharged." In this state no proof is required, and no presumption obtains that the claim of the attaching creditor is a valid one, but the writ issues by the clerk upon the filing of the affidavit and bond. It is admitted by the appellants that their only basis of action is their attachment lien, and they bring their action for the benefit of themselves and all other creditors who will join them in the action and share the expenses of the suit. Under this theory of the case, if the creditors not having attachment liens were to join them, there would certainly be a misjoinder of parties plaintiff, for those not having the attachment liens would have no legal capacity to sue in this action. On the other hand, if the creditors not having liens cannot come in, the result would be that the action of the court in allowing appellants' attachment proceedings would result in a discrimination against all other creditors, and that, when the assets were marshaled according to the prayer of the petitioner, the division could only be made between the creditors who were parties to the writ; and this is a result, the obtaining of which the appellants, in their argument, disclaim. And this brings us to the investigation of a proposition lying at the very threshold of the case, viz., the action of the court in allowing appellants' attachment proceedings after the institution of the proceedings in insolvency. Section 2022 of the insolvency act, under which these proceedings were had, provides that "when issuing the order for the meeting of the creditors the judge shall order that all proceedings against the debtor be stayed." This provision seems to be plain, imperative, and susceptible of no two constructions; and the only proviso is one necessary to make the act operative, viz., that the said stay of proceedings shall not prevent the judge who shall have granted it from appointing a receiver to take possession of all property of the debtor for the benefit of all his creditors, if one or more of his creditors shall apply, etc. Some force must be given to this mandatory provision of the statute, and the force to be given is the force expressed, viz., to stay the proceedings. The evident reason for this mandatory provision is to prevent a multiplicity of actions, and the squandering of the estate in costs until the question of the debtor's discharge is settled by the court; and there is no provision in any subsequent section of the act authorizing the court to set aside the stay commanded by section 2022, or to allow any other proceedings to be commenced; and, in the absence of such authority, the action of the court was illegal, and the attachment proceedings were void. Whatever may be the potency and effect of an attachment levied prior to the cession of the estate, we cannot understand upon what theory a court will allow an attachment to issue against property which is already under the control of the court. It is placed there by virtue of the insolvency proceedings for the benefit of all the creditors. Certainly, when property is placed in custody so high as this, it will not be subject to a scramble of the creditors to obtain liens upon it to the exclusion of the rights of other creditors. The usefulness of the court, by such a practice as this, would be entirely destroyed. With one hand it would attempt to destroy the very thing which the other hand was protecting. By such a practice, not only would the mandatory provision of section 2022 become a dead letter, but the whole object of the law would be thwarted. Courts are authorized to take charge of insolvent estates for the benefit of all the creditors, and not to create preferred creditors on ex parte applications or otherwise. The statute of insolvency, though possibly awkward in its expressions, is full and complete in itself; and it is evidently contemplated that all the questions relating to the fraud of the debtor should be tried in the insolvency proceedings.

Section 2033 provides that, in case after the appointment of said assignee any one of the creditors of the insolvent debtor should deem it necessary to oppose it on the ground of some fraud having been committed by the said insolvent debtor, or of the appointment not having been legally made, he shall, within 10 days next following the appointment of said assignee, lay before the court or judge which has already taken cognizance of the case his written opposition, stating especially the several facts of nullity of the said appointment or of fraud by him alleged against the insolvent debtor; whereupon, in case of accusation of fraud after having received said insolvent debtor's answer, the court or judge shall order a jury of not less than six men to be summoned in the same manner as jurors are summoned in the district court, for the purpose of deciding on the said accusation. Sec. 2034 provides for the proof of the notice. Sec. 2035 provides that, where the accusation is fraud, the creditor shall have a chance to interrogate the insolvent debtor on his oath concerning the state of affairs, and the several transactions in which he may have been engaged anterior to his failure, as he shall think proper, and the insolvent shall answer such interrogations, etc. Section 2036 provides that "if the jury declare in their verdict that said insolvent shall be guilty of fraud, the said debtor shall forever be deprived of the benefit of the laws passed for the relief of insolvent debtors in this territory." Thus it will be seen that the act itself points out specifically the manner in which the question offered is to be determined by the court. It is true that in the case of Thomas v. Hilton, (Wash. T.) 17 Pac. Rep. 882, it was held by a divided court that the provision for a jury of less number than 12 was unconstitutional, but the same court gave effect to the finding of the judge on the testimony under the succeeding sections. The insolvency law is very different from a common-law assignment, and authorities cited to prove that the common-law assignments could be attacked collaterally by suits in equity are not in point. There was no other remedy. If the assignment was thought to be fraudulent, the proceedings were not in court, and there were no provisions made for the investigation of the question of fraud; but the insolvency law here was made for the benefit of both debtor and creditor. Nor do we think, as alleged by appellants, that they are unavailing to the creditors to obtain satisfaction of their claims. It is their object to protect as well the rights of the creditors as the debtor, and every investigation can be made, and every inquiry put on foot, in the proceeding that could be in a collateral suit. The assignee is the agent of the creditors. He is elected by them, is presumably in sympathy with them, and is their representative. They need not rest content with the property turned over by the debtor if they think he has not made a full return, but the assignee has power to bring all actions which may be necessary to be brought to protect the rights either of the insolvent or the creditors. See section 2027.

The last contention of the appellants is that the insolvency law furnishes no remedy for the creditors, because, if the insolvency proceeding fail and the debtor is not discharged the estate cannot be distributed among the creditors. On this proposition is cited section 2041 of the Code of Washington, and Sanborn v. His Creditors, 37 Cal. 609. We do not see in what way the section of the Code referred to confirms this position. It simply provides that, if the debtor is convicted of a certain character of fraud, he shall be debarred of the benefit of this chapter. That simply means that he shall not obtain his discharge. It cannot mean that he cannot apply for the benefits of this chapter, for he has already applied. There is no provision or implication, however, that his estate shall be returned to him. If the California statute is the same as ours, we cannot indorse the conclusion arrived at by the court in the case cited.

Section 2046 of the Code of Washington reads as follows: "From and after the surrender of the property of the insolvent debtor all property of such insolvent shall be fully vested in his assignee or assignees for the benefit of his creditors, and shall not be liable to be seized, attached, taken, or levied on by virtue of any execution issued against the property of said insolvent; and the assignees who may be appointed shall take possession of and be entitled to claim and recover all the said property." Language could not well be made stronger than this. When property once becomes fully vested for the benefit of the creditors, that vested right in it cannot be destroyed or affected by the subsequent determination of the question of the debtor's discharge. There is no reason why it should be. He owes these debts. His exempt property has already been set aside by the court. He is in no worse position than he was before the proceedings commenced, for this identical property would then have been liable to an execution of his creditors. The first thing he must do under this law is to make the assignment for the benefit of his creditors. When that is done the property is fully vested in them. The question of "discharge" is for subsequent consideration. If the debtor fails to receive it, it is presumed to be on account of his fraudulent acts, and cannot affect the property which he has seen fit to surrender. Any other construction of the law would result in placing a premium on fraud, and would work a hardship on creditors who, by reason of such surrender, had been put to the trouble and expense of appearing in the proceedings. With this view of the proposition discussed, it is not necessary to discuss the other propositions argued by counsel. The judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs to appellees.

ANDERS, C. J., and HOYT and SCOTT, JJ., concur.

STILES, J., (concurring.) I concur in the decision, and desire to say further that the bill in this case clearly set forth that the property sought to be affected by it was purchased by the partners with money fraudulently diverted by them from the partnership funds. If that is the fact, it is still, in equity, partnership property, although the legal title may have been taken in the name of the partners' wives; and, although it was not included in the partnership schedules, the assignee can sue for and recover it for the benefit of all creditors. If the assignee, upon being put in possession of the facts, neglects or refuses to proceed, he can be compelled to proceed by the court upon the motion of any creditor. The question of discharge cannot affect the case in any way. It is very difficult to see how there can be a discharge in a case of partnership insolvency where the partners do not schedule their individual property and liabilities.

TURNER et al. v. IOWA NAT. BANK.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — PREFERENCE OF CREDITORS.

In Washington, a debtor, though in failing circumstances, may in good faith mortgage all of his property to secure one or more of his creditors, leaving other debts unsatisfied.

Appeal from superior court, Kittitas county; GRAVES, Judge.

L. A. Vincent, for appellants. Pruyn & Ready, for appellees.

SCOTT, J. Lloyd & Co. were engaged in the mercantile business, and, being considerably indebted to various parties, they executed mortgages to certain of their creditors, to secure the amounts they were owing them respectively. The Iowa National Bank, having been so secured, began an action to foreclose the mortgage. Appellants Turner & Jay, being judgment creditors, and not secured, sought to intervene in said suit. Their petition in intervention alleges that Lloyd & Co. were indebted largely in excess of their ability to pay; that the mortgages aforesaid covered all of their property, and were all executed on the same day; and that the execution of such mortgages, under the circumstances, was in effect an assignment of their property for the benefit of the parties to whom the mortgages were made, and that it was fraudulent as to appellants. Appellants asked that the mortgage be adjudged void as to them, and the property held subject to execution for the satisfaction of their judgment. An execution had been issued thereon and returned nulla bona prior to said intervention. The plaintiffs demurred to the petition on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer. There is no law in this state to prevent a debtor, even though he be in failing circumstances, from paying or securing a portion of his creditors, so long as he does so in good faith, although he should dispose of his entire property in that way, and leave other debts unsatisfied. It is not disputed that this mortgage, and also the others, were given for the purpose of securing bona fide debts. There is no reason in justice or equity why this particular mortgage should be held void, and the mortgagee deprived of its security, in order that the property may be made available to satisfy the claim of these intervening creditors. The judgment is affirmed.

COLUMBIA NAT. BANK OF DAYTON v. EMBREE.

COMMUNITY PROPERTY—LIABILITY FOR SEPARATE DEBTS.

Code Wash. 1881, § 2411, giving each spouse, without restriction, the power to devise one-half of the community property, and section 2405, providing that neither spouse shall be liable for the separate debts of the other, do not withdraw the community property of a deceased spouse from liability for his or her separate debts. The sections requiring the personal representative to take possession of the deceased's "estate," and pay the debts of the "estate," apply to community as well as separate property and debts.

Appeal from superior court, Columbia county.

Edmiston & Miller, for appellant. M. M. Godman and C. G. Cosgrove, for appellee.

SCOTT, J. The facts agreed upon are, in substance, that one William McGee died testate, his wife surviving him; that said parties owned community property in Columbia county at the time of his decease; that one Embree was appointed executor of his will; that said McGee owed the Columbia National Bank $140, being a suretyship debt; that he left a small amount of separate estate, but not sufficient to pay the claim; that the community debts were paid by the executor, and a surplus of money was left in his hands arising from a sale of the community property; that the claim was duly presented and allowed, the separate property of deceased exhausted, and a balance of said debt remained unsatisfied. The court decreed that said indebtedness was a separate debt of the deceased, and that it was not a charge upon the community estate, or upon the decedent's interest therein. It is not contended that this particular debt is not a separate debt of the deceased, and the sole question presented to us is whether the unpaid balance should be paid out of the decedent's interest in the community property, or whether said property should go to his devisees relieved from liability therefrom. It is not claimed that his said interest in the community property is exempted from the payment of this debt, on any other ground than that it is a separate debt, for which it is urged that no part of the community property is liable in any event. Under our law (Code 1881, § 2411) the power to devise one-half of the community property exists in each spouse without restriction. The persons interested in the community may be entirely excluded, and the property given at will to a stranger. Certainly the separate debts of the deceased should be paid therefrom when the community debts are paid, and there is not separate property to pay them, unless such payment is prohibited by the statute. Considering all the statutes thereon, we do not think there is any such prohibition, although the section cited only expressly makes such devise subject to community debts. It is true, as contended, that it was useless in such a case to mention this class,—as the liability therefor would have existed without it,—unless there was an intention to exclude all others; but it seems rather to have come from inadvertence or an excess of caution,—the liability for separate debts is not expressly excluded. Section 2405 provides that either spouse shall not be liable for the separate debts of the other. This only protects the separate property of the spouse not having contracted them, and his or her half of the community property, and by implication would leave the other half of the community property liable therefor. These laws were evidently passed at the same time, and it might be said with equal force that, in so far as separate debts contracted after marriage are concerned, in the light of our other statutes relating thereto, there was no reason for this particular statute if section 2411 (and 2412, where party dies intestate) prohibits the payment of separate debts from the community property, for the separate property of the other spouse, or such spouse's interest in the community property would not have been liable therefor without section 2405. While the law relating to our probate practice is somewhat confused, yet it is apparent—as no other way is provided—that upon the death of a person his separate estate and his interest in the community property is administered upon in the same proceeding, even though there may be no express provision therefor, and although his interest in partnership property is particularly mentioned. See section 1435 and following sections. This would clearly be so in the execution of a will, and it must necessarily be the case where a person dies intestate. Section 1419 provides that when, by reason of a suit concerning the proof of a will or from any other cause, there shall be a delay in granting letters testamentary or of administration, a special administrator shall be appointed to collect and preserve the effects of the deceased. Section 1444 gives every executor or administrator a right to the immediate possession of all the real as well as personal estate of the deceased, and section 1445 requires him to make a true inventory thereof. By section 1465 the executor or administrator is required to publish a notice to the creditors of the deceased requiring all persons having claims against the deceased to present them, etc. Section 1479 prohibits the issuance of an execution upon any judgment rendered against the testator or intestate. Section 1528 requires the executor or administrator to take into his possession all the estate of the deceased, and section 1562 requires the debts of the estate to be paid in the order there specified; the fifth classification relates to judgments against the deceased. The word "estate" must be held to relate to the separate property of the deceased, and as well to his interest in the community property, and the debts referred to include separate debts as well as those against the community. There are other provisions of the same general purport, to which it is unnecessary to further allude. It is urged that these statutes were passed before the law relating to community property was adopted here, and that consequently they can have no bearing. But considering the fact that no other provision has been made for administering upon the estate, separate or community, and of the practice that has obtained, it must be held that it was understood, when the community laws relating to husband wife were passed, that they were enacted in view of the probate law as it then existed, and that it was sufficient for a general and complete administration, even if there was no other answer. His separate estate not otherwise exempt would be liable for the community debts, at any rate after the separate debts were paid and the community property exhausted. The only reason for exempting community property from the separate debts of either spouse is for the benefit of the community, and when this is dissolved the reason no longer exists. We do not decide that the interest in the community property of a contracting spouse may not be reached during the lifetime of the community for a separate debt, although such exemption may necessarily follow. But when the community is dissolved by death, or in any other way, the interest in the property thereof of the party owing a separate debt, which interest is not required to pay the community debts, and not otherwise exempt, is held liable for such separate debt when the separate property is exhausted. Reversed and remanded.

EDWARDS v. STATE.

MURDER — CHANGE OF VENUE — ACCOMPLICE — STATE'S EVIDENCE — CORROBORATION.

1. Under Code Wash. § 1073, which leaves a change of venue in criminal cases in the discretion of the trial court, the denial of such a motion, although supported by numerous affidavits, showing the circulation of some intemperate newspaper articles, and considerable hostility in the community, will not be reviewed, where only 26 jurors were examined, and there was no complaint of misconduct.

2. Section 1092, providing that the court, in a "prosecution" against several, may direct any defendant to be discharged that he may be a witness for the state, allows one indicted with the prisoner, but not on trial with him, to be a witness, while still under indictment.

3. On a trial for murder, the principal witness was an accomplice, who had told a number of conflicting stories, sometimes taking the murder entirely upon himself, and at other times charging it upon others. He admitted numerous falsehoods, and testified that defendant committed the murder, and that he himself had no previous knowledge that murder was intended. The only corroborating evidence was that defendant, when intoxicated, had mentioned "that poor woman," and had called her name, and said that he "might kill a man, but couldn't kill a woman," with other kindred expressions. Held, that a conviction could not be sustained.

Scott, J., dissenting.

Caples, Hurley, Allen & F. D. Winton, and Kanaga, Holcomb & Elwood, for appellant. C. W. Fulton, George J. Moody, Pros. Atty., and A. G. Hardesty, for the State.

STILES, J. The appellant was indicted jointly with John B. Rose, George F. Rose, and James E. Gibbons for the murder of Sina Frederickson, near South Bend, in Pacific county, on Thursday, January 30, 1890, and was tried separately. Before the trial a motion to change the place of trial to another county, on the ground of prejudice on the part of the community against the accused, supported by numerous affidavits, showing the circulation of some intemperate newspaper articles among the people of the county, and considerable hostile feeling in the neighborhood of where the alleged crime was committed, was made and denied. But, inasmuch as the statute (Code, § 1073) seems to vest the matter of a change of venue in a criminal case entirely in the discretion of the trial court, we should not feel warranted in reversing a conviction, unless the discretion had been most clearly abused. Here, however, but 26 jurors were examined, and there is no complaint of any misconduct on the part of the jury selected. It seems to be probable that, while it was true that the persons qualified to act as jurors who lived in the vicinity of South Bend would have been very few by reason of the excitement they were under, still there was a large portion of the county, from which the jury was actually drawn, where the excitement did not exist.

The prosecution in this case relied entirely upon the testimony of George Rose. Without his statement there were some circumstances which might have pointed to the accused as the person, or one of the persons, who had committed the homicide; but, under the theory of the state upon the trial, these circumstances were entirely laid aside, and became of no value. George Rose was the first witness called for the prosecution, and the defense at once objected to his being allowed to testify, on the ground that, being jointly indicted with the prisoner on trial, he could not be a witness until he had been discharged. The court overruled the objection, and permitted him to testify, which appellant urges as error. But under the liberal system we have, which permits almost every person to testify in any cause, whether civil or criminal, we think it was not error to allow one indicted with the prisoner, but not put upon trial with him, to be used as a witness. The language of section 1092 of the Code is: "When two or more persons are included in one prosecution, the court may, at any time before the defendant has gone into his defense, direct any defendant to be discharged, that he may be a witness for the state;" and it will thus be seen that we interpret the word "prosecution" to mean "trial." It can work no substantial injury to the accused whether the witness has been discharged or not. While still under indictment, the witness cannot be used as such, unless by his consent; and by his willingness, and his voluntary act of testifying, which he should never be allowed to do unless it is clearly necessary for the case.

of the state, he earns the equitable right to a discharge, which will always follow where he has been straightforward and honest with the court; whereas, on the other hand, if he has been discharged, and then in his testimony plays false with the court, the order of discharge will be set aside, and he will be put upon trial, even on his own confession. Therefore the temptation to press hard upon the accused in giving his testimony is equal in either case, and his credibility, not his competency, must be the point of attack.

The deceased, Sina Frederickson, was undoubtedly the victim of a most brutal murder, somewhere near the time alleged, (January 30, 1890,) and it is almost equally certain that at nearly the same time, and by the same hand or hands, her husband, Jens Frederickson, met a like violent death. Both were probably instantly killed,—she by a rifle bullet, he by a load of small shot and percussion caps, both being shot through the head. Their bodies were found about a mile apart,—hers being buried under the refuse of a hog-pen upon the premises of John B. Rose, near the shore of Shoalwater bay, about four miles below South Bend, and on the opposite side of Willapa river; and his being laid in a trail made by cattle, close to some large logs, further to the west, and within a few rods of high-water mark on the bay. The grave in which Mrs. Frederickson was buried had been excavated to a depth of two or three feet; but her husband lay in the hollow made by the cattle in jumping over the logs where the ground was swampy, and was covered by very little earth and some coarse sods, just enough to hide him. His body was discovered accidentally by searchers, while hers was pointed out by George Rose, when all the efforts of the searchers to find it had failed. These two unfortunate young people, only a month before their death, had taken up their residence upon certain government land adjoining the land of John B. Rose, and were living in a boat-house floated up on some logs at high-water mark. The land had been previously several times occupied by different claimants, who had abandoned it, and Frederickson intended to prosecute a contest in the land-office to clear the record or former filings. The Rose place consisted of something over a hundred acres, and had upon it a farm-house and outbuildings, an orchard, etc. It had been settled for many years, and was used by Rose as a place to keep cattle and poultry, and for the raising of supplies for his hotel in South Bend, where he lived. No other person lived in the vicinity of this land, and the country around was wild, rough, and uncultivated. The only means of travel upon it seems to have been the waters of the bay and river. Edwards, the appellant, was a young man, employed by Rose to attend to the cattle and other property at the ranch, and lived there alone; but it had been for some time arranged that he should quit his employment, and a man named Prickett, with a family, had been engaged by Rose to take his place. Edwards left this ranch on Sunday, February 2d, and in all probability, had it not been for the revelations of George Rose, he would have been more than suspected of this double crime, although the body of the woman might never have been found. But, as will appear in the aspect in which the case was presented at the trial, this presence of Edwards so close to the scene of the crime, and so near the time when the Fredericksons were missed, cut no figure at all as a circumstance tending to prove his guilt.

George Rose was the first witness for the state, and the only witness, excepting those who were called to corroborate him by showing the language and actions of Edwards after he was suspected of participation in the crime. After stating that he was 18 years old, and that he knew the Fredericksons, he was asked to tell the story of the killing of the Fredericksons in his own way, which he did in these words: "Well, on the 29th day of January father came to me in the evening, and says to me he wanted me to go down to the place the next day with him to look after some cattle. And Ed. Gibbons stood about ten or twelve feet from him, and he said he would like to go down with us. So the next morning we went down about half past six o'clock in the morning,—left South Bend. And all three went down to the place, and when we got down there we saw Edwards was there; and we went in the house, and father and Gibbons and Edwards was standing there talking awhile in front of the house, by the gate. Father says to Edwards: 'You better go up and get Frederickson to help bring the cattle down;' so father and Edwards went off after Frederickson, to bring the cattle down, and brought him down, and went down after the cattle. And we walked along the bluff, and there was a hawk set up on a tree, and Gibbons says to me, 'Give me your gun, and I will see if I can kill that hawk;' and I let him have the gun, and after he shot the hawk he kept the gun, thinking he might see some geese to shoot at; and we walked down until we got down by the cow trail, and Gibbons walked ahead, father next, and I was behind father, and Frederickson behind. And I heard Gibbons say to Frederickson, 'Look here, Frederickson,' and just then he shot; and I turned around and said, 'That's a pretty way to use a man after calling him to help drive the cattle up;' and Gibbons says, 'That's the kind of cattle we came down after.' I told him if I had known that I would not have come down with them. So after Gibbons shot Frederickson, Edwards walked into the brush, and got a spade out, and began to look around for a place to bury him; and it was in the cow trail; and father says, 'That's good enough place right here;' and Edwards went to work and dug the grave, and I went off ten or fifteen feet from where they was, and sat down on a log, and never looked up at them until after they had the grave ready, and called me to help lay him in the grave. They had his gum boots pulled off and gum coat, and laid them down where he was dropped; and I helped put him in the grave, and threw over what loose dirt there was, and then they pulled some grass sod up, and put it on top of him; and after that father picked up his gum coat and boots, and threwed them down in the slough, as we walked along about a hundred yards from where he was buried; and we walked up to the house, and as we got along the beach father said, 'Better hurry up and get Mrs. Frederickson down; she may suspect something,—go away; so they went up and got Mrs. Frederickson, and when we were going by the house Edwards said to me, 'Give me your shotgun.' I told him I would not let him have it, and father commenced cursing and swearing at me because I would not let him have it; and Edwards said, 'I will go and get the rifle; don't make any fuss about it;' and they was gone up after Mrs. Frederickson about twenty minutes; and I heard some one scream, and I went out and looked, and saw her coming along the fence; father had hold of one arm, and Edwards had hold of the other; dragging her through the mud-hole; and after they got through the mud-hole Edwards walked ahead, and father walked behind, and just as they got inside the gate Edwards picked up the rifle and walked up about ten feet from the gate, and Mrs. Frederickson got inside, and asked what they had done with her husband. Edwards says, 'We shot him;' and she says, 'Then kill me; I don't want to live any longer;' and Edwards raised the rifle and shot her, and they buried her right there behind the pig-pen, and Edwards dug the grave; and after the grave was dug father called me to help put her in the grave; and I came up to help put her in the grave; and we covered her up, and threw some sods on top of her, so they would not see the loose dirt; and father and Edwards came back to Frederickson's house, and locked the door; and when they came down Edwards carried the shotgun, and Gibbons carried the revolver; and father called me out to the front of the house by the gate, and he had $50, and gave it to me, and he said if he ever found out that I told this on him I would be dead first; and, furthermore, if I went down to the place next week, and it came up stormy, and anybody asked what became of Frederickson, to say that I saw them go out the day of the storm; and before we left that evening Gibbons gave me the revolver. I told him that I did not want it, but he gave it to me, and I kept it until the next— We, father, Gibbons, and I, left the place about five o'clock that afternoon, and got up to South Bend about half past seven, and had supper by ourselves, my sister Frances preparing it. Edwards stayed at the house. He was to take the boat (Frederickson's) and put it out and sink it that night in the river; swamp it." Asked what any of them stated as the reason for killing these people, he said, "Well, father wanted to get that 160 acres of land there, is the reason he killed them;" and that, in December previous, Edwards had cleared a spot on the Frederickson land to build a house on, and told Rose he would take the place for him.

We have given this statement in full, in the words of the witness, for the reason that, taken with the other facts in the case, it is one of the most remarkable cases in the history of criminal law. Here is a boy of 18, who accuses his father, a man past 70 years of age, of planning and executing this horrible crime, and of carrying his son into it, as a witness of a double murder, for the pitiful motive of clearing the way to the possible acquisition of a parcel of almost worthless land, at the same time that neither the father, Edwards, or Gibbons provides himself with any weapon whatever when going on their expedition of murder, but depends entirely upon the chance shotgun in the hands of the boy. George, on cross-examination, admitted having had in his possession a pistol belonging to Frederickson; that it had had a leather handle; that he had cut the leather off, and also Frederickson's initials from the wood beneath the leather; that he kept it under his bed, where his mother found it; and that, in response to his father's question where he got it, he had answered that he bought it of a man at South Bend. He also stated that he had been to the ranch with one Conley on Saturday, February 1st, to assist Edwards in killing a beef; and that on Saturday afternoon, having got "pretty full of liquor," he went down to the ranch in his boat to take Edwards' place until Prickett should arrive, and remained there alone Sunday and Monday. It further appeared that George, shortly after his return from the ranch on Monday, had mentioned in the hearing of various people that he had seen the Fredericksons go out on the bay in their boat, and disappear in a sudden squall. This set the people of South Bend to searching for the bodies, with the result of finding Frederickson in the latter part of February. Suspicion was immediately directed towards George Rose, and he was arrested, and charged with the crime of murder. Then began, on his part, a series of statements and confessions, which continued until March 31st, each being different from all the others. At various times he admitted having done both the murders himself on Sunday, February 2d, his excuse being that he had been very drunk, and the circumstances that he had procured Frederickson to go out with him to relieve some cattle that were mired, when, being behind him, he had said, "Look here, Frederickson," and when the latter turned around he had shot him down; that he had gone to the Frederickson house, and told Mrs. Frederickson that her husband had hurt himself, so that he could not get away from the Rose house, whereupon she accompanied him to the ranch, and was there shot by him with a rifle left in the house for killing cattle; and that he had returned to the Frederickson house, got the pistol and some money there on a shelf, and locked the house, after which he buried the bodies. Again, he charged Edwards with the whole crime, alleging that he had found it out by seeing the fresh earth near the hog-pen, and digging down until he came to the body of Mrs. Frederickson; and that, when Edwards became aware that he knew it, the former charged him to tell the drowning story. Still again, he said that some otherwise unknown person named Andrew Johnson persuaded him to help kill the Fredericksons, and that they did it at Frederickson's house, carrying the body away the next day, February 3d. On the 29th of March the Edwards statement was reduced to writing, and signed by George Rose, and witnessed by the sheriff and his deputy. On the 30th of March the Johnson statement was likewise signed and witnessed; and on the same day, but later, he made another written statement, in the main corresponding to his testimony in chief at the trial, which was witnessed by the attorneys for the prosecution, the sheriff, and another. On the 31st of March he again took the crime upon himself, in conversation with appellant's counsel, saying that he had implicated the others because the officers would not listen to him when he said he did it alone, but insisted that he had others with him in the murder. At the preliminary examination, on April 8d, he confirmed his last written statement, and seems to have rested with that until about one week before the trial, when, the sheriff having for some reason taken him upon the Rose ranch, he, in the presence of the sheriff and his deputy, reiterated the story that he had himself killed the Fredericksons, and illustrated how it was done. To the making of all these statements the witness excused himself by claiming that, in the first place, his attorney (who was not the attorney of any of the other defendants) had told him that, if he told different stories, the state would not be able to catch him on any of them, and thus he would get off; secondly, that the defendant's counsel had told him, after he had made his written statements, that if he would take all the trouble upon himself, that would clear the others, and then they would turn about and help him to get off.

The prosecution maintained that the second written statement of March 30th was a true one, and, for the purpose of showing wherein it differs from George Rose's testimony, we shall here include a part of it, as follows: "My name is George Rose. My age is 19 years. My father's name is John B. Rose. My father wanted this 160 acres of land that Jens Frederickson took. He wanted Edwards or Gibbons to take it, and pay out on it, and then deed it to my father. They, Gibbons (who is one of the meanest men ever came into the country) and Edwards and my father all made it up as to how they would kill Frederickson and his wife. After Edwards made up his mind to take the place for father, he cut down some trees on the place, but father found out after Frederickson had built a shake shanty on the claim that Frederickson had commenced a contest to get the land. On Wednesday or Thursday of the last week in January, father, Gibbons, and I took a dingee, and crossed the bay to father's ranch, where we found John Edwards. We had it all made up as to how we were to do the killing."

Now, in his testimony George repudiates all knowledge on his part of the purpose of the party up to the instant when Frederickson was shot, whereas in the statement he shows full participation in the scheme before they left South Bend; the bearing of which is that under the statement he was not only an accessory before the fact, but an active particeps criminis, whereas, according to his testimony, he was the innocent victim of association, who protested to the extent of refusing his gun at the assassination of the woman, and afterwards merely endeavored to shield his father, which he had a right to do, under the statute. His testimony was therefore, in the presence of his statement, all the more carefully to be scrutinized, as, if believed as he gave it, it exonerated himself from all responsibility for these two crimes, at the expense of his father and the other two men.

On Sunday, February 2d, Edwards went, by way of Astoria, to Portland, where he remained a few days, and then returned to South Bend and the vicinity of Shoal Water bay. Suspicion had been roused against him in connection with the Fredericksons, and he became aware of it. But he did not go away, and on the 17th of March he was at Willapa City, a small village. He was drinking, and there were several men in and about the saloons that he visited, who sought to get him to commit himself in some way by trying to lead him to talk of the Fredericksons, and by listening to his maudlin talk as he sat dosing in drunken stupor over a stove. He evidently knew when awake what they were driving at, and sought to avoid them. But out of it all he seems to have said to one person, "I'm in trouble; I'm watched, and I want to get out of this country;" and when told he mustn't mind such things, he answered, "You would if you were in my place." Another questioned him about the Frederickson land, whereupon Edwards said: "I suppose you have heard about those people being drowned there? Yes; they were drowned, because I was there two days after they were drowned. Oh, that poor woman!" the last expression, as he leaned sorrowfully towards the witness. A third heard him say, as he sat nodding by the stove, "I might kill a man, but I couldn't kill a woman." The same witness described him as staggering drunk. A fourth witness heard him say: "That's all right, Frederickson; that's all right." In the hearing of a fifth he said: "Why, damn it, I didn't kill the woman; I couldn't do such a thing." All this was occurring from 3 o'clock in the afternoon until 3 o'clock the next morning; but nothing more definite than this came out of it. At another time a witness testified he had been talking to Gibbons and John B. Rose in the jail, and both were protesting their innocence; "and the defendant [Edwards] there was sitting with his back toward me. He didn't look at me, but says he: 'I am innocent of this murder, but I would like to tell who the guilty parties are.'" The witness interpreted this as an expression of a desire on the prisoner's part to make some statement, and so told the sheriff, who at once saw Edwards, and asked him if he wished to say anything. He said he did not, and denied having used the expression attributed to him. Although George Rose did not testify to anything of the sort, the court allowed the prosecution to show that, within a few rods of where Fredrickson's body was found, some time in March, persons had noticed a rectangular hole at the shore end of a little slough. It was about the size of an ordinary grave, and the tide flowed in and out of it from the slough. Its sides looked as though they had been dug with a spade. But George Rose did say that Edwards had got a spade out of the brush near there, within a few minutes after Fredrickson was shot. Therefore the argument was that this hole was a corroboration of the spade part of George's testimony, as well as that this was really a grave dug for the reception of a corpse by Edwards. The same witness, moreover, stated that John Rose, when spoken to about the hole, said that a cow mired there, and had been dug out.

We have now stated the substance of all the prosecution's testimony in the case, and it would seem that it was all that it was possible to produce, as extraordinary efforts were made by the authorities and citizens to secure the conviction of the parties guilty of the Fredrickson murders. During a part at least of the five months from the time of his arrest to the trial of Edwards, George Rose was the willing assistant of the prosecution, able, certainly, and presumably ready, to point out every circumstance which would tend to corroborate his statement. Able counsel were employed to assist the state's prosecutor, both in developing testimony and in trying the case. But to our minds the case went to the jury upon the testimony of George Rose absolutely uncorroborated in any particular whatever; for the drunken whinnings of Edwards in the Willapa saloons, even though they contained within them anything more damaging than the maudlin protests of one believing himself surrounded by suspicious enemies, were not corroboration of anything testified to by George Rose, nor did they show any admission or knowledge of any fact connected with the crime charged. The court below apparently thought differently, for a motion to direct an acquittal at the close of the state's case, on the ground that there was no corroboration of George Rose, was denied, although the court in its charge to the jury ruled strongly that, to convict one charged with crime upon the testimony of an accomplice, the accomplice must be corroborated in some material matter tending to show the accused to have been implicated in the commission of the crime. Still, it may be that the court meant to leave it to the jury to say whether George Rose was or was not an accomplice at all; as, if full credit were given to his statement, we have shown that he was guilty only of concealing a crime of which he was a witness, but in which he did not participate. This state of things must appear remarkable to any one looking at this case dispassionately. John B. Rose was a man 70 years old, who had resided in and near South Bend many years. He kept a hotel at which some 40 people were regular boarders, and was well known to everybody about there. Edwards we have somewhat described. Gibbons was a young man who had, within three weeks only, come to the neighborhood a stranger, boarded at the Rose house, and was engaged with several others in slashing timber near the town. Yet not a single witness was called by the state to show that these men had been seen talking together at any time, or leaving in a boat upon the river, or returning from the river, or taking a supper alone, or in any way consorting together as men having some common purpose of so serious a character as murder in view; something of which, if there had been anything as described by George Rose, must have been developed in the excitement which followed upon the discovery of the foul murder of these two young people.

Upon this appeal the state seems to concede that George Rose was an accomplice; but it maintains that, in the first place, there was some corroboration; and that, secondly, no corroboration was necessary in law, but that the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice in this state goes to the jury like the testimony of any other witness, and that the court is bound by the verdict equally as though the witness were in no way complicated with the body of the crime. We have shown how we regard the matters which are claimed to be corroboration; that they are wholly immaterial. As to the other point, it is true that we have no statute requiring the corroboration of an accomplice, such as is found in a few of the states. It is also true that at common law conviction upon the unsupported testimony of an accomplice was upheld, to the extent, at least, that, although the higher courts and law-writers laid it down that a trial court ought to advise the jury not to convict on such testimony, it was not reversible error, even if they did not so advise. Yet the books are full of cases from courts not bound by any statute, both in England and America, where corroboration has been held necessary. 1 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, tit. "Accessory," § 18, p. 74. Cases are rare, indeed, where, if the prosecutor has the assistance of a willing accomplice, no corroborative testimony can be produced. In practice it is almost invariably attempted, and juries are told, as in this case, that unless there is corroboration they should acquit. Perhaps the true view of the matter is that in many, if not the most, cases, the evidence of an accomplice, uncorroborated in material matters, will not satisfy the honest judgment beyond a reasonable doubt, and that it is clearly insufficient to authorize a verdict of guilty. But there may occur other cases where, from all the circumstances, the honest judgment will be as thoroughly satisfied from the evidence of the accomplice of the guilt of the defendant as it is possible it could be satisfied from human testimony; and in such cases justice demands that the evidence be accepted, so far as the court is concerned. Collins v. People, 98 Ill. 584. The testimony of George Rose was not of the latter class, and the court below did right to charge the jury not to convict without corroboration. Here was a boy of 18 or 19 years, who was precocious enough to get "full of liquor;" who never went anywhere without a gun; who, upon his admission made, saw these persons killed; who had the money of Frederickson and his pistol; who slept soundly for two nights, alone in the ranch house, within a few feet of where Mrs. Frederickson lay buried in filth; who spread the news of the drowning of the Fredericksons; who told his stories without number, and equally varied; who stood by with unmoved calmness when strong men sickened in their labor of removing the dead woman from her horrible grave, and would himself have assisted but that the sheriff prevented him; who never suffered a tremor when he encountered his father after implicating him in so desperate a toll; and who, in the course of a trial lasting a week, was apparently the coolest person in the courtroom, admitting frequent falsehoods, but sticking hard to his ghastly story. To say that such a witness should not be distrusted would be to mock at justice, and fling men's lives to the wind. John Edwards may be guilty of participation in this murder, but it is beyond human credibility that George Rose's story should be taken as true in any material particular, unless it be against himself, while it is unsupported by some creditable testimony.

We shall not allude at any length to the defense, which was entirely devoted to proving an alibi for George Rose, John B. Rose, and Gibbons. Edwards was, confessedly, at the Rose ranch on Thursday, January 30th. But a dozen or more persons testified that John B. Rose was sick with "la grippe" from Sunday the 26th to Friday the 31st, and that he was confined to his room all day of the 30th; that George was at home Thursday and Friday, doing chores about the house and in the village; and that Gibbons was at his work slashing all the week. Many of the witnesses were clear as to the date, fixing it with reference to the closing of the village school, which occurred Friday afternoon, with an exhibition which George attended, and which he helped arrange for the day and evening before. The teacher, a young lady from Oregon, boarded at the Rose house, and to her the state accorded worthiness of belief. The others were less positive; but the jury evidently disbelieved them all, and gave full credence to George Rose. The verdict was guilty, and the sentence death. For the verdict we see no way to account, except upon the theory that the jury totally misconstrued the value of the testimony offered in corroboration, which they might well do, in view of the court's refusal to direct an acquittal; or there was such prejudice and passion created in their minds that they were incapable of rendering a verdict according to the evidence. There were many assignments of error which we have not touched upon, but we are so thoroughly satisfied that the appellant should have a new trial, on the ground referred to, that it is not necessary to consider them. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial granted.

ANDERS, C. J., and DUNBAR, J., concur.

SCOTT, J. I dissent. I do not think this is a case that should be reversed upon the question of fact. The record discloses no error. There was some corroborating evidence to support the testimony of George Rose, and it, with his testimony, was all before the jury for due consideration. Simply because reading the testimony now might not convince one of the guilt of the defendant will not warrant a reversal. The jury had the advantage of seeing the witnesses upon the stand, and hearing them testify, and the jury's judgment of the facts is the safest to follow. It is going too far to say that there was no sufficient proof of guilt upon which a conviction can be based. I think the evidence for the prosecution shown by the record will bear a more favorable statement than is given in the majority opinion, but, as the case is to be retried, it is perhaps best to refrain from any extended contra argument upon the proofs. However, the fact, if it is a fact, that none of George Rose's statements wherein he charged the accused of the crime were entirely true, does not afford ground for reversing the case. He was a man of hardened and abandoned character, and, it seems, at no time repentant, but his conduct does not show that he was especially desirous of shielding himself, although at times such a desire may have operated upon his mind, and in this regard a plausible reason is given for his contradictory statements. That he implicated the others for the reason he is said thereafter to have given, that the officers would not believe him when he said he committed it alone, and insisted that he had assistance, is very unreasonable. At the trial he was kept upon the stand a long time, and was subjected to a rigid and lengthy cross-examination, his testimony in the main was consistent, and there is much that can be said in favor of the truthfulness of his statement as finally given; but quite likely he was actuated at the last moment, when confronted with the solemnity of a trial of that kind, with a desire to shield himself and his father as much as possible, by showing no previous knowledge of his own, and imputing the actual killing to Edwards and Gibbons. The alibi the defense undertook to establish was not conclusive; most of the testimony relating thereto might have been true, as it probably was, and yet sufficient time left for the commission of the murders on the morning of January 30th, as alleged. These murders, if committed as claimed, were no doubt under previous consideration for some time by some of the parties. John B. Rose's sickness might easily have been feigned. The corroborating testimony may all have been subject to some explanation compatible with innocence, but the jury had all of this before them, the judge was a competent and careful one, the defendant was assisted by able attorneys, and he apparently had a fair trial, and I do not think the verdict and judgment should be disturbed. Human tribunals are faulty at best, and it is impossible in a case like this to approach absolute certainty, but every protection is thrown around the accused, under our system of criminal jurisprudence, and the liability to err against him upon the question of fact, while possible, is very remote. Only in extreme cases should the appellate court interfere to set aside a conviction upon that ground, and this is not such a case.

ROSE V. STATE.

MURDER—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE—CORROBORATION—COMPETENCY OF JURORS—EVIDENCE.

1. On a trial for murder, the principal witness was an accomplice, who had told a number of conflicting stories, sometimes taking the murder entirely upon himself, and sometimes charging it upon others. He admitted numerous falsehoods, and testified that defendant, who was his father, had participated in the murder; and that he himself had no previous knowledge that murder was intended. In corroboration it was shown that defendant, when solicited, had indignantly refused to subscribe money to investigate the murder, saying that he was blamed for it; that he was much agitated by the arrest of his son; that he told him not to talk to any one, but when the case came to trial to tell the truth about how the man and woman went out in a boat, and were drowned; and he gave as a reason for so much shooting that his son had been hunting, but that he did not want anything said about it. Defendant testified that he said the latter incident occurred months before the murder, and was corroborated in this by his son. Several testified that defendant was at home sick on the day of the murder. Held not sufficient to sustain a conviction. Scott, J., dissenting.

2. One who states that he has read newspaper accounts of the murder, has heard the opinions of others, and formed, but not expressed, one of his own, but that it will have no influence on him as a juror, and that he can try the case fairly, is competent.

3. A juror stated that he had talked about the case with 30 or 40 people, including one of the jury who had tried a person indicted jointly with the defendant, and had read newspaper reports of the testimony before the coroner's jury and at the preliminary examination; that his opinion was confirmed, and strong evidence would be required to remove it, but that he would be governed by the law and the evidence, and could lay aside all previous impressions. Held incompetent. Scott, J., dissenting.

4. Defendant's statement, before the trial, that his son had confessed to him the commission of the murder, cannot be contradicted by the prosecution in its evidence in chief. Scott, J., dissenting.

Caples, Hurley, Allen & F. D. Winton and Kanaga, Hokomb & Elwood, for appellant. C. W. Fulton, Geo. J. Moody, Pros. Atty., and A. G. Hardesty, for the State.

STILES, J. The separate trial of John B. Rose for the murder of Sina Frederickson occurred in the week following that of John Edwards, and with the same result. The testimony of George Rose was produced as before, and other witnesses were called to corroborate him. The same line of proof was followed, viz., that of showing expressions dropped by the accused, which, it was claimed, established a guilty knowledge on his part of the crime, and a participation in it.

Marion Bullard was called as a juror, and upon examination stated that he had read such accounts of the Frederickson affair as were published in the current newspapers; that he had talked with other persons in regard to it, and heard them express opinions; that he had formed, but had not expressed, an impression or opinion of his own; but he further stated that his former impression would have no influence upon him as a juror, and would not cause him to construe the evidence upon the side to which his impression had previously leaned. A challenge for cause was denied, but we think the ruling was correct. Joseph Kaiser was another juror. He was a laborer on the farm of James Albright,—one of the jurors on the trial of Edwards; talked with Albright and 30 or 40 others about the case; read the newspapers, including accounts of the testimony before the coroner's jury, and at the preliminary examination; had to a certain extent formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of John B. Rose, which had not been changed; it was a confirmed opinion, which it would require evidence to remove; if sworn as a juror it would require strong evidence to remove his opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant; he would be governed by the evidence as given at the trial, and the law as charged by the court; could lay aside all his previous impressions, but still had an opinion, though not a decided opinion. Defendant's challenge for cause was denied. This was error. The liberality of courts in the matter of accepting jurors who have read and heard of what purports to be the facts in a criminal case is very much greater than formerly, but they have not yet reached a point where one who states that he has an opinion which it would take evidence or strong evidence to remove can be taken as a juror in a criminal case where the life of a prisoner is in jeopardy. By the court's ruling the defense was compelled to peremptorily challenge the juror to avoid the danger of his presence with a fixed opinion in his mind. There must have existed in the opinion of the court, notwithstanding his assertion to the contrary, a doubt whether or not he could be fair, which should have been resolved in favor of the prisoner.

The testimony of George Rose was in every material respect the same as in the Edwards Case, ante, 258, excepting that upon his cross-examination he made it clear that when, as alleged, the party, consisting of his father, Gibbons, Edwards, Frederickson, and himself, left the Rose house to go down after the cattle, no member of the party carried or had mentioned in his hearing any gun or weapon of any kind; that he was the last to leave the yard with his shotgun, which was then unloaded; that without any suggestion from the others he carried the gun, and loaded it as he went; and that nothing was said about the gun until Gibbons took it to shoot the hawk. He also particularly described how he spent his time on Sunday and Monday, February 2d and 3d, when he was alone at the ranch, feeding the cattle, preparing his meals, and quietly reading a book. The name of the book he could not at first give, but finally said it was "Tennis." Counsel suggested "Tennyson," and he agreed that that was the name of it; but beyond that there were stories in "prose," which he afterwards changed to "poetry;" he could not say what anything he read was about. He further said that Monday, February 3d, was a very stormy day.

In this case the corroboration was, if anything, weaker than in the Edwards' Case. John Anderson was active in raising a public subscription of money to employ a detective and a lawyer to investigate the disappearance of the Fredericksons, and went to Rose's house in South Bend to ask him to contribute. Rose was indignant; said he was being blamed for it, and would give nothing. He related what George had said about the Fredericksons going out and being lost on the bay, and appealed to George, who was present, to say if it was not true; and gave as a reason why the bodies did not float that other persons had been drowned there and never been found; his theory being that crabs or seals ate them. Many other people whom the witness met had the same belief as to the drowning, and a number refused to subscribe to the fund. The sheriff arrested George Rose in the presence of his father, at South Bend, and described the old man as being very much agitated by it. He was allowed by the sheriff to have an interview with George in the presence of one Sweet and Elwood, an attorney; and afterwards, when the sheriff was taking his prisoner to the boat for Bay Center, John Rose stepped up to his son and said to him: "Now, George, don't you talk to any one until you come up before the court, and then you tell the truth. You tell the court about seeing Fredericksons go out on that stormy day in the boat, and about a storm coming up, and you thought they were drowned." He asked permission to send a man along in the boat to protect George from mob violence, and, being invited himself to go, replied that he dared not, as threats were being made against his own life by persons who said they would mob him if he went outside of South Bend. Gibbons was sent by Rose to do what he could for George. The defendant Rose left home on Sunday February 2d, and went to Oysterville to attend a session of the county commissioners, and on his return from there visited a newspaper office at South Bend, and told the persons he met there in their conversation that his son George last week, at his place near South Bend, had wounded a wild goose, and by tying a string to its leg had caused it to attract others, so that he was enabled to kill 13 geese. One witness said he added: "I didn't know but what people would think it strange there was so much shooting going on up there, and I thought I would tell you what it is, so if there is anything said about it you would know." Another witness said his remark was: "You needn't mention any names in the paper," witness supposing it was given to him as an item. Another remembered his saying he thought it was a pretty smart trick, but he did not want anything said about it. Defendant maintained that he said this incident occurred "last fall," instead of last week, as the witnesses gave it. George Rose stated that in fact it did occur in November, 1889, and other witnesses showed that shooting on the flats at the mouth of the Willapa and on the bay was very common.

The testimony in regard to the finding of the alleged grave was repeated. One Prickett, who took the place of Edwards at the ranch, was called to relate a conversation between himself and Rose in regard to a rubber boot-leg, the materiality of which was that Frederickson and everybody else down there uniformly wore rubber boots, Mrs. Frederickson having a pair of them on when she was found; and George Rose had reported finding a boot along the shore, which he had again thrown away. Rose asked Prickett to look up this boot, as well as all the other boots about there, and keep them for any search party that came along. Prickett found a boot-top in the yard on the Rose place, and a number of other rubber boots in the same vicinity, and when he reported the finding of the boot-top to Rose the latter said: "Was the top cut off that boot?" Witness told him it was, when he asked further: "Didn't you or your boy cut it off?" Prickett answered, "No." Then Rose said: "You or your boy must have cut it off." This boot-leg was produced at the trial, and three small spots were pointed out on it as being blood spots. The ingenuity of counsel may have shown this testimony to have been material, but unless it was Frederickson's boot, (which nowhere appears,) and unless the spots were human blood, (which was not attempted to be shown,) there seems to have been nothing connected with it of any importance. Many old boots were scattered around there, and cattle were killed near by every day. The witness who testified to this, although in Rose's employ, was in fact employed by the authorities to watch him, talk with him, and report anything that might escape him. At first the witness said Rose's last remark was: "You must say you cut it off;" but on cross-examination he admitted that he was considerably excited, and that it might be as given above.

At the close of the preliminary examination before a magistrate, according to one of the witnesses, who was among the guard employed by the sheriff, the defendant said he knew George had committed the murder, as he had confessed it to him; that he had got on a drunk, and killed them. The state, using Rose's testimony in the Edwards trial as evidence in chief, had already put in a contradiction by Rose of this alleged conversation. Counsel for the defense strenuously objected to the admission of this testimony, and we think it was error to admit it. The accused was there to meet the charge that he was guilty of the murder by being present and assisting in it; not the charge of knowingly concealing a murder committed by some other person. Taking the testimony of the witness as true, the offense of the father in covering his son's

The defense rested mainly upon the alibi, as in the Edwards Case; but there were some features of both cases which we shall notice here. Witnesses outside of the family, of the Roses, and who were not shown to have had any connection with them, testified that they knew John B. Rose to have been confined to his room with illness from Sunday, January 26th, to Friday, the 31st; that George Rose was hauling wood on Thursday, the 30th, in the forenoon, from back of the hotel in South Bend to the hotel, and in the afternoon, among other things, went on an errand to the stores, to get ham for a dancing party to be given the school-mistress on Friday evening; that in the evening of the same day, from after supper time until late, Frances, the school-mistress, George, and another young man were in the kitchen making cakes for the party; that on Friday Rose and his wife, during the day, went into the village, and executed and acknowledged a deed of real estate; that Friday forenoon George was engaged clearing out of a new building the débris left by carpenters, to prepare the floor for dancing; that in the afternoon he attended the school exhibition, with many others; that the dancing party occurred at the Rose house on Friday night; that on Saturday George went in a boat with another man down to the ranch, and they, with Edwards, killed a beef, and dressed it, and remained there overnight, returning to South Bend early Sunday morning; that on Sunday, Rose, Edwards, and the school-mistress took the boat, and went to Oysterville and beyond, Rose and Edwards being absent several days; that during the day George was about the saloons and was drinking; that in the afternoon about 4 or 5 o'clock he bought a pint bottle of whisky, took it and his gun, and left in his boat for the ranch; and that he did not appear again until Tuesday, when he paid for the whisky with a $10 gold piece. Two witnesses testified to having seen George on Sunday night, in a wash-room in the rear of his father's house; that they spoke to him, and that he then told them he had seen the Frederickses go out in their boat, but that they disappeared in a squall, and he supposed they were lost. He said he must go to the ranch early in the morning on business. Frances Rose denied having at any time got supper for her father, Gibbons, and George, or any of them, as stated by George.

In response to the testimony of the defense, above epitomized, George gave a flat denial wherever Thursday was included, and also denied having bought the bottle of whisky, and his having been seen on Sunday night. On the day after George made his last written statement, which implicated his father, Gibbons, and Edwards, counsel for the defense, having heard that he had made such a statement, went to the jail to have an interview with him, and there George said to him, referring to the murder: "I done it myself, and I will just tell you how it was. The school ma'am left here Sunday, the 2d day of February. I was feeling a little blue, and I got full that day. I stayed around town till almost dark. Kept drinking all day. About dark I got a quart bottle of whisky, and started for the farm. Going down to the farm I made up my mind to kill Frederickson. I went to bed that night, and got up in the morning with my head feeling pretty bad. I remember that I had made up my mind to kill Frederickson, and then thought I would not do it. I drank all of the quart bottle of whisky that I had brought down with me during the first two hours after I got up, and then made up my mind that I would kill Frederickson. I was drunk, or I would not have done it. I took the shotgun, and put two cartridges into it, and three more into my pocket, which was all the cartridges I had for the shotgun. I then went to Frederickson's house and told Frederickson that a calf had got its leg between two logs, and that I could not get the logs apart alone, and that I wished he would go with me, and help get the calf out. He went with me. I was ahead, and he followed after me along the trail. When I got over the log where Frederickson's body was found, I turned around, and Frederickson was just getting onto the log. I said, 'Look here, Frederickson.' I had the gun all ready, and, as he looked up, I fired. The charge struck him just below the eye. He dropped down dead. I looked at him a minute, and thought that was a pretty tough way to do business. I started for home, and I thought I had better do some more shooting, to make people think that I was out hunting; so I shot away the rest of the cartridges I had with me. This was before dinner. I waited around the house an hour or two. I then thought I would have to kill Mrs. Frederickson, because she had seen Frederickson go away from the house with me, and when he didn't come back there would be trouble. I had no more cartridges for the shotgun, so I took the rifle and put a cartridge into it, and several more in my pocket, and went down to Frederickson's house, and told Mrs. Frederickson he had broken his leg, and that I could not get him home; that he wanted her to come right up to the house. She put on her rubber boots, and started along with me. When we got up near our hog-pen she seemed to think something was wrong, and she said she would not go any further until I told her what I had done with her husband. I told her I had killed him. She said if I had killed her husband I might as well kill her too; so I took the rifle, and held it close to her temple. She never moved a muscle. I fired, and she fell dead. I then took the gun back to the house, and waited until almost dark. I made up my mind it was a bad job, and that there had got to be something done: so I went and buried Mrs. Frederickson under the manure pile at the hog-pen. I went into the house, and stayed there all night. Next morning I went out to where Frederickson's body was, and buried it just where it laid. I then went to South Bend, and told the folks that I had seen the Frederickses leave in a dinkey. That shortly after they left there came up a terrible squall, and after the squall was over I could see nothing more of the dinkey, and I thought the dinkey had got swamped, and they were drowned. After I had killed Frederickson I took what money he had out of his pocket. There was $59.50. It was out of that money I bought several chances in the seal-skin raffle. Father asked me where I got so much money, and I told him that the South Bend Land Company owed me for work that I had done for them the fall before, and that they had paid me." And being asked why he had made the statement implicating the others he said that he had told the authorities the story repeated above, but that they said if he persisted in telling that story they would have nothing more to do with him; that they knew that the other parties arrested were implicated in the murder with him; and that, if he told the truth, and implicated the others, they would do all they could for him.

In this case, as was before remarked, the corroborative testimony was even weaker than in the Edwards Case. The father may have been agitated over his son's arrest for so heinous a crime. It would be strange if he were not. He may have refused contributions; he may have thought his son smart as a goose hunter; he may have received the confession of his son's guilt. He might have cautioned him to say nothing, or tell the story he had told before, even knowing it to be false; he might send some one friendly to be near in case of mob violence; but how, to the unbiased mind, do any of these things tend to show that George Rose's most remarkable story was true in its material part, wherein it charged his father with participation in this murder? We are unable to see that it should even create a suspicion. The motive assigned, viz., the desire to obtain the Frederickson land, amounted to this: The land was almost worthless for any purpose in itself, and it had lain for years, with occasional claimants, who abandoned it. Rose had himself told one or more parties of its condition, and offered to show it to them if they wished to take it up; but he had made no move towards acquiring it himself, until, as his son charged, he found it necessary to employ assassins to destroy a threatened claim upon it. The duty of this court in the premises is too clear for doubt. The appellant must have a new trial, and it is so ordered.

ANDERS, C. J., and DUNBAR, J., concur.

SCOTT, J., (dissenting.) I dissent. All the reasons given for dissenting in the Edwards Case, ante, 258, are applicable here. The record discloses no error in law, and the basis for a reversal can only be upon the insufficiency of the evidence. The juror Joseph Kaiser, spoken of, said he could give the defendant a fair and impartial trial upon the evidence, and the defendant's peremptory challenges were not nearly all exhausted. No point was raised by appellant as to the proof of his statement, made at the preliminary examination, that he knew George committed the murders; and it was admissible, in any event, as tending to show the guilt of the accused. Nor do I agree to the statement that the corroborating evidence was weaker than in the Edwards Case. The testimony given upon the part of the defense, as stated in the majority opinion, is largely susceptible of explanation, and the corroborating testimony is not fully shown.

ANDERSON V. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—SEPARATION OF JURY—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—APPEAL.

1. Under Laws Wash. 1885-86, p. 70, § 1, subd. 7, providing that the papers used on the hearing of a motion for a new trial, and the evidence reduced before or at the time to writing, shall constitute a bill of exceptions, affidavits in support of a motion for a new trial are part of the record, and need not be otherwise brought up on appeal.

2. On trial for murder, the separation of the jury before rendering their verdict is reversible error, though defendant's counsel may have consented to a sealed verdict, and the verdict may have been signed, sealed, and delivered to the foreman before separation.

3. Code Wash. § 1089, providing that juries in criminal cases shall not be allowed to separate except by consent of defendant and the prosecuting attorney, only applies to separation during the trial, and does not authorize the jury to deliver to their foreman a sealed verdict, and then separate.

Error from superior court, Kittitas county; C. B. GRAVES, Judge.

Laws Wash. 1885-86, p. 70, § 1, subd. 7, provides that the papers used on the hearing of a motion for a new trial, etc., and the evidence reduced before or at the time to writing, shall constitute a bill of exceptions. Code Wash. § 1089, provides that juries in criminal cases shall not be allowed to separate, except by consent of the defendant and the prosecuting attorney, but shall be kept together without meat or drink, unless otherwise ordered by the court to be furnished at the expense of the county.

W. C. Jones, Atty. Gen., for the State.

SCOTT, J. Defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and is under sentence of death. Only one question is presented by the record. The case was given to the jury in the afternoon of March 25, 1890. It appears by affidavits in support of a motion for a new trial that the jury agreed upon their verdict some time during the night, and the same was signed, sealed up, and delivered to their foreman, and thereupon the jurors left the jury-room, separated, and went around the town for several hours, and did not reassemble until court convened on the morning of the 26th, when the verdict was returned. The defendant's attorney consented that a sealed verdict might be rendered. The state contends that the affidavits in support of the motion for a new trial are no part of the record, and, as no statement of facts or bill of exceptions was settled, that the question is not raised, and, if otherwise, that the point was waived by the consent to a sealed verdict, and that it was not error. Section 1, subd. 7, of the act, commencing at page 70, Sess. Laws 1885-86, makes such affidavits a part of the record, and this act had not been repealed when this appeal was taken. No precedent has been shown us, nor do we know of any, for allowing a sealed verdict in a capital case. We have no statute authorizing sealed verdicts, and such a separation of the jury was not authorized, at least according to the better authorities, at common law. See Thomp. Trials, §§ 2551, 2552, and authorities there cited. It was conceded that, while the rule that the separation of the jury in a criminal case prior to the receipt of its verdict by the court was a misconduct which would entitle the defendant to a new trial was a good one when made, and could not be disregarded at that time without great danger of seriously prejudicing the substantial rights of the defendant, as then the jury could not render a written verdict in a criminal case, but must render it ore tenus, and that, under such a provision of law, if a jury were permitted to separate prior to the rendering of the verdict, they might be subjected to influences dangerous to society and subversive of the rights of the defendant, yet it was argued with considerable force that the reasons therefor no longer apply, as our statute requires written verdicts, and that, when the verdict is once written and agreed upon by the jury, and placed in the hands of the foreman or other proper officer, there then remains no reason why the jury should be kept together. But on the whole we think such a separation of the jury, especially in a capital case, is a dangerous practice, and one we would not care to sanction, even though we felt at liberty to lay down a different rule from that heretofore recognized. There is no necessity therefor, nor any very good reason why such a practice should be adopted, at least in cases of the very gravest importance; and we think this was a matter that defendant could not waive. Code, § 1089, only authorizes the separation of the jury during the progress of the trial before the cause is finally submitted to them. It is not expressly so limited by its language, but the fact that there is no law authorizing a sealed verdict in capital cases requires it to be so interpreted. Reversed and remanded for a new trial.

WHITCHER V. STATE.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE — INFORMATION — VARIANCE.

1. An information charging: "W. is accused * * * of the crime of an assault with intent to commit rape, committed as follows, to-wit: * * * in and upon one E., * * *,"—though it does not give the female's name in the charging part, is sufficient, under Code Wash. § 1004, requiring the acts constituting the offense to be stated so that a person of common understanding may know what is intended. ANDERS, C. J., and STILES, J., dissenting.

2. Proof of an assault on a female under the age of consent, with her consent, cannot support an information charging an assault with force, with intent to commit rape. DUNBAR, J., dissenting.

3. Though the laws of Washington make it rape to have carnal knowledge of a female under the age of consent, even with her consent, there can, in the absence of fraud, be no assault with intent to rape, when she consents, since there can be no assault without force or fraud.

Appeal from superior court, Lincoln county.

Code Wash. § 1004, provides that the indictment must contain "a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended."

N. T. Caton and D. J. Crowley, for appellant. Geo. A. Allen and J. W. Merritt, for the State.

HOYT, J. Plaintiff in error seeks by this appeal to reverse the judgment and sentence of the superior court of Lincoln county, whereby he was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape, and sentenced therefor. As a first reason for said reversal, plaintiff in error contends that the information does not state facts sufficient to constitute a crime. The information is as follows: "Warren Whitcheer is accused by the prosecuting attorney of Lincoln county, state of Washington, by this information, of the crime of an assault with intent to commit rape, committed as follows, to-wit: On the 16th day of June, 1890, in the county of Lincoln, in the state of Washington, in and upon one Annie Estabrook, a female of the age of twelve years and more, an assault did make, and her, the said Annie Estabrook, then and there did beat, bruise, wound, and ill treat, with intent her, the said Annie Estabrook, by force and against her will, feloniously to ravish and carnally know; contrary to the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the laws of the state of Washington,"—and is, we think, sufficient. It is true, as contended by the appellant, that the name of the defendant is omitted in the charging part of the information, and, were it not aided by our statute, would be bad. But thus aided it is good, as a man of common understanding could see therefrom that the acts charged were clearly intended to be so charged as the acts of the person named in the accusing part of the information.¹

The court instructed the jury that, if the person upon whom the attempt was made was under the age of 16 years, the fact that she consented to the advances made would constitute no defense. This was error. The indictment charged an assault with force, and to warrant a conviction thereunder an assault with force must be proved. To prove an attempt without force when the charge was of one with force would be a clear variance. Besides, we do not think there can be such a thing as an assault to commit rape where consent is given. It is true that our statute has provided that having carnal knowledge of a female child under age shall be rape. Yet such statute has in no manner changed the definition of "assault." And we are unable to conceive of a person being assaulted who consents to the acts which without such consent would constitute an assault. Fraud in obtaining such consent may operate to make the person perpetrating the fraud liable. But, if so, it is upon the theory that the fraud used is equivalent to force. The legislature could provide that any undue familiarity with the person of a female under age should constitute an assault with intent to ravish, but it has not done so. And as the law now stands there can be no felonious assault without the facts necessary to constitute a simple assault being elements thereof; and as we think there can be no simple assault without force, and with consent, it follows that there can be no such thing as an assault with intent to commit rape where, without fraud being practiced, consent is given to all the acts relied upon to establish the crime. Other errors were assigned upon the record, but a decision thereof would not aid the lower court upon a new trial, and we shall not therefore discuss them. The judgment and sentence must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, and it will be so ordered.

SCOTT, J. I concur in the result; also in holding the information good, and that it was necessary to prove a forcible attempt, force being alleged.

ANDERS, C. J., (dissenting.) While I concur in the conclusion that the judgment of the court below should be reversed, I am unable to assent to the proposition that the information in this case states facts sufficient to constitute a crime. Section 1006 of the Code provides that the indictment (information) must be direct and certain as regards the crime charged, the party charged, and the particular circumstances of the crime charged, when they are necessary to constitute a complete crime. It is true that it is stated in the introductory part of the information that the defendant is accused of the crime of an assault with intent to commit rape, but it is nowhere alleged in the information that he did any of the acts constituting the crime of which he is "accused," and which are set forth in the charging part, or body, of the information. The introductory part of an information, which sets forth the name of the crime, is nothing more than a formal statement of a conclusion of law supposed to result from a certain state of facts, and is useless, unless fully warranted by the facts pleaded. A conclusion of guilt may be drawn from the particular facts and circumstances alleged; but in this case the fact that the defendant did those things alleged in the information can only be inferred from the accusation itself. I am of the opinion that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the information.

STILES J., concurs.

DUNBAR, J. I dissent. I think with Judges HOYT and SCOTT that the information is sufficient. While its construction is awkward, I have no doubt that a person of common understanding could tell from reading it what was intended; that is the object of an indictment or information, and all that is necessary; anything more than that is simply verbiage, and its omission ought not to defeat the ends of justice. But I do not agree with the majority that the court erred in instructing the jury that if the person upon whom the attempt was made was under the age of 16 years, the fact that she consented to the advances would constitute no defense. I agree with the proposition that there cannot be such a thing as an assault to commit a rape where consent is given; but I think within the meaning of the law no consent can be given where the female is under the age of 16 years. It is the mental consent that the law contemplates, not the physical consent, and the theory of the law is that a female under the age of 16 years is not of a consenting mind, and therefore cannot consent, or, in other words, the law will not allow her to consent. The judgment should be affirmed.

CLINE v. HARMON.

APPEAL—ORDER OF ARREST IN CIVIL ACTIONS.

Under Laws Wash. 1889-90, p. 336, § 1, which provides that "an appeal may be taken from the superior courts in all actions and proceedings" except where the amount involved does not exceed $200, an order of arrest before final judgment in a civil action is appealable. Per SCOTT, J., dissenting.

For majority opinion, see ante, 191.

SCOTT, J. I dissent. While the order of arrest and its prosecution were in a measure incidental to the main action, yet it was substantially an independent proceeding, and no error committed therein would afford any ground for reversing or affect the judgment rendered in the suit. It is urged that if the door is open to such appeals there is no place to draw the line; that an order overruling or sustaining a demurrer and other like matters would also be appealable; that it would practically allow a separate appeal from every order made in the progress of a cause, etc. While I do not undertake specifically to enumerate every proceeding in which I think a party is entitled to an appeal, it seems to me a line can be drawn excluding everything founded upon matters litigated in the suit, and upon which the judgment is based, as such matters injuriously affecting a party can be reviewed by appealing the action. Such an interpretation would give an appeal in every matter affecting a substantial right, and I believe this to be a fair interpretation of the statute. An attachment proceeding should be held appealable, or the matters relating thereto should be determined by the judgment in the action in finding that a ground existed therefor, and directing a sale of the property so seized, or otherwise, according to the facts, so that the same could be reviewed upon an appeal from such judgment, and the judgment reversed or modified if error existed in such proceeding to the prejudice of the party appealing. A finding therein upon a question of fact would not be reviewed, but an entire absence of proof upon some essential point would be fatal. Also in the matter of a preliminary injunction or restraining order addressed to the sound discretion of the court an appeal should be held to lie, so that a reversal or modification might be had in case of a clear abuse of such discretion. Such other proceedings as are entirely unconnected with any action are essentially actions in themselves, though, perhaps, not technically so. The authorities bearing upon the right to such appeals are conflicting. The greater number of cases may sustain the position taken by the court here. It is a question upon the construction of a statute, however, which we have before us, and such cases were based on constitutional or statutory provisions differing from ours, with possibly an exception of one or two, where there may have been no substantial difference in the language used. Whether they were passed as amendments, and what the previous situation was, is not apparent, and these matters are always considered in interpreting or construing statutes. Although great respect should be paid to cases elsewhere decided pertinent to the question, more should be given to principle, clearly cut; and there is little danger in recognizing one so plainly delineated as the one upon which this appeal is founded. A person illegally restrained of his liberty should certainly be entitled to a hearing and deliverance. I think it must be held to be within the intention of the law to allow him an appeal, and that the statute is sufficiently definite for such purpose. Section 1, Sens. Laws, 1889-90, p. 333, which the present statute amended, reads as follows: "An appeal may be taken to the supreme court from the following decisions, orders, or judgments of superior courts, and from none other: First, from all final decisions; second, from a final order made in special proceedings affecting a substantial right therein, or made on a summary application in an action after judgment; third, from an order granting a new trial, or granting or refusing, continuing or modifying a temporary injunction or restraining order in cases where the principal object of the action is to obtain injunctive relief; fourth, from a final order or judgment on habeas corpus." The statute in question (Id. p. 336) amends the said section to read as follows: "An appeal may be taken to the supreme court from the superior courts in all actions and proceedings excepting that its appellate jurisdiction shall not extend to civil actions at law for the recovery of money or property when the original amount in controversy or the value of the property does not exceed the sum of two hundred (200) dollars, unless the action involves the legality of a tax, impost, assessment, toll, municipal fine, or the validity of a statute;" following the constitutional provision, section 4, art. 4, State Const. It seems to me there is more reason for holding that the last act was intended to enlarge, rather than restrict, the matters from which appeals might be taken as provided in the former statute. These acts were both passed by the same legislature. The first act specified certain matters from which appeals might be taken, and excluded all others. The restrictive words, "and from none other," and the specification are omitted from the last act, and an appeal is therein allowed in all actions and proceedings; the act only containing the constitutional restriction regarding the amount in litigation, which, of course, operated upon the former statute. Herein the only restriction placed upon appeals—and this should have considerable weight in determining what is allowed—is as to matters connected with the amount involved where the sum claimed or the value of the property does not exceed $200, and nothing else is limited; otherwise an appeal may be taken. See Conant v. Conant, 10 Cal. 249. Section 2 provides that "a person desiring to appeal from any such decision, order, or judgment, may, by himself or attorney, give notice," etc. Had it been intended to narrow the scope of the former act, and exclude some of the matters from which it allowed an appeal, it is likely such an intention would have found expression in more appropriate language. On the other hand, quite likely it was feared that some matters wherein an appeal should properly lie had been omitted from the former provisions, and that it was the intention to go to the fullest extent permissible under the constitutional limitation, leaving this general provision for the court to apply. The words "an appeal" are equivalent to one appeal in each action and proceeding wherein a substantial right is affected by a final decision therein. Consequently any such prejudicial matter affecting a substantial right that would come up in an appeal of the main action could be passed upon in such appeal, and it is evident that a separate appeal therefrom was not intended, but that in all others, whether in a proceeding connected with an action or in an entirely independent proceeding, an appeal might be had. This is only a fair interpretation, calculated to give effect to the act, and could not be deemed what is sometimes called "legislation by the court" in any sense. Such an interpretation does not go beyond the recognized authority or duty of courts, and in this view the statute is sufficiently definite.

Our constitutional and legislative provisions for appellate jurisdiction are liberal. The single bare exclusion relating to money values of $200 or less is practically so insignificant that the citizen may feel safe and secure in all his valuable rights; and if, by such a proceeding as this, his home is invaded, and he is carried to prison, that he may have a review thereof on an appeal to the supreme court, after a final decision in the proceeding. The proceedings in arrest in this case were wholly unwarranted. Section 17, art. 1, of the state constitution, provides that "there shall be no imprisonment for debt, except in cases of absconding debtors." This rendered the statute, (see chapter 9 of the Code,) under which these proceedings were had, nugatory. There is no provision there, and there was none elsewhere, by statute authorizing the arrest of absconding debtors before judgment. This case presents peculiar hardships. A judgment on the sole issue formed by the complaint in this action founded upon an account amounting to less than $200, and the answer admitting the greater part thereof, would come within the limitation referred to. It could not be brought here for review, and in no event could that judgment affect the wrong that this judgment has inflicted. The judgment brought here for review is one given in a statutory proceeding, instituted and carried to the final ending under a statute which was at the time void; a judgment that declared the arrest and imprisonment which the appellant had suffered to be lawful, and declared the statute under which the proceedings were had to be valid; a proceeding that cannot be commenced nor carried on except by force and virtue of statutory law. This proceeding and this judgment involved not the matter of one or two hundred dollars. All that it involves is distinctly different from that. It involves that which is most sacred and dear to the citizen. Therein the freeman is made a prisoner, the citizen a victim to violence and outrage. This judgment is a final one in the proceeding, and ripe for review. The amount for which an action has been brought and judgment may be given is entirely immaterial, so far as imprisonment proceedings are concerned, for the wrong of an imprisonment is the same whatever the amount involved in the action. The validity of this statute could not be involved in the judgment upon the debt demand in the complaint stated, even if that demand and judgment thereon were large enough to warrant an appeal therefrom, for the statute affected the proceeding only,—the order and warrant in arrest. Furthermore, it is provided that the appeal from any order, decision, or judgment must be taken within six months after its rendition. More than six months may elapse between the judgment on the arrest proceedings and the judgment on the debt demand, so that it must be apparent from every point of view that this judgment on the issue involved in the arrest and imprisonment proceedings is in every way a distinct judgment affecting such rights as make it a judgment that can be reviewed here. Such an appeal is inherently right in principle, and, I believe, in accord with the conception of the framers of our constitution, and within the expression thereof and our legislative enactments thereunder. According to the holding in this case, a party would in some proceedings have no remedy for error; an action on a bond could not be held to be one; and habeas corpus, while available in a proceeding like this, where the person is seized and detained in custody, sometimes might not lie or afford any relief, as, for instance, where bail had been given. Under the law relating to the writ applicable to this court it, when issuable, would not reach beyond one jurisdictional question,—the bare power to issue the warrant. No other error could be raised by it. See In re Lybarger, 25 Pac. Rep. 1075, (decided at this session.) It has been the policy of other states to grant appeals in such proceedings. See Wright v. Brown, 67 N. Y. 1; Morris v. Talcott, 96 N. Y. 100. Also, see Spitley v. Frost, 15 Fed. Rep. 299. The motion to dismiss the appeal should have been denied, and the defendant discharged.

ASSIGNMENT OF RIGHT TO CITY WARRANTS — EQUITY JURISDICTION.

1. A contractor to do work on the streets of a city may assign his right to receive the warrants for such work, and such assignment creates an equitable interest in such expectancy, which a court of equity will protect by decreeing the delivery of the warrants when issued. The interest created by such an assignment is equitable, not legal.

2. Section 16 of charter 1885 of the city of East Portland does not prevent the president of the council from taking an assignment of the right to receive warrants to be issued in the future for work already performed on the streets of the city, and such an assignment is not unlawful.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; L. B. STEARNS, Judge.

The facts out of which this controversy has arisen are briefly these: The defendant Franey and one John E. Woods jointly contracted with the city of East Portland to do the grading and graveling of Twelfth street in said city, and to construct the side and cross walks thereon. These parties had a prior arrangement between themselves whereby each was to do certain specified parts of the work without sharing profits or losses with each other. About July 17, 1889, Woods, having substantially completed his part of the work, for a valuable consideration, sold, assigned, and transferred in writing to the plaintiff all warrants to be issued by the city of East Portland to Franey & Woods for laying the side and cross walks in front of and abutting certain specified blocks on said street. On the 20th day of July, 1890, Woods made a similar sale and assignment of other warrants to be issued for work of the same character in front of other specified blocks on said street to Hall Bros., who assigned the same to the plaintiff. That thereafter the city of East Portland issued the warrants in controversy in the name of Franey & Woods, and left them in the hands of the recorder Llewellyn, who, upon the expiration of his term of office, delivered the same to his successor, the defendant Mayo. That the warrants were not actually issued until September, 1889, at which time, by the request of Franey & Woods, separate warrants were issued for the grading and graveling, and for the side and cross walks, and those for grading and graveling were delivered to the defendant Franey in compensation for his part of said work, and those issued for the cross and side walks, being the warrants now in controversy, were intended for said Woods in payment for his part of said work. Another object of this suit was to enjoin an action at law, which Franey had commenced in the name of Franey & Woods, to recover the said warrants now in controversy, and then in the possession of the defendant Llewelyn. The plaintiff had a decree, from which the defendant Franey has appealed to this court.

R. Citron and James Gleason, for appellant. John H. Hall and W. E. Showers, for respondent.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) Upon the argument of this cause, several objections were made to the plaintiff's right to maintain this suit, which will be separately noticed so far as may be necessary to a proper disposition of this cause.

1. It is first claimed by the appellant that this suit cannot be maintained for the reason that its object is purely legal, that is, to recover the possession of the warrants in controversy; but this objection overlooks one element in the plaintiff's case. At the time of the assignment of the warrants, they were not in existence, and such assignments therefore could not create a strictly legal title. At most, it could only create an equity, that is, a right of interest over which courts of equity have been accustomed to exercise jurisdiction, and, in proper cases, to protect and make effectual according to the intention and rights of the parties. The principle is stated in 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 163, as follows: "The assignee of an expectancy, possibility, or contingency acquired at once a present equitable right over the future proceeds of the expectancy, possibility, or contingency, which was of such a certain and fixed nature that it was sure to ripen into an ordinary equitable property right over those proceeds as soon as they came into existence by a transformation of the possibility or contingency into an interest in possession. There was an equitable ownership or property in abeyance, so to speak, which finally changed into an absolute property, upon the happening of the future event. Equity permitted the creation and transfer of such an ownership." After stating the effect of modern legislation upon this rule, the learned author continues: "Whatever may be the effect of these statutes in abridging, or rather in removing occasion for, the jurisdiction of equity, it is plain that the jurisdiction must still exist in the cases where a thing in action or demand, purely equitable in its nature, is assigned, and where the assignment itself is equitable, that is, does not operate as an assignment at law,—and where any species of possibility or expectancy not within the scope of the statutes is transferred." And 2 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 527, recognizes the rule of law. This ancient head of equity jurisdiction is not destroyed by any statute that I am aware of, and must therefore still exist, and I think the case made by the plaintiff falls precisely within it. The fact that the plaintiff sought to enjoin the action at law in no way impairs the jurisdiction of equity. It is manifest that the complaint, or that part of it which seeks to lay a foundation for an injunction, is wanting in fullness and particularity of statement; but, as we have seen, the complaint would still be sufficient on the other ground suggested, if all relating to the injunction were stricken out.

2. At the time the plaintiff took the assignments of these warrants, he was president of the common council of the city of East Portland, and it is claimed that, by reason of a particular provision of the charter of the city, he could acquire no title to such warrants. The provision is as follows: "No member of the common council or any officer of the city shall be interested in any contract or job the expenses of which are paid out of the city treasury." Acts 1885, p. 314, § 16. This is a wise and proper provision, and if we could see that the assignment of these warrants to the plaintiff made him "interested in the contract or job," within the meaning of this prohibition, it would be our plain duty to turn him out of court without any kind of redress. But here the evidence shows that the contract was completely executed before the assignment. All the contractors were to do had been performed, and what the plaintiff did was to take an assignment which entitled him to receive Woods' part of the warrants. This fact does not bring the plaintiff within the purpose of this inhibition, or within the letter of the statute.

3. The defendant Franey does not claim to own these warrants, but his contention is that, the contract being joint, Woods bought lumber for side and cross walks, and is still indebted therefor, and that a claim is being made against him for payment, and that Woods' creditors seek to charge him as a partner. Woods and Franey not being partners, Woods could do no act that would charge Franey as a partner, or in any manner render him liable on Woods' account, without his own acquiescence or consent; and the fact that some person may set up a claim against Franey which, so far as appears, is without foundation, would furnish no reason for taking these warrants for which the plaintiff and Hall Bros. have paid a full consideration and turn them over to Franey, to indemnify him against such a possibility. We think the decree of the court below is right, and the same is affirmed.

WISEMAN V. NORTHERN PAC. R. CO.

SECONDARY EVIDENCE—WHEN ADMISSIBLE—DILIGENCE.

1. Secondary evidence of the contents of a writing is admitted on the theory that the original writing cannot be produced by the party by whom the evidence is offered, within a reasonable time, by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

2. No precise rule can be laid down as to what shall be considered a reasonable effort, but the party alleging the loss or destruction of the document is expected to show that he has in good faith exhausted in a reasonable degree all the sources of information and means of discovery which the nature of the case would naturally suggest, and which are accessible to him.

3. The degree of diligence which shall be considered necessary in any case will depend on the circumstances of the particular case, the character and importance of the paper, the purposes for which it is proposed to use it, and the place where a paper of that kind may naturally be supposed to be found.

4. Where the cause of action or defense is founded upon an alleged writing, and both the execution and contents of the writing are denied, and the alleged writing is shown to be in the possession of a person residing outside of the state, secondary evidence of its contents is not admissible, unless a proper effort is made to obtain the original.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

On March 19, 1890, the plaintiff, J. J. Wiseman, commenced an action in the circuit court of the state of Oregon for the county of Multnomah against the defendant, to recover the sum of $398.72, the value of certain household goods claimed to have been lost by defendant in transit. The complaint alleges that on or about the 8th day of April, 1889, at Nunica, Mich., the plaintiff delivered to the Detroit, Grand Haven & Milwaukee Railway Company a shipment of six boxes, one trunk, one roll of carpet, and two barrels containing household goods, the property of the plaintiff, for transportation to Salem, Or.; that said shipment was in due time delivered in good order to the defendant as a connecting carrier; and that one of said boxes and one of said barrels, with their entire contents, were destroyed, and never delivered to plaintiff, which household goods so destroyed were of the value of $373.05. The defendant, in its answer to the complaint, admits the shipment by plaintiff, and the delivery to the Detroit, Grand Haven & Milwaukee Railway Company, of the household goods in question, and that the same was in due time received by defendant from the Detroit, Grand Haven & Milwaukee Railway Company, a connecting carrier; admits that one of the boxes and one of the barrels, with the contents, were destroyed, but denies any knowledge as to the contents or value thereof. For a further and separate answer and defense, defendant alleged that the shipment of freight mentioned in the complaint consisted of household goods, and that the same was shipped by plaintiff, and received and accepted by the Detroit, Grand Haven & Milwaukee Railway Company, as well as the defendant, a connecting line, under a contract with plaintiff that, if for any cause there should be a total loss of said freight, and a liability on the part of the common carrier receiving the same, or over whose line the same was being or was transported, the total liability therefor, if any there should be, would be the sum of five dollars per hundred pounds weight of said freight, and the same was received and accepted by defendant and shipped by plaintiff on said condition. The defendant, further answering, and as a separate defense, alleged that at the date of shipment by plaintiff, to-wit, April 8, 1889, in order to obtain the benefit of the reduced rate of freight charges from the ordinary tariff rate charged therefor, the plaintiff and the Detroit, Grand Haven & Milwaukee Railway Company contracted and agreed in writing that, in consideration of such reduced rates, the plaintiff, in case of any damage or loss to said goods arising by damage by fire while at stations or in transit, would and did release said company, and each and every other company over whose lines said goods might pass to destination, from any and all damage occurring to said goods; that said plaintiff was given and obtained the benefit of said reduced rates, and executed said contract of release accordingly. The reply denies the new matter alleged in the answer. On the trial the plaintiff gave evidence tending to prove the issues on his part, and then rested. Defendant then gave evidence tending to prove the execution by plaintiff of the release and contract mentioned in the answer; that it was executed in duplicate, one copy being attached to the bill of lading, and the other was by the agent of the Detroit, Grand Haven & Milwaukee Railway, at Nunica, Mich., forwarded to the traffic manager of that road, at Chicago, Ill. Defendant then called Alfred Watts, who was then clerk of the Northern Pacific Railroad, at Portland, Or., who testified that he was clerk in the office of Mr. Fulton, general freight agent of the defendant at Portland; that he had telegraphed to the claim agent of the defendant at St. Paul to ascertain if a release had been made on the plaintiff's shipment of goods from Nunica, and, if so, to send the original release that was signed by Mr. Wiseman; that the claim agent at St. Paul telegraphed back that the files in the office of the traffic manager at Chicago had been searched, and the release could not be found; that the release never was in his office at Portland, and the parties who handled the way-bill of plaintiff's goods said there was no release attached to it when it reached its destination. The defendant then offered the deposition of the agent at Nunica to prove the contents of the release, but the court refused to admit secondary evidence of its contents, to which ruling defendant duly excepted, and assigns the same as error on this appeal.

Dolph, Bellinger, Mallory & Simon, for appellant. J. N. Teal and Sanderson Reed, for respondent.

BEAN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) By section 691, Hill's Code, it is provided that "there shall be no evidence of the contents of a writing, other than the writing itself, except in the following cases: * * * (2) When the original cannot be produced by the party by whom the evidence is offered, in a reasonable time, with proper diligence, and its absence is not owing to his neglect or default." This section is a declaration of the common-law rule. The theory upon which secondary evidence of the contents of a writing is admitted is that the original writing cannot be produced by the party by whom the evidence is offered, within a reasonable time, by the exercise of reasonable diligence. The question is always one of diligence in the effort to procure the original. No precise rule has been or can be laid down as to what shall be considered a reasonable effort, but the party alleging the loss or destruction of the document is expected to show "that he has in good faith exhausted, in a reasonable degree, all the sources of information and means of discovery which the nature of the case would naturally suggest, and which were accessible to him." 1 Greenl. Ev. § 558; Simpson v. Dall, 3 Wall. 460; Johnson v. Arnwine, 42 N. J. Law, 451; Kelsey v. Hanmer, 18 Conn. 310. Thus, in Mariner v. Saunders, 5 Gilman, 117, the court say: "From the nature of the subject there is some difficulty in laying down a general rule defining the extent and vigilance of the search which a party must make before the court may conclude that the paper is destroyed or lost." As a general rule, however, we may say that when, from the ownership, nature, or object of a paper, it has properly a particular place of deposit, or where, from the evidence, it is shown to have been in a particular place, or in particular hands, then that place must be searched by the witness proving the loss, or the person produced into whose hands it has been traced. The extent of the search to be made in such place or by such person must depend in a great degree upon the circumstances. Ordinarily it is not sufficient that the paper is not found in its usual place of deposit, but all papers in the office or place should be examined. On the whole, the court must be satisfied that the paper is destroyed, and cannot be found. It is true the party need not search every possible place where it might be found, for then the search might be interminable, but he must search every place where there is a reasonable probability that it may be found." This rule is founded on reason and justice, and to require any less degree of diligence would be to defeat the object of reducing agreements to writing. As was said in Rankin v. Crow, 19 Ill. 629: "The party wishing to avail himself of the benefit of such secondary evidence should be required to make at least the same effort that is expected the party would make if he were to lose the benefit of the evidence if the instrument were not found." The degree of diligence which shall be considered necessary, in any case, will depend upon the character and importance of the document, and the purposes for which it is expected to be used, and the place where a paper of that kind may naturally be supposed to be found. If the document be a valuable and important one, which the owner would be likely to preserve, a more diligent search will be required than if the document is of little or no value. The purposes for which it is proposed to use it on the trial will also have an important bearing in determining the degree of diligence required. If the cause of action or defense is founded on the supposed writing, the party offering the evidence will be required to show a greater degree of diligence in the attempt to produce the original than if it is desired to be used as evidence in some collateral matter. The proof of search and proof of loss required is always proportionate to the character and value of the paper supposed to be lost. Insurance Co. v. Rosenagle, 77 Pa. St. 514. The existence and contents of the supposed contract, as well as the claim of defendant based upon it, is denied by the plaintiff in the case at bar. The issue thus being joined, its execution and contents were very material to defendant in establishing its defense. Indeed, defendant seeks to exempt itself from liability solely by reason of this contract. It admits having received, as a common carrier, plaintiff's goods, and that while in its possession they were destroyed, but it seeks to escape liability by virtue of this contract. It then became of the utmost importance to both plaintiff and defendant that the original contract, if such a contract was made at all, be produced on the trial, so that there might be no controversy as to its contents, and that the court might declare its legal effect, to the jury. Before defendant should be permitted to give secondary evidence of its contents it should prove that it had exercised the utmost diligence to procure the original, (Smith v. Cox, 9 Or. 327,) and this it failed to do. No competent evidence whatever was offered to prove any search in the office of the traffic manager at Chicago, where it was shown the document was most likely to be found. All that the witness Watts said about the supposed search was clearly hearsay and incompetent evidence. Lawrence v. Fulton, 19 Cal. 683. It did not in any way tend to prove that any effort had been made in the Chicago office to find the original paper. The testimony of the traffic manager, or some person in his office, having the custody of such papers, should have been had, or some proper effort made to obtain it, showing what effort, if any, had been made to find the original.

Indeed, counsel for defendant did not seriously contend that it had brought itself within the rule concerning the admission of secondary evidence, if proof of the loss of the original is required, but he claimed that all that was necessary for defendant to do was to show that the original was in the possession of a person outside of this state, and that no further proof was required; that, when it showed that the original contract was in Chicago, it was entitled to give secondary evidence of its contents without further proof; and in support of his position cites the following authorities: Burton v. Driggs, 20 Wall. 134; Gordon v. Searing, 8 Cal. 49; Beattie v. Hilliard, 55 N. H. 428; Brown v. Woods, 19 Mo. 475; Shepard v. Giddings, 22 Conn. 282; Ralph v. Brown, 8 Watts & S. 395; Gordon v. Tweedy, 74 Ala. 232. The broad doctrine is stated in these authorities that, if books or papers necessary as evidence in a court in one state be in the possession of a person living in another state, secondary evidence, without further showing, may be given to prove the contents of such papers. As we have already said, in effect, each case must largely depend on its own particular circumstances as to what showing is sufficient in order to admit secondary evidence of the contents of a writing, and the language used in the cases above cited must be interpreted in the light of the facts of each case. None of these cases go so far as to hold that where a defendant relies upon the contents of a writing to exempt himself from liability, and both the executi-

and contents of the supposed writing are denied, and the alleged writing is shown to be in the possession of a person outside of the state, secondary evidence of the contents of such writing is admissible unless an effort is made to produce it. And, besides, the doctrine stated in these authorities is denied by authorities of equal weight, and even by some of the same courts. Thus, in Turner v. Yates, 16 How. 14, it was held that proof that an invoice of goods was in London was not a sufficient showing to admit secondary evidence of its contents, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Maryland, the court saying: "If the paper was in the hands of the consignees in London, secondary evidence was not admissible; if as parties, they were entitled to notice to produce the paper; if as third persons, their depositions should have been taken, or some proper attempt made to obtain it." To the same effect are Hoyt v. McNeil, 13 Minn. 394, (Gil. 362;) Dickinson v. Breedon, 25 Ill. 186; McGregor v. Montgomery, 4 Pa. St. 237; Whart. Ev. § 130. The rule laid down in the authorities just cited, we think, is founded on reason and justice, and imposes no hardship on the defendant. By defendant's own showing the last known place of deposit of the contract it claims plaintiff executed was in the office of the traffic manager in Chicago, and the law provides an easy and simple method of taking the deposition of a witness residing out of the state, and his deposition should have been taken or some proper effort made to obtain it. The fact that the person to whose possession the paper was traced resided out of the state did not excuse defendant from a diligent effort to procure it. Judgment of the court below is therefore affirmed.

YICK KEE v. DUNBAR.

VERDICT IN REPLEVIN.

Where, in replevin, the plaintiff alleged that he was the owner of certain personal property, and entitled to its possession, which the defendant wrongfully detained, etc., and, upon issue joined, the jury found that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the property, and assessed its value, etc., but did not pass upon the fact of ownership of the property, held, that the verdict was defective in substance, and that a judgment upon it that the plaintiff was owner is not sustained by the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

A. C. Emmons and W. H. Adams, for appellant. E. Bingham, for respondent.

LORD, J. This was an action in replevin, brought by the plaintiff to recover specific personal property described in his complaint, and of which he alleges his possession and ownership, its value, and the wrongful taking and detention, and his damages by reason thereof. The defendant, by his answer, put in issue all the material matters alleged in the complaint. On the trial the jury found as follows: "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the property described in the complaint, and assess the value thereof at $3,000, and that plaintiff has been damaged by the detention thereof $——." Upon this verdict the court rendered the following judgment: "That plaintiff, Yick Kee, is the owner, and entitled to the immediate possession, of the property described in his complaint, to-wit," etc.; "that the same be forthwith delivered by the defendant, Wm. Dunbar, to said plaintiff, or, in case delivery thereof cannot be had, then said plaintiff have and recover of and from said defendant the sum of three thousand dollars, the value of said books," etc. The point of objection is that the jury did not by their verdict pass upon the ownership of the property, and that the judgment does not conform to the verdict. In replevin the rule is that the verdict should be responsive to and dispose of all the material matters put in issue by the pleadings. A verdict that fails in this respect does not respond to the issues raised, and is defective in substance. Nor can the judgment be broader than the verdict. It must follow the verdict, and cannot properly embrace issues not determined by the jury. The plaintiff in his complaint alleged his title or ownership of the property, and that it was wrongfully taken from his possession, and the defendant traversed these facts by his answer. The effect was to put in issue all the material matters alleged, and the jury should have passed upon these issues. Among these was the fact of ownership or title to the property, which the jury were called upon to try and to determine by their verdict; for, as was said by COLE, J.: "However the case might have been varied had the defendant in error not alleged in the complaint that he owned the property, but merely that he was entitled to the possession of it, etc., which fact had been controverted by the adverse party, and put in issue by the pleadings, still as the title of the property was alleged to be in him, and this, as well as all other facts, denied, how could the question of title be ignored by the jury?" Child v. Child, 18 Wis. 18. In that case, as in the case at bar, the complaint alleged that the plaintiff was the owner of certain personal property which the defendant unlawfully detained, and, upon issue being joined, the jury found that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the property, and assessed its value and damages for its detention, but did not pass upon the question of ownership of the property, and the court held that the verdict was defective in substance, and that a new trial should be awarded, and also that the judgment that the plaintiff was the owner of the property is not sustained by the verdict. The same doctrine was subsequently declared by Dixon, C. J., in Apleton v. Barrett, 22 Wis. 569, as follows: "The title of the property, as well as the right of possession, was in issue by the pleadings. The jury have found only that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the property specified in the verdict. The issue as to the title is undetermined. In actions of replevin both parties are considered actors. It may be that the title to the property was in the defendant, the plaintiff having only the present right of possession. The question of title, therefore, is, or it may be, one of much interest to the defendant, and he is entitled to have it settled in this action. The verdict being in this respect defective, the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial awarded." The same principle has been recognized and declared by this court. In Phipps v. Taylor, 15 Or. 487, 16 Pac. Rep. 171, STRAHAN, J., said: "But this verdict is insufficient for another reason. By the complaint the plaintiffs claimed to be the owners of the lumber in controversy, as well as to be entitled to its possession. The verdict is silent as to the ownership of the property, and that issue remains undetermined. In such case, no judgment can be rendered for the plaintiffs." Nor is there anything decided in the case of Corbell v. Childers, (Or.) 21 Pac. Rep. 671, inconsistent or in conflict with the principle thus declared. In that case the plaintiff alleged title to the property in himself, and the jury found "for the plaintiff," and that "he was entitled to the immediate return and possession of the property described in the complaint," etc.; and STRAHAN, J., said: "In this case the verdict is 'for the plaintiff,' and that he 'is entitled to the immediate return and possession' of the property described in the complaint, and then the property and its value is set out. To exact a greater degree of particularity would be to go beyond the requirements of the statute, which I do not think we could properly do." This verdict was responsive to the issues raised, and disposed of all the material matters which the jury were called upon to try and determine. While it would be more formal and specific, and perhaps more desirable, that the verdict should find the right of ownership and the right of possession, value, etc., yet a finding "for the plaintiff" is equivalent to finding the issues in favor of the plaintiff, which STRAHAN, J., thought within the terms of the statute, and should be upheld. Necessarily, such a verdict included the right of possession as well as the ownership of the property, as both facts were put in issue by the pleadings. In this view, the general verdict, responding to the issues raised, rendered it unnecessary to express a finding upon each averment. And so the authorities run. In Krause v. Cutting, 28 Wis. 655, it was held that a general verdict "for the plaintiff" finds all the issues in his favor. As in replevin, where both his title and his right of possession are in issue, a verdict "in favor of the plaintiff," assessing the value and damages for detention, determines that he is the owner, and entitled to the possession. So, in Payne v. June, 92 Ind. 257, the verdict was: "We, the jury, find for the plaintiff, and that the engine in controversy is of the value of $600, and is in possession of the defendants;" and the court said: "The alleged defects are that the verdict does not find that the plaintiffs are the owners and entitled to the possession of the engine. The general finding for the plaintiffs was a finding of both these facts:" citing Rowan v. Teague, 24 Ind. 304; Crocker v. Hoffman, 48 Ind. 207. So that there is nothing decided in the case of Corbell v. Childers, supra, which can lend any support to sustain the verdict in the case at bar. Here there is no finding "for the plaintiff," so as to cover the issues raised, but a finding that he is entitled to the possession of the property, when the issues required the jury to pass upon the fact of ownership or title to the property, and upon which the verdict is silent and undetermined. As such, the verdict is defective in substance, and upon this point the judgment is not sustained by the verdict, as it embraces issues not determined by the verdict of the jury. It results that the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PORTLAND NAT. BANK V. SCOTT.

PROMISSORY NOTE — CONTEMPORANEOUS PAROL AGREEMENT—NATIONAL BANKS—ILLEGAL LOANS.

1. In an action upon a promissory note, where no illegality or fraud is charged, it is not competent to allege or prove a contemporaneous parol agreement, for the purpose of changing, varying, or in any manner altering the legal effect of such promissory note.

2. The construction of a statute of the United States by the supreme court of the United States is binding upon the state courts.

3. A loan made by a national bank to an association or person of a greater amount or proportion than is permitted by this section does not render the security taken for such loan void.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

This action is founded upon three several promissory notes made by the defendant to the plaintiff. The complaint is in the usual form. The answer, in effect, admits the execution and delivery of the notes, but denies there is anything due thereon. The answer, for a further and separate defense, then alleges that at the time of the execution of said notes, and each of them, it was understood and agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant and the Portland & Willamette Valley Railway Company, a corporation, in consideration of the execution and delivery of said notes by the defendant, that the said plaintiff would and should look to the said Portland & Willamette Valley Railway Company for the payment thereof, the latter named corporation having received the entire consideration upon which said notes were made, and would not and should not charge, or seek to charge or hold, this defendant liable in any manner on either of said promissory notes. The answer contains a further defense, as follows: "That the said notes were signed by the defendant upon the procurement and at the instigation of one William Reid, then and now president of the plaintiff corporation, and then president of a railway corporation known as the 'Portland & Willamette Valley Railway Company.' That said railway company, at the time of the execution of said notes, owed large sums of money to said bank and divers persons, and that under the laws and the national bank act mentioned in complaint, and the rules of the treasury department of the United States, plaintiff was not permitted and could not loan further sums of money to said railway company upon notes signed directly by the said railway company, or otherwise; and for the purpose of contravening and violating said laws and rules, and deceiving the government of the United States, and its national bank examiners, and the stockholders of said bank, the said William Reid, as such president, conspiring and colluding with intent to so contravene and violate the law and said rules, and deceive the said government of the United States, and said bank examiners and stockholders, falsely and fraudulently procured the defendant to execute said notes, the consideration therein named being paid to the said Portland & Willamette Valley Railway Company, with the understanding and agreement, in consideration of the execution of said notes by the defendant, that defendant was not to be liable thereon for any sum or amount whatever." To these separate defenses the plaintiff demurred, which demurrer was sustained by the court, and final judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, from which this appeal is taken.

W. T. Muir, for appellant. C. J. McDougall, for respondent.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) This record presents but two questions, both arising upon the plaintiff's demurrer to the new matter contained in the defendant's answer.

1. The first separate defense pleaded presents the question whether or not, where there is no allegation of illegality or fraud, a contemporaneous parol agreement may be pleaded as a defense to an action on these notes, which shows that by the terms of such agreement the notes were never to be paid by the maker; in other words, whether or not, in such case, it is competent to vary and contradict the writing by a separate parol agreement made at the time the notes sued on were signed. The law is too well settled in such case to admit of any doubt, at least in this court. Hoxie v. Hodges, 1 Or. 251; Lee v. Summers, 2 Or. 280; Smith v. Caro, 9 Or. 278; Looney v. Rankin, 15 Or. 617, 16 Pac. Rep. 680; Beesley v. Crossen, 16 Or. 72, 17 Pac. Rep. 577; Stoddard v. Nelson, 17 Or. 417, 21 Pac. Rep. 456. Under these authorities it was not error in the trial court to sustain a demurrer to the defendant's first separate defense.

2. The second separate defense presents the question whether or not the contract made with William Reid, president of the plaintiff corporation, is sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's action. This depends on the construction to be given to section 5200, Rev. St. U. S., which is as follows: "The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm, for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such association actually paid in. But the discount of the bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, and the discount of business or commercial paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same, shall not be considered as money borrowed." This statute has been construed by the federal courts, and their construction is binding on us, for the same reasons that our construction of the constitution and statutes of this state is binding upon the federal courts. In deciding the question presented, then, we have only to ascertain what construction this statute has received in the federal courts. In Wyman v. Bank, 29 Fed. Rep. 734, it was held that, when a bank organized under this statute violates this provision by lending to one person an amount in excess of the limit, such person cannot set up the violation of the statute as a defense to his liability on the note. If a penalty is to be enforced against the bank, it can be done only at the instance of the government. A contract entered into by the bank in violation of this section is not void. And in Gold Min. Co. v. National Bank, 96 U. S. 440, in passing upon the identical question now before us, the court said: "We do not think that public policy requires, or that congress intended, that an excess of loans beyond the proportion specified should enable the borrower to avoid the payment of the money actually received by him. This would be to injure the interests of creditors, stockholders, and all who have an interest in the safety and prosperity of the bank. We are of the opinion that this objection is not well taken." The same construction prevails in the state courts. O'Hare v. Bank, 77 Pa. St. 96; Bank v. Perry, (Iowa,) 33 N. W. Rep. 341. And in cases strongly akin to these in principle the same doctrine has been applied. Pangborn v. Westlake, 36 Iowa, 546; Vining v. Bricker, 14 Ohio St. 331. We are therefore of the opinion that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer to the second separate defense pleaded in the defendant's answer. Finding no error in the judgment appealed from, the same must be affirmed.

HUMMELL v. SEVENTH STREET TERRACE CO.

NEGLIGENCE—INJURY TO ADJOINING OWNER.

1. A party, in the exercise of a right upon his own land which involves danger to the property of his neighbor, is bound to provide against such by all reasonable prudence and care.

2. Where a defendant undertakes to construct a retaining wall on his own land which materially increases the risk of the adjoining property to land-slides, he is bound to exercise his right in a way not to expose the property of the plaintiff to any risks which might be provided against by the exercise of ordinary diligence, which would require that the defendant in its construction should take into account or anticipate such storms or rain-falls as might reasonably be expected to occur.

3. No weakness or defect in such wall, caused by the negligence of the defendant, or which the exercise of ordinary care and skill would have avoided in its construction, although combined with the act of God, would excuse liability for damage to the adjoining property.

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; E. D. SHATTUCK, Judge.

This was an action to recover damages from the defendant for negligence in the construction of a certain retaining wall and road-way upon its property above the plaintiff, whereby his fruit-trees and buildings were injured, and his land covered with a large amount of rock and other débris by the sliding down of the same, etc. The defendant, after denying the negligence alleged, or any fault in the construction of such wall and road-way, as a separate answer and defense, averred that such wall and road-way were properly constructed upon its lands, and capable of resisting all ordinary weather, and such storms as could have been reasonably anticipated, and that the carrying away of the same, and the damages, arose from vis major, namely, an unprecedented rainfall and storm, lasting several days, and doing great damage throughout the state. The denial putting in issue the new matter alleged as a defense, a trial was had, resulting in a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff, from which this appeal is taken.

C. J. McDougall and C. H. Carey, for appellant. Killen, Starr & Thomas, for respondent.

LORD, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The errors assigned relate wholly to exceptions to the charge of the court. The charge, certified to us, consists of a series of instructions, submitting the whole question of negligence to the jury, to each one of which an exception was reserved. The criticisms of the argument were directed mainly to the first, third, and fifth instructions, which examined separately, or as isolated propositions, one of them, at least, would need to be qualified and explained. As it is the duty of the jury to consider all the instructions together, when the record discloses that an instruction in the series, although not stating the law correctly, is qualified or explained by others, so that the jury will not be likely to be misled, the error will be obviated. Anderson v. Walter, 34 Mich. 113. Thus in the case of Losee v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 492, EARL, C., said: "We must look at the whole charge, and judge of it from its whole scope, and if, taking it altogether, it presented the question of law fairly to the jury so as not to mislead them, exceptions to separate propositions in it, or to detached portions of it, will not be upheld." So that, upon a record like this, if the charge as a whole conveyed to the jury the correct rule of law applicable to the question to be determined by them, the judgment will not be reversed because some one of them fails to state the law correctly, or with sufficient qualification, when the defects are cured by other instructions. The plaintiff owned lands adjacent to and lying below the land of the defendant. To make it desirable for building sites, the defendant constructed a road-way winding about it, with a view to subdivide and terrace it. At one place the road-way passed directly above the land of the plaintiff, and to support the embankment, and to prevent the road-way from washing out, the defendant built a retaining wall. The giving way of this wall, and the injury consequent thereto to the adjacent property, as arising from its negligent construction, is the foundation of the action. Incorporated in the bill of exceptions enough of the evidence has been set forth to show the applicability of the instructions to the facts in issue, and the sense in which they must have been understood by the jury. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that the retaining wall, which was about 16 feet high, was built of boulders and rock of inferior quality. "There was rotten bed-rock, good sound rock, and honey-comb rock, which would crumble as soon as the air and weather struck it, built in the wall, which was the cause of its coming down. When the rain came, the honey-comb stone melted, and the coarse heavy stone came down, and the weight from behind pushed it out. The terrace did not give way. The wall fell down itself. The wall crumbled out. These rocks rolled and fell down on the place that the president of the defendant company was notified that it was being insecurely built; that a slide took place when the defendant was building the road," etc. The evidence for the defendant tended to show that "nothing but good rock was put into the wall;" that there was "instructions given to the foreman to use nothing but rock, and the best men that could be got;" that there was "one man that had done some bad work, but that, when the foreman's attention was called to it, it was taken out and replaced in a substantial manner;" "that the company desired the best wall that could be made, and spared no money to make the best wall;" "that the rotten stone spoken of was put behind the wall for filling, and not in the wall;" "that an engineer was employed to oversee the work, a man of a great deal of skill and ability, and that the work was built under his instructions." The evidence further proceeds to show how the work was done, and the material used, and that it was done substantially, and to the satisfaction of the son of the plaintiff, who seemed to act for his father, etc., that, immediately before the wall was carried away, an extraordinary storm raged for several days, causing land-slides and bridges to be washed out all over the country, and causing the washout of the top of the wall, etc., and the injury to the adjoining property of the plaintiff. The first instruction of which error is assigned charges the jury that "the plaintiff had the right to require of the defendant that it should not, by any structures, or any acts which it did upon its own land, materially increase his risk, or his liability to injury from the sliding down of the soil upon his land." The point of the objection is that the wall was a lawful structure, though it may have materially increased the risk, but if it was not negligently constructed and maintained the defendant is not liable. It will be noted that the objection admits liability, if the injury from the falling of the wall was caused by its negligent construction. Conceding this objection to be well taken, it is plainly cured of the defects complained of by the instruction which immediately succeeds, and is designed to apply directly to the facts of the case. This instruction is that "the defendant, in making a road-way, or in putting structures on its land, was required to so conduct itself as not to expose the plaintiff to any risk which might be provided against by ordinary diligence. It should build its walls or construct its road-way so as to stand firm during all such storms as usually come, and such unusual storms as might be reasonably expected sometimes to occur." The phraseology of this last clause might be subjected to a technical criticism, and pronounced not strictly accurate, but its meaning is obvious, and could not have misled the jury. This instruction casts upon the owner the duty of seeing that reasonable care and skill shall be employed in the construction of such wall and road-way upon its land, when it involves any danger or risk to the adjoining property. The company was bound to provide against such risk by the exercise of all reasonable prudence and care. In constructing its wall and road-way, the defendant was bound to exercise its right in a way not to expose the plaintiff to any risk which might be provided against by the exercise of ordinary diligence; that this would require of the defendant in the construction of its retaining wall to anticipate and provide against such storms or rain-falls as might reasonably be expected to occur. The instruction does not assert that the defendant was bound to provide against extraordinary or unprecedented storms, such as could not be reasonably anticipated, but only to make provision for such as might reasonably be expected to happen, which would involve taking into consideration the locality and the nature or character of the storms which have previously occurred.

As the putting up of such a structure involved risk to the adjacent owner, the instruction declares, in terms, that ordinary diligence required that the defendant build its retaining wall strong enough to meet the exigency of any storm which might reasonably be expected to occur; and as a consequence, if it did so, it would not be liable for an injury to the property of such adjoining owner, arising from the insufficiency or failure of the retaining wall to resist the pressure of an extraordinary storm, such as could not be reasonably anticipated. Now, taking the instructions together, they announce the principle that, when an owner on his own land builds or erects any wall or structure which materially increases the risks to a neighboring owner, he is bound to exert all reasonable diligence and care to prevent injury or damage to such adjoining owner from such risk; that, as the facts show these risks mainly to be from landslides in times of storms or rain-falls, the exercise of reasonable diligence and care require that the wall or structure should be so built or constructed as to avoid all injuries or damage likely to happen from such storms or rain-falls as might reasonably be anticipated. So that when the first instruction and second instruction are read together, or the former in the light of the latter, with reference to the facts, the plain and obvious meaning is that the plaintiff had no right to build a wall or structure without making some provision against the risk to which it exposed the adjacent property; that the rule of law requires that the defendant exercise reasonable diligence in the construction of such wall, so as to avoid the risk to which it exposed the property of the plaintiff, and, as a consequence, if the company did not take some such precautions, or built its wall negligently and insufficient to resist the pressure of storms or rain-falls likely to happen, and which might be reasonably expected, it would be liable. It results that these instructions recognize the right of the defendant to erect such structures upon its land, provided the company exercises reasonable care and skill in their construction to avoid liability to damage to the adjacent property, and, as a consequence in such case, the law imposes no liability.

The next objection is directed to the third and fifth instructions, and the criticism is that they only recognize the excuse of vis major in case the wall had no weakness or defect therein which contributed to produce the injury complained of. The third instruction, after stating that the act of God excuses liability, if the storm was irresistible, and such as no reasonable man of experience and acquaintance in the country and with the action of the elements would have expected to occur, states that it "would be an excuse for the defendant in the construction of its works, if it so constructed its works as that no weakness or defects therein contributed with the act of God to produce the result complained of." It is insisted that the words "no weakness or defect" in the wall or structure mean any weakness or defect, however slight or fanciful or speculative, or which may have in the least degree caused the injury; that the effect of this instruction is to require the construction of the wall to be so perfect that no weakness or defect therein, no matter how slight or remote, was discoverable therein, even by the test of vis major, or the defendant was liable; that if a slight defect existed, no matter how remote the cause, the defendant would be liable, though ordinary prudence could not have provided against the risk or injury. It must be admitted, if the instruction is susceptible of this construction, viewed in the light of the issue and the facts to which it was directed, it is inconsistent with the theory of the law as declared in the preceding instructions. The evidence for the plaintiff tended to show that the wall was negligently constructed, and of inferior material, and so insecure and insufficient as to be incapable of resisting such storms as could have been reasonably anticipated. In the preceding instructions the court had charged the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to exercise reasonable care and skill in the construction of its wall, to prevent injury to the adjacent property of the plaintiff, and that this duty, which the law imposed, required the defendant to build the wall strong and firm enough to encounter the pressure of such storms as might reasonably be expected to occur. If the defendant neglected to build the wall in a way and of material which was calculated to resist the pressure of such storms as might reasonably be expected to happen, it neglected to provide against the risks to which its structures exposed the property of the plaintiff, and was guilty of negligence and a want of ordinary care,—not remote or speculative negligence, but actual negligence in failing to do what the law required of the defendant, namely, that a party, in the exercise of a right upon his own land which involves danger to the property of his neighbor, is bound to provide against such danger by all reasonable prudence and care. To this extent the defendant must perform its duty before it can claim exemption from the act of God. It is clear, then, that the weakness and defect in the wall of which the instruction required it to be free was such as was caused by negligence, and against which the defendant was bound to provide in the first instance by ordinary diligence. In other words, "no weakness and defect" arising from the negligence of the defendant in the construction of the wall, combined with the act of God in producing the injury, could relieve the defendant, upon the excuse of vis major, from liability. As the defendant's act created the risk, it must perform its duty in the first instance by providing against it to the extent of ordinary diligence; and if it fail to do it, and a defect in the wall is the result, that defect is caused by its negligence, and it is not in a condition to invoke vis major against the plaintiff. It was the diligence and care and skill required in the construction of the wall under the circumstances, and the consequence of defect and weakness therein from negligence or a want of ordinary care, that was the subject under consideration in connection with the act of God. This being so, "no weakness and defect" in the wall could have been referred to or meant, except such as were caused by the negligence of the defendant, or its failure to observe ordinary care in the construction of the wall; and consequently the instruction cannot mean or include defects in the wall which may arise or exist where ordinary care and diligence has been observed. It is "defect and weakness" which the exercise of ordinary care would have avoided, and ought not to be present and exist when the act of God occurs. The court was not instructing about any weakness or defect in the wall which might exist despite the exercise of ordinary care and skill, or which ordinary prudence could not provide against; but such as was caused by the negligence of the defendant, and which the exercise of ordinary care would have avoided. The words, therefore, in the instruction, "no weakness and defect therein," mean "no weakness and defect" in the wall which the exercise of ordinary care and skill in its construction could have prevented, contributing, with the act of God, in producing the injury complained of, could relieve the defendant, upon the excuse of vis major, from liability for such injury. It is weakness and defect in the wall, caused by the negligence of the defendant in its construction, to which the instructions refer as a producing cause of the injury, and which cannot be reckoned as remote or fanciful or speculative negligence. This view disposes of the construction suggested, and the legal inferences drawn from it, and declares the law in conformity with the contention of counsel for the appellant, and in no event, if properly applied to the facts by the jury, can work the defendant any wrong or injustice. The same view applies to the fifth instruction: "If this damage occurred by the negligence and want of proper care of the defendant, united with the act of God, the defendant is liable therefor;" that is, if the damage to the plaintiff is caused by a defect due to the negligence of the defendant, or which the exercise of ordinary care would have avoided in the construction of the wall, united with the act of God, the defendant is liable therefor. The jury were instructed that they must find that the loss or injury would have happened without such defect or negligence,—without such producing cause,—"in order to make the defense—the act of God—an excuse in this case." Upon the defendant's phase of the evidence, in respect to the care and skill employed in the construction of the work, the fourth instruction was full and explicit. It is true, although excepted to, it was not criticised, but passed by at the argument and in the brief. It illustrates the care of the learned judge below to present the law properly and correctly, so as to guard and protect the rights of all concerned. The jury were instructed that if the defendant had done all that a reasonable man could have done in the employment of a competent and skillful engineer and other employees to do the work, and that they have put their knowledge and skill into exercise for the proper construction of the work, "that would be an excuse that would exonerate the defendant from liability for the defects of the work and negligence of these employees." The record discloses that the jury were permitted to view the locus in quo, and with the evidence before them, and the law as declared by the court, we do not see how they could err, or, if they did, how we could correct it. The judgment must be affirmed.

MOONEY v. DETRICK. (No. 12,551.)

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE—EFFECT.

Section 37 of the insolvent act of California provides that all debts existing at the time of the adjudication of insolvency, though not payable until a future time, may be proved against the estate of the debtor. Section 40 provides for the allowance of contingent claims at their present value. Section 58 provides that the discharge shall release the debtor from all debts and liabilities which were or might have been proved against his estate. Held, that the discharge in insolvency is a bar to an action for breach of a contract of hiring for a definite period, even as to money which became due thereon after the filing of the petition in insolvency and after the discharge. SHARPSTEIN and THORNTON, JJ., dissenting. Kellogg & King, for appellant. Dorn & Dorn, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action for the recovery of money alleged to be due plaintiff from defendants under a contract between them, to the following effect: Plaintiff having sold and assigned a patent-right to defendants, in consideration thereof promised to serve said defendants in and about their business for the term of five years from the 1st day of January, 1881; and the defendants agreed to employ the plaintiff during said entire period of five years, and to pay him for every day of his employment, Sundays and holidays excepted, the sum of four and one-half dollars. Pursuant to the terms of said agreement, defendants employed plaintiff in and about their business constantly, and paid him in full therefor until the 1st day of March, 1884. Since March 1, 1884, defendants have failed and refused to give plaintiff employment, except for the space of 106 days, and refused to pay plaintiff anything more than $654 under the contract. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants for the sum of $1,333.40, interest and costs. Defendants' motion for a new trial was overruled, and from that order and the judgment this appeal is taken by defendant Detrick. The defendants, in their answer, allege that as a firm and individually they and each of them were on the 1st of July, 1884, discharged of and from all debts, liabilities, and claims whatever except such as were by the insolvent laws excepted from their operation, and that the claim sued on in this action is not one of the claims so excepted. The petition of the defendants as a firm and individuals was filed on the 28th day of February, 1884, and the plaintiff's cause of action, if any, has accrued since that date. The discharge and proceedings leading up to it are well pleaded, and the allegations of the defendants in relation thereto are admitted by the plaintiff to be true. The plaintiff presented his claim against the defendants to the assignee in insolvency, and he refused to allow it; whereupon plaintiff applied to the court in which the insolvency proceedings were pending for leave to sue the assignee, but such application was denied.

Section 37 of the insolvent act provides that "all debts due and payable from a debtor at the time of the adjudication of insolvency, and all debts then existing, but not payable until a future time, * * * may be proved against the estate of the debtor." Section 40 provides that "in all cases of contingent debts and liabilities contracted by the debtor, and not herein otherwise provided for, the creditor may make claim therefor, and have his claim allowed, with the right to share in the dividends if the contingency shall happen before the order for the final dividend, or he may at any time apply to the court to have the present value of the debt or liability ascertained and liquidated;" and section 53 provides that "a discharge * * * shall release the debtor from all claims, debts, liabilities, and demands set forth in his schedule, or which were or might have been proved against his estate." We think that under these provisions of the insolvent act the plaintiff's claim against the insolvents was barred by the discharge in insolvency. It is admitted that the defendants complied with all the provisions of the act. A personal covenant creates certainly a "liability," if not a "debt," within the meaning of the act. If the assignment had been made for an annuity payable during the remainder of the life of the plaintiff, the obligation would be discharged by the discharge in insolvency. Heywood v. Shreve, 44 N. J. Law, 94. In this case there was no continuing benefit direct to the insolvents, such as would constitute a consideration and a new debt. The benefit went to the assignee, and through him whatever advantages the defendants had gained under the contract passed to the creditors, for the patents became the assets of the estate, and no services thereafter were rendered by the plaintiff. In cases of lease, where the occupancy is by the insolvent, he, and not his creditors, derives the benefit subsequent to bankruptcy. In such case the discharge will not bar a recovery. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

MEYER v. BROWN et al. (No. 8,896.)¹

MANDAMUS TO COMPEL TAX LEVY.

1. Act Cal. April 24, 1853, consolidating the city and county of Sacramento, provided for "liquidating, funding, and paying" the outstanding debts of the old city government by the issuance of interest-bearing bonds. To pay the accruing interest and redeem the bonds, 55 per cent. of the city revenue was set aside as a sinking fund, and the board of supervisors of the new consolidated government was required to levy an annual tax of 100 cents on the $100 for municipal purposes. Held, that the surrender of their claims by the creditors of the old city government, and their acceptance of the bonds issued by the new consolidated government on the faith of the above provisions for their payment, constituted a contract between the creditors and the consolidated government which cannot be affected by subsequent legislation, and that mandamus would issue on the application of the bondholders to compel the levy of the taxes by the legal successor of the consolidated city and county.

2. The fact that the bonds were issued by the officers of the consolidated government in payment of claims which they knew to be illegal will not effect the validity of the bonds in the hands of bona fide holders, as the only question in such case is as to the power of the municipality to issue them.

In bank. On application for mandamus.

Daniel Meyer, the petitioner, is the holder of certain bonds issued by the city and county of Sacramento. He made this application to compel defendants, John Q. Brown and others, trustees of the city of Sacramento, which was created the legal successor of the city and county of Sacramento, to levy a tax for the payment of the bonds. Defendants demurred to the petition.

Ross, J. On the 27th day of February, 1850, the legislature of the state passed an act, by which it was declared that all that tract of land lying within certain designated limits should thereafter be known by the name of "Sacramento City," for the government of which there should be a mayor, recorder, and council, to consist of nine members, one of whom should be elected president; that the mayor, recorder, and councilmen should be a body politic and corporate by the name and style of "The Mayor, Recorder, and Common Council of Sacramento City," and by that name they and their successors should be known in law, have perpetual succession, sue and be sued in all courts, and in all actions whatsoever, etc. St. 1850, p. 70 et seq. By an act passed March 26, 1851, the legislature declared that the same territory should thereafter be known by the name of "The City of Sacramento," for the government of which there should be a mayor, recorder, and council, to consist of nine members; that the mayor, recorder, and councilmen should be a body politic and corporate by the name and style of "The Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento," and by that name they and their successors should be known in law, have perpetual succession, sue and be sued, in all courts and actions whatsoever, etc. By the seventh section of the act last mentioned the council was, among other things, given power to cause the streets to be cleaned and repaired; to provide for the making and improving of sidewalks; to lay out, extend, alter, or widen streets and alleys; to alter, improve, keep, and repair, and have full control of the levee; to establish and regulate a police, to be subject to the supervision of the mayor; to make appropriations for any object of city expenditure; to erect and maintain poor-houses and hospitals for the support of the indigent, sick, and insane; to prevent the introduction and spreading of diseases; to erect, repair, and regulate wharves; to provide for the prevention and extinguishment of fires, etc. On the 24th of April, 1853, the legislature passed an act consolidating the city and county governments, the first and second sections of which are as follows: "Section 1. For the government of that territory now known as 'The City and County of Sacramento,' there shall be a board of supervisors; and the said board of supervisors and their successors in office shall be a body politic and corporate under the name and style of 'The City and County of Sacramento,' and by that name they shall be known in law; may make, have, keep, alter, and renew a common seal, different and distinct from the seal of the county clerk; shall have perpetual succession; may sue in all courts, and in all actions whatsoever; may, under the limitations hereinafter provided, purchase and hold real estate or personal property, and receive and hold the same by legacy or donation for the city and county, or in trust for the use of public schools, or the fire department, or for a poor-house and indigent sick; and they may do all such other things, and exercise all such other powers as by this act or by any other law are or may be granted or allowed to them to do; but the city and county shall not be sued in any action whatever; nor shall any of its lands, buildings, improvements, property, franchises, taxes, revenues, actions, choses in actions, and effects be subject to any attachment, levy, or sale, or any process whatever, either mesne or final. Sec. 2. The city and county of Sacramento is hereby made and constituted the successor of the corporation by this act dissolved, and heretofore known as 'The Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento.' The lands, public and private buildings, property, rights of property, actions, rights of actions, moneys, revenues, income, and trust now vested in or belonging or in any wise appertaining to the corporation known as 'The Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento,' are hereby transferred to and vested in, and are declared to appertain and belong to the city and county of Sacramento, as hereinafter provided." Sections 37, 38, 34, and 35 of the consolidation act are as follows: "Sec. 37. For the purpose of liquidating, funding, and paying the claims against the city and county of Sacramento, hereinafter specified, the treasurer shall cause to be prepared suitable bonds of the county of Sacramento, not exceeding the sum of six hundred thousand dollars, and for the city of Sacramento, not exceeding the sum of one million six hundred thousand dollars, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum from the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine, and payable at the office of the treasurer. Said claims shall be funded in the order of their reception; shall, in the order of reception, be entitled to the shortest time, and one-fourth of the whole amount made payable on the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-eight; one-fourth on the first day of February, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three; one-fourth on the first of February, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight; and the balance on the first of February, one thousand nine hundred and three. The interest on said bonds shall be made payable at the office of the treasurer on the first day of January of each year. Said bonds shall be signed by the president of the board of supervisors, countersigned by the clerk of the board of supervisors, and indorsed by the treasurer, and shall have the seal of the city and county affixed thereto. Coupons for the interest shall be attached to each bond, so that they may be removed without injury to the bond. Said coupons, consecutively numbered, shall be signed by the treasurer. It shall be the duty of the book-keeper of the city and county and the treasurer each to keep a separate record of all bonds issued, showing the number, date, and amount of each bond, to whom issued, upon what claim, and its amount; and none of the claims herein specified shall be liquidated or paid except in the manner herein provided. Sec. 33. The following claims shall be received and funded under the provisions of this act: First. All legal debts or liabilities against the county of Sacramento, which may be unpaid and unprovided for by this act on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine. The annual interest and principal of all bonds issued for claims mentioned in this section shall be paid from the interest and sinking fund, as provided in section 36, and in the manner otherwise provided in this act. Second. All legal debts or liabilities against the city of Sacramento, which may be paid and unprovided for by this act on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine. The annual interest and principal of all bonds issued for claims against said city shall be paid from the interest and sinking fund, provided in section 35, and in the manner otherwise provided in this act." "Sec. 34. The board of supervisors shall not have power to levy any greater taxes than as follows, viz.: On the real and personal estate, except such as is exempt by law, throughout the city and county, a tax of one hundred cents on the one hundred dollars; such state taxes as the laws may require; and, in addition thereto, they shall levy, for municipal purposes, on all real and personal property within the city limits, except as is exempt by law, a tax of one hundred cents on the one hundred dollars; also a tax for road purposes, of five cents on the one hundred dollars on the property outside the city limits. All of which taxes shall be levied and collected strictly in accordance with the revenue laws of the state, except as may be otherwise provided in this act: provided, that nothing contained in this section shall prevent the board of supervisors from levying, in addition, a tax in accordance with an act passed February, [March,] one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, entitled 'An act to amend an act passed April twenty-seventh, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, entitled "An act to submit to the people of the counties of Sacramento and El Dorado a proposition for the construction of a wagon road."' Sec. 35. The revenue derived from and within the city limits for municipal purposes, viz., taxes, licenses, harbor dues, water-rents, and fines collected in the mayor's court or otherwise, when paid into the treasury, shall be set apart and appropriated as follows: Fifty-five per cent. to an interest and sinking fund, which shall be applied to the payment of the annual interest and the final redemption of bonds issued for city indebtedness in accordance with the provisions of this act; fifteen per cent. to a salary fund, which shall be applied to the payment of the salaries of municipal officers as provided in this act; eight per cent. to a school fund, which shall be applied to the support of schools within the city limits; and the balance—twenty-two per cent.—to a fund to be used for all such necessary municipal expenses as are not otherwise provided for in this section, and shall be called the 'contingent fund.'

By the second section of the act of consolidation all of the property and rights theretofore belonging or pertaining to the corporation known as "The Mayor and Common Council of the City of Sacramento" were vested in and declared to appertain and belong to the consolidated government. But in dissolving the old city government and transferring all of its property and rights to a new corporation the legislature did not forget that there were outstanding claims against the old one. Recognizing that fact, it made provision in and by the act of consolidation for "liquidating, funding, and paying" those claims. Suitable bonds were directed to be prepared for the city of Sacramento, not exceeding $1,600,000, with interest coupons at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable on the 1st day of January of each year, with which the legal claims against the old city government were to be paid and discharged. To pay the interest as it should accrue and to redeem the bonds it was provided by the act of consolidation that 55 per cent. of the revenue derived from and within the city limits for municipal purposes—that is to say, taxes, licenses, harbor dues, water-rents, and fines collected—should be set apart and appropriated to an interest and sinking fund, which should be applied to the payment of the annual interest and the final redemption of the bonds; and the governing body of the consolidated government, viz., the board of supervisors, was required to levy for municipal purposes, on all real and personal property within the city limits, except such as is exempt by law, a tax of 100 cents on the $100. Having thus made provision for the payment annually of the interest on the bonds, and ultimately for their redemption, the legislature offered them in payment of the legal claims against the old city government. The offer was accepted, and the holders of the latter surrendered their claims, in consideration of which the consolidated government issued to them its bonds, pursuant to the provisions of the act. The bonds carried with them the pledge of an annual tax for municipal purposes on all real and personal property within the city limits, except such as is exempt by law, of 100 cents on the $100, 55 per cent. of which to be set apart and appropriated to an interest and sinking fund, to be applied to the payment of the annual interest upon the bonds, and to their final redemption. The tax was the chief security offered the creditors as an inducement to accept the bonds in payment of their claims. When the bonds for whose payment, with interest, provision was thus made, were issued and accepted by the creditors of the old city government, a contract was made, as solemn and binding, and as much beyond subsequent legislation, as it would have been if made between private persons. These views will be found sustained and amplified in an able opinion recently rendered by the supreme court of the United States in a case entitled Louisiana v. Pilsbury, reported in 105 U. S. 278. It is well occasionally to recall the fact that there is no more reason to permit a municipal government to repudiate its solemn obligations entered into for value than there is to permit an individual to do so. Good faith and fair dealing should be exacted of the one equally with the other.

Some minor objections are made to the petition, which is for a writ of mandate compelling the city authorities to levy the tax referred to, none of which, in our opinion, are well taken. Demurrer overruled, and defendants allowed 10 days within which to answer.

ON THE MERITS.

(June 4, 1884.)

PER CURIAM. We are satisfied with the opinion delivered when this case was considered on demurrer to the petition. (The preceding opinion, by Mr. Justice Ross.) The views then expressed are decisive of the case as now presented in favor of the petitioner. It is therefore ordered that a writ of mandate issue to the municipality and its authorities annually to levy and collect for municipal purposes on all real and personal property within the city limits, except such as is exempt by law, a tax of 100 cents on the $100, and that 55 per cent. of the revenue thus derived within the city limits for municipal purposes be set apart and appropriated to an interest and sinking fund, to be applied to the annual interest and final redemption of the bonds issued for the city indebtedness, in accordance with the act of the legislature of the state, adopted April 24, 1888.

ON MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

(Sept. 10, 1884.)

PER CURIAM. This is a motion for a new trial. At the trial before the referee defendants offered to prove facts which it is claimed would have shown that certain of the bonds described in the complaint herein, the payment of which is sought to be enforced by the mandate of this court, were issued in consideration of the surrender of bonds purporting to represent indebtedness of the city of Sacramento, which bonds (last named) had been illegally issued, and did not constitute valid claims against the said city. It is contended by the defendants that the referee erred in rejecting the evidence offered. We deem it unnecessary to inquire whether, assuming the facts to be as implied by the defendants' offer of evidence, the bonds in lieu of which the bonds in suit were issued were invalid. True, the act of 1858 (St. 1858, p. 280) provided that all "legal" claims might be funded, but, as we understand the provisions of that act, the president of the board of supervisors, the clerk of the board, and the treasurer were authorized to determine, on the behalf of the city and county of Sacramento, the legality of each claim presented, and, if satisfied of its legality, to issue a bond or bonds therefor. Even if the evidence offered would have shown that the officers mentioned violated their duty by deciding some claims to be legal which they knew were illegal, there was no offer to prove that the claims alleged to be the consideration for the bonds sought to be enforced by this proceeding were presented by plaintiff, or that any of such bonds issued to him. There is no averment in the answer, nor is there any finding in the record, or any evidence tending to prove, that plaintiff is other than a holder bona fide of the bonds. The bonds recite that they were issued in accordance with the law of 1858. They and the coupons attached are signed and authenticated, as required by that law. They are exactly such bonds as would have been authorized had the officers of the city and county indisputably allowed only "legal debts and liabilities" of the former corporation,—the city of Sacramento. At the trial, the bona fides of the plaintiffs being conceded, there was but one question to be decided, to-wit, were the bonds such as the city and county had power to issue? No question of irregularity, or even fraud, on the part of the agents of the municipality could be considered. Ronede v. Jersey City, 17 Reporter, 263; East Lincoln v. Davenport, 94 U. S. 801; Pompton v. Cooper Union, 101 U. S. 196; Sherman Co. v. Simons, 109 U. S. 737, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 502; Louisiana v. Pilsbury, 105 U. S. 278. Hereafter, in cases like the present, where the facts shall be found by a referee appointed by this court, and either party shall have given notice of a motion for a new trial within 10 days after receiving notice that findings have been filed, the argument of the cause will not be heard until the motion for a new trial shall have been determined. Nor will argument be heard upon the findings of a referee (no notice of motion for a new trial having been served) unless 10 days shall have expired after notice of the filing of such findings. Motion denied.

WILLARD CITY V. WOODLAND.

JUSTICE'S COURT.—JURISDICTION.—SUIT FOR TAXES.—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. In an action by a city in the justice's court for taxes, where the complaint alleges that defendant is indebted to the city in a certain amount for taxes on real estate, and asks judgment, and the answer is a mere denial, and is not verified, no issue involving the title to real property or the legality of a tax is raised, so as to oust the justice of jurisdiction under Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 2543.

2. Where a motion to set aside a verdict and judgment is overruled, and defendant waits for over a month before presenting his bill of exceptions, without asking an extension of time, the judge may refuse to sign the same, since Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 3396, requires the bill, within 10 days after notice of entry of the judgment, or within such further time as the court may allow, to be presented to the adverse party, who shall have 10 days to propose amendments, 10 days after which it shall be presented to the court for allowance.

Appeal from district court, first district; JAMES A. MINER, Justice.

Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 3395, provides that when a party desires to have exceptions taken at a trial settled in the bill of exceptions he may, within 10 days after the entry of judgment, if the action was tried with a jury, or after receiving notice of the entry of judgment if the action was tried without a jury, or such further time as the court in which the action is pending, or a judge thereof may allow, prepare the draft of a bill, and serve the same upon the adverse party, who may within 10 days propose amendments thereto, the bill and amendments within ten days thereafter to be presented to the judge.

Maloney & Perkins, for appellant.
Smith & Smith, for respondent.

ANDERSON, J. The plaintiff brought suit against the defendant before a justice of the peace for taxes in the sum of $5.10. As the questions we are called upon to decide arise on the pleadings, it becomes necessary to set them out in full. The complaint is as follows, to-wit: "Plaintiff complains and alleges that defendant became, and was on the 31st day of October last, (1899,) indebted to plaintiff in the sum of five dollars and ten cents ($5.10) as and for taxes due said city for the year 1899 on real estate and personal property of said defendant in said city, which defendant has refused and neglects to pay, though requested to do so. Plaintiff demands judgment against the defendant for five dollars and ten cents ($5.10) and costs." To the complaint the defendant filed the following answer: "Now comes said defendant, and for answer to plaintiff's complaint denies each and every allegation in said complaint, and as fully and completely as though each and every allegation was separately denied." There was a trial before the justice of the peace, and judgment was given for the plaintiff and against the defendant for $5.10 and costs. From this judgment the defendant appealed to the district court, where there was a trial before the court and jury on the 15th day of October, 1899, the defendant making no appearance, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff for $5.45 under the direction of the court, on which judgment was rendered. There was a motion to set aside the verdict and judgment, which was overruled, and from the order overruling said motion and from the judgment this appeal is taken.

Counsel for defendant contend that the pleadings put in issue the title to real property and the legality of the tax sought to be collected, and that, under section 3543, vol. 2, Comp. Laws 1888, the justice of the peace had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the case, and that the district court acquired no jurisdiction by the appeal, and that the question of jurisdiction can be raised for the first time in this court. The section of the statute above referred to is as follows: "Sec. 3543. The parties to an action in a justice's court, cannot give evidence upon any questions which involve the title or possession of real property, or which involve the legality of any tax;

* * * nor can any issue presenting such question be tried by such court, and, if it appear from the answer of the defendant, verified by his oath, or that of his agent or attorney, that the determination of the action will necessarily involve the question of title or possession to real property, or involve the legality of any tax, * * * the justice must suspend all further proceedings in the action, and certify the pleadings, and, if any of the pleadings are oral, a transcript of the same from his docket to the clerk of the district court of the district in which such justice's precinct is situated, and from the time of filing such pleadings or transcript with the clerk the district court has over the action the same jurisdiction as if it had been commenced therein." No issue respecting the title or possession of real property, nor the legality of the tax, was raised by the pleadings before the justice; nor would evidence on either of these questions have been proper or necessary under the issues made by the pleadings. The complaint having tendered no issue as to the title to real property or the legality of the tax, the defendant, in order to oust the jurisdiction of the justice, should by a verified answer have pleaded specially such facts as would have presented such issues. Neither the complaint nor the answer was verified, and the answer, containing only a general denial, raised no issue affecting the jurisdiction of the justice. As the justice's court acquired jurisdiction of the parties and had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, it had jurisdiction to hear and determine the case as presented, and the district court likewise acquired jurisdiction by the appeal. In Schroeder v. Wittram, 66 Cal. 636, 6 Pac. Rep. 737, it was held, under a statute similar to the Utah statute, that a justice's court had jurisdiction of an action to recover a deposit made by a vendor under an executory contract for the sale of land, by which he agreed to purchase the land if the title was good, and in which it was stipulated that, if the title was not good, the deposit was to be returned. In that case the plaintiff gave evidence that the abstract furnished him disclosed two unpaid mortgages on the land, and that, on discovering this fact, he declined to complete the purchase, and demanded a return of his deposit, and the court held that the title to the land was not drawn in question thereby, and that the jurisdiction of the justice's court over such an action is not ousted by the fact that the title to the land is incidentally called in question on the trial; that to occasion a loss of jurisdiction the title or right of possession must be directly involved. The action was for money had and received, and the answer was a general denial, and neither the complaint nor the answer was verified, and the court say that there was no question of title or possession of real property presented by the complaint, nor in the issues raised by the complaint and answer. See, also, Jordan v. Walker, 52 Iowa, 647, 3 N. W. Rep. 679, and 56 Iowa, 686, 10 N. W. Rep. 232. Williams v. McCartney, 69 Cal. 556, 11 Pac. Rep. 186, was an action in a justice's court to recover $123.50 under a contract with the superintendent of the streets for the city of San Francisco, under which plaintiff paved the street in front of the defendant's property in said city. The complaint set out facts showing the defective condition of the streets, the service of a notice by the superintendent of streets upon defendant, requiring him to make the necessary repairs; his failure to make such repairs; the adoption of a resolution of the board of supervisors, directing the superintendent to contract for the repairs, etc. The answer denied the allegations of the complaint, and was not verified. The court held that the answer raised no question as to the legality of the indebtedness; that such an issue must be made by answer verified by the oath of the defendant, and, unless so raised, no evidence as to such legality could be received. No notice of intention to move for a new trial, nor any motion for a new trial, as provided in section 3402, Comp. Laws, was made in this case. The motion to set aside the verdict and judgment was made under section 3256, Comp. Laws, on affidavits and oral evidence, and was heard October 25 and overruled October 27, 1890. On the 8th day of December, 1890, counsel for defendant presented to the trial judge a bill of exceptions, and requested that the same be signed and made a part of the record, which the judge refused to do, because the same was not presented within the time provided by statute, no extension of time within which to present it having been granted. In this there was no error. Comp. Laws 1888, §§ 3394, 3395. The appeal is on the judgment roll alone. We find no error in the record, and the judgment of the district court is affirmed.

—INJUNCTIONS.

1. Under 3 Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 8300, providing that an injunction may be granted when it appears by the complaint that plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, which consists in restraining the "commission or continuance" of the act complained of, the court may grant a mandatory, as well as a preventive, writ to a street-railroad company against a defendant who has piled obstructions on its road-bed.

2. Act Cong. July 30, 1886, providing that territorial legislatures shall not pass local or special laws in certain cases, among them, "granting to any corporation, association, or individual the right to lay down railroad tracks," and "granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise," does not prevent a city from granting to a corporation, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, the right to lay down railway tracks in its streets, under general laws of the territorial legislature.

3. Such privilege may be granted to individuals as well as to corporations.

4. A grant to a street-railway company of the exclusive right to use the streets of a city is ultra vires, and cannot prevent the city authorities, in the exercise of the police power, when the public interest demands it, from granting another corporation or individual the right to use the same streets for a similar purpose.

Appeal from district court, first district; JAMES A. MINER, Justice.

L. R. Rhodes and T. J. Hudson, for appellants. H. P. Henderson and Ogden Hiles, for respondents.

ZANE, C. J. This is an appeal from an order granting an injunction restraining the defendants from incumbering the alleged road-bed of the plaintiffs' street railway, and from permitting the incumbrance placed thereon by them to remain. The order was made upon the complaint and answer, the oral testimony, and documentary evidence, and after the argument of the solicitors of the respective parties had been heard. The facts of the case, so far as we deem it necessary to state them, are as follows: On the 7th day of August, 1888, the city council of Ogden City adopted a resolution giving to the Ogden City Railway Company permission to construct and operate on Washington avenue a single or double tracked street railway. The resolution contained the following, with other conditions: "In cases such company shall not commence and prosecute the construction of its road as mentioned in this resolution, and shall not prosecute its extensions thereafter at least one mile every four years, the city reserves the right to grant to others the privilege of constructing railways upon all streets or parts of streets not actually occupied by Ogden City Railway Company's tracks." In pursuance of the resolution the company built a single line of railway track on Washington avenue, and in all respects complied with the resolution. The other defendant claims as mortgagee of the Ogden City Railway Company, and is acting under the rights thus acquired. On the 19th day of September, 1890, the plaintiffs obtained from Ogden City permission to lay a single or double track electric railway on Washington avenue and other streets of the city. Under this permission the respondents commenced the construction of their railway on the east side of the street, and on that portion unoccupied by the appellants' track, and laid down a part of it, and excavated and prepared other portions of the road-bed thereof, when the appellants took possession of it, and put ties and other obstructions thereon. The respondents filed their complaint to enjoin the alleged trespass and incumbrances, and upon a hearing upon an order to show cause the court granted a temporary injunction, that was restorative as well as preventive.

The contentions of the solicitors as to the rights of the parties upon the foregoing facts impose upon the court the consideration and decision of the following propositions: (1) Was the order appealed from erroneous because it was mandatory as well as preventive? (2) Was the permission given to the respondents to lay down their track contrary to the act of congress prohibiting the territorial legislature from granting special or exclusive privileges? (3) Was the license under which the plaintiffs were constructing their railway invalid because given to individuals? (4) Under the resolution, was the appellant's right of way exclusive?

As to the first proposition: While it is undoubtedly true that injunctions are usually employed to prevent future injuries, they are sometimes granted to restore rights that have been lost. When the advantage to the wrong-doer that constitutes the injury has been gained surreptitiously or by fraud, and the retention of it constitutes a continuing injury, and the law affords no adequate remedy, equity will not withhold such remedial process. In such exigencies mandatory injunctions may issue on interlocutory applications. 1 High, Inf. (3d Ed.) §§ 2, 708. The evidence in the record shows that the plaintiffs, while engaged in constructing their road, suspended work during Sunday, and that the appellants in the interval took possession of it, and placed wooden ties and other obstructions upon it, and that the trespass was a continuing one, for which an action at law would not have been an adequate remedy. But counsel insist that the statutes of Utah only authorize a preventive writ; that a mandatory one is not included. The statute is as follows: "An injunction may be granted in the following cases: (1) When it appears by the complaint that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded, and such relief, or any part thereof, consists in restraining the commission or continuance of the act complained of, either for a limited period or perpetually." 2 Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 3800. This statute provides that the commission or the continuance of the act may be restrained. By suffering their property to remain on respondents' road-bed the appellants continued the wrong. The act of placing it there had been done, but appellants were still occupying plaintiffs' works with their ties and other property. They were continuing the trespass. To prevent that continuation a mandatory injunction was necessary. We are of opinion that the legislature, by the law referred to, did not intend to deprive the courts of Utah of any part of that equitable jurisdiction with respect to injunctions recognized by that beneficent system of rules which constitutes equity. We hold that the district courts of Utah have the power, in proper cases, to issue mandatory as well as preventive injunctions.

With respect to the second proposition: The act of congress of July 30, 1886, is as follows: "The legislatures of the territories of the United States now or hereafter to be organized shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases." And after mentioning a number of subjects, the following language is used: "Granting to any corporation, association, or individual the right to lay down railroad tracks, or amending existing charters for such purpose. Granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise whatever." The first clause quoted prohibits the territorial legislature from granting to any corporation, association, or individual the right to lay down railroad tracks; and because the legislature could not grant to any corporation or individual such right it is argued that Ogden City could not give such permission. If that were so, then there would be no way by which any company or individual could obtain the right of way for a railway on any street in Ogden City or any other city in the territory, because there would be no other authority to which application could be legally made. The second clause above quoted prohibits the granting of any special or exclusive privilege, immunity, or franchise whatever by the legislature; and if the legislature may not enact a general law in pursuance of which a franchise may be secured in each case by application to the courts, (as it has done,) then no more companies can be incorporated in the territories. And if the rule is that the city cannot grant the right of way to any particular company or person because the legislature cannot do so itself, that rule is equally applicable to a large number of other subjects as to which it cannot act specially. As instances, the legislature cannot grant divorces, or change the names of persons; and if it cannot by general laws authorize some other tribunals or some officers or offices to exercise the necessary authority, then no more divorces can be granted or names changed; and so as to a great many other subjects. Upon a careful examination of the law under consideration the intent of congress is apparent. The law was designed to prohibit special legislation, and to prevent the evils thereof. The purpose was not to prevent the legislature from enacting general laws in pursuance of which such special duties might be performed by some other tribunal or by some officer. We are of the opinion that the city council of Ogden City, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, may grant the right to lay down railway tracks in its streets.

The consideration and decision of the third point involves the right of natural persons as such to construct and operate railroads. In the nature of things, is there any sufficient reason why individuals, as such, should not be permitted to construct and operate railroads as well as natural persons through the instrumentality of corporations? A private corporation is a legal person, with power to act as a natural one to the extent that its charter authorizes it to. When the road is owned and operated by a corporation the stockholders own the road through the agency of the corporation, but the use is in the public. When individuals, as such, own and operate it, the property is in them, and the use is then in the public. In the first case, the proceeds of the business, after deducting expenses, is paid to the stockholders as dividends. In the latter, the individuals retain such earnings as are not consumed by expenses. Either can acquire the right of way by contract or in the exercise of the right of eminent domain when the law authorizes it; and neither can acquire it in the latter way without such a statute. The rights of natural persons through the instrumentality of corporations are usually limited to one department or class of business; but without such instrumentality their rights extend to every field which their enterprise, their skill, or business capacity and inclinations may enable and cause them to enter. We do not find anything in business methods or in the fitness of things to prevent natural persons from constructing and operating railroads when they have the inclination, and can command the pecuniary means to do so; nor do we know of any statute in force in Utah, or any rule of law or adjudged case, against it. 1 Rorer, R. R. 8.

Lastly, was the appellants' right of way on the street exclusive? Equality before the law is a fundamental principle of all just governments. Competition in supply and demand regulates wages, prices, and values. The moral sense, the self-interest, and the inclinations of mankind amid the employments, pursuits, and transactions of civilized life give to competition this effect. It is the response of nature to the interrogations of human affairs. It is an important principle of that philosophy known as "political economy;" and laws preventing competition are usually regarded as contrary to public policy, and held to be of no effect. But sometimes the conditions of a particular business prevent competition. Reasonable tariffs and rates might enable one railway to accommodate the public when insufficient to support two or more; and one railway on a street might be sufficient to accommodate the travel on it; but it might be convenient for travel coming in from different neighborhoods to pass to a business center or other neighborhood on the same street for short distances, and they should be permitted to occupy a reasonable portion of it for that purpose. They should not be allowed to obstruct travel in other ways, or to interfere with the approaches to abutting property. To prevent this they should be confined to the common use of the same track. This could be accomplished by the imposition of suitable conditions at the time of granting the permission, or, when such conditions have not been exacted, by a resort to the law of eminent domain. Streets can only be occupied by railroads for public uses, not for private. Railways are permitted on the streets because they are believed to be beneficial to the public in furnishing a prompt, economical, and convenient mode of traveling upon them; and being in the public streets, the public, through its authorities, the city government, has a right to direct the location of their tracks therein, and to determine how much of the streets they may occupy; and such public authorities have also the power to adopt reasonable rules for the regulation of their business. Such railroads and their business are subject to the police power, which the government cannot divest itself of by contract or otherwise, and, being so possessed of it, it is its duty to make use of it whenever the public good demands that it shall. The legislature did not authorize the city council of Ogden City to grant to the appellants the exclusive right of way upon the street in question, nor do we think it had the power to do it. Elliott, Roads & S. 565, 566; Jackson Co. Horse R. Co. v. Interstate Rapid Transit Ry. Co., 24 Fed. Rep. 306. We find no error in this record. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

EMINENT DOMAIN—STREET RAILWAYS.

1. Comp. Laws Utah 1888, § 8841 et seq., provide that the right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of "steam and horse railroads," and that all rights of way for such purposes may be crossed or intersected by any other right of way or improvement, and may be subject to a limited use in common with the owner, when necessary for the public benefit. Held, that such right may be exercised in behalf of electrical street railroads.

2. A city granted plaintiff railway company the right to lay a double track in a street, and afterwards granted defendants the right to lay a double-track electric railway in the same street. Before defendants commenced work, plaintiff sued to enjoin them from laying their tracks, and to have the ordinance giving them a right of way declared void, alleging that it (plaintiff) had constructed a single track, and that, if it were to lay down its other track, and defendants their two tracks, other modes of public travel would be obstructed, and also that defendants' poles and wires would interfere with plaintiff's rights as the owner of property abutting on the street. Held, that a demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained.

ZANE, C. J. The complaint filed in the court below in this case, among other things, alleged that on August 7, 1883, the city council of Ogden city adopted an ordinance granting to the plaintiff permission to lay down a double-tracked street railway on Twenty-Fifth street and Washington avenue, and that in June, 1890, the city, upon certain conditions named in the ordinance, gave the defendants permission to construct a double-track railway on the same streets, to be operated by electricity; that these are the main business streets of the city; that the plaintiff had constructed on them a single track, with turn-outs; that, if it were to lay down another, the two would occupy about 20 feet in width; and that, if two additional tracks, as threatened by the defendants, should be laid down, the streets would be so obstructed by the four tracks as to greatly interfere with other modes of travel; and that, if poles and wires, as threatened, should be placed in front of the property owned by plaintiff, it would be seriously damaged thereby. The complaint prays that the ordinance granting the permission to defendants to lay down their tracks may be declared null and void so far as it purports to grant to defendants any right to construct their road on the streets, and that they be enjoined from filing the bond exacted as one of the conditions of the permit. A prayer for general relief is also added. To the complaint the defendants interposed a demurrer, which the court below sustained, and also refused an injunction. From the decision of the court the plaintiff has appealed to this court, and assigns it as error.

The points urged by plaintiff upon the argument of this appeal call for a consideration of the authority of the city council to give permission to individuals and corporations to construct railways upon the public streets, and to control their location and operation thereon. The city council of Ogden city, by virtue of its general authority over such streets, was authorized to permit street-car companies to construct and operate their roads upon them; but without special authority the council could not permit ordinary railroads, with trains propelled by steam-power, to do so. The permission is given to facilitate public travel, and for the benefit and convenience of the public. The permission to such companies cannot confer upon them an exclusive right. The right so given exists in common with the right to travel on the streets in wagons and by other vehicles, and on horseback and on foot, in all legitimate ways. Such persons or companies, in the observance of all reasonable care and caution, have the right to pass their cars over their tracks as often as the public convenience requires and the demand will justify. The cars have the right of way, and the travel by other means and in other ways must turn out, because it can and the cars cannot. The city authorities have the right to require the tracks to be so constructed and kept in repair that travel by other modes can conveniently and safely use them. It is the right and duty of the city to exercise such reasonable control over the construction, repair, operation, and business of street railways as the safety, convenience, and good of the public demands. The private rights of the owners and occupants of property abutting on the street must also be protected, for the law is that such abutters have an easement in the street appurtenant to their property of which they cannot be deprived without their consent, or without just compensation in pursuance of the law of eminent domain; and the council has the power, and it is its duty, to say that no more than a reasonable portion of the street shall be occupied by street railways, and it has no right to consent that more shall be so used. In his work on Municipal Corporations, Judge Dillon says: "The author regards the appropriation under legislative authority of a reasonable portion of the street for a horse railway, constructed on the gradual surface of the street, and used under municipal regulation in the ordinary mode, to be such a use as falls within the purposes for which the streets are dedicated or acquired under the power of eminent domain. When thus authorized, and so regulated by the public authorities as not to destroy the ordinary and usual street uses, this is a public use within the fair scope of the intention of the proprietor when he dedicated the street or was paid for property to be used as a street. Such proprietor must be taken to contemplate all improved and more convenient modes of use which are reasonably consistent with the use of the street by ordinary vehicles and in the usual modes. * * * The limitations being that such use must not deprive the abutter of his property rights and easements in the streets, or destroy the ordinary uses of the streets as a public and common highway open to all." If separate tracks for two or more railroad companies on a street with cars operated on them would increase the hazards, or seriously obstruct travel thereon in other ways, or interfere with the rights of abutters, such individuals or companies should be limited to the common use of the same track or tracks. This could be done by suitable conditions, reservations, or limitations at the time of the grant of the right of way, or, in the absence of them, in pursuance of the law of eminent domain. Section 3841 of the Compiled Laws of Utah is as follows: "The right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of the following public uses: * * * (3) Wharves, * * * steam and horse railroads. * * * Sec. 3843. The private property which may be taken under this chapter includes: (1) All real property belonging to any person. (2) Lands belonging to this territory, or to any county, incorporated city, village, or town, not appropriated to some public use. (3) Property appropriated to public use; but such property shall not be taken unless for a more necessary public use than that to which it has already been appropriated. * * * (5) All rights of way for any and all purposes mentioned in section 3841, and any and all structures and improvements thereon, and the lands held or used in connection therewith, shall be subject to be connected with, crossed, or intersected by any other right of way or improvement or structure thereon. They shall also be subject to a limited use in common with the owner thereof when necessary; but such uses of crossings, intersections, and connections shall be made in manner most compatible with the greatest public benefit and least private injury." Electrical railways were not mentioned in the act, but horse and steam railways were. At that time horse and steam power was used, because thought to be the best. Electricity was not then known as a car-motor; but ingenuity and invention have since subjected it to that use, and it is being substituted largely for the others; and we have no hesitation in holding that under the statute the right of eminent domain may be exercised, in proper cases, in behalf of electrical roads as well as for steam and horse railways.

While the owner of a railway may have an interest in its property, that interest is not more inviolable and sacred than other interests in property. The private interest is one thing, and the public use is another. The property is taken for the public use, not to transfer the interest that one person has in the property to another person. Such transfer incidentally and necessarily follows in order that the public benefit may be enjoyed. When the tracks of one company on a street are sufficient for the business of two or more companies they should all be required to use them, and the hazards and inconveniences and obstructions to travel by other modes should be limited to the tracks of the one company. If the interest of each company in the railroad property used in common is sufficient to enable them to accommodate the public travel, that is sufficient. It appears from the allegations of the complaint that the plaintiff had laid down but one track on the streets named, and that the defendants had not commenced the construction of theirs. The court below was asked to declare the ordinance giving the defendants the right of way on them void. If it had been so decreed the defendants could not have laid down one track, and it does not appear that one additional track would have materially obstructed travel by other modes, or that it would have interfered with plaintiff's private easement on the streets appurtenant to its abutting property. The effect of the decree asked by the plaintiff would have been to deny the defendants any permission on the street, even under the law of eminent domain; for any rights obtained under that law would not have authorized them to construct their road on the street without the permission of the city council. The allegations of fact are not sufficient to warrant an injunction on the ground that the construction of the defendants' railway would damage the abutting property by materially interfering with rights appurtenant thereto. Except so far as we have considered this case it is analogous to the case of Henderson v. Railway Co., ante, 286, (decided at the present term.) The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

IRRIGATION—APPROPRIATION OF WATER—RIPARIAN RIGHTS.

1. Plaintiffs sued to enjoin defendants from interfering with their right to divert and use the waters of certain creeks, to furnish water to a city during the winter season, from November 15th to April 15th. Defendants objected on the ground that, when plaintiffs' land was public land, they owned land below it, and claimed the right to use the water of said creeks for irrigation purposes, from April 1st to November 1st. The court's findings did not show that defendants needed during the winter season more water than was left them, and it appeared that they had got along with it for a number of years. Held, that an injunction was properly granted.

2. The doctrine of riparian rights is not in force in Utah, so as to prevent the owner of land from diverting the waters of a stream for purposes of irrigation and domestic use, under the laws of the territory.

BLACKBURN, J. The appeal in this case is taken for the purpose of modifying the decree made in the first district court, and the claim to have the decree modified is based upon the findings of facts made by the court, (the evidence not being in the record,) and the common-law doctrine of riparian rights. The parts of the decree complained of are as follows: "That the plaintiffs are the owners of the right to use all the waters of said Waterfall Canon creek and one-half of the waters of said Strong's Canon creek during the winter season, to-wit, between the 15th day of November and the 15th day of the following April of each and every winter season, for domestic purposes, and for the purpose of furnishing the inhabitants of Ogden City with water, and the enjoining of defendants from interfering with such use." The findings of facts by the court, so far as the questions made are concerned, are substantially as follows: "That the plaintiffs are the owners of certain lands described in the complaint; that the defendants are the owners in fee of distinct parcels of land lying west of the lands of the plaintiffs; that they have been such owners since and prior to the year 1880; that defendants' lands are cultivated, and all of the lands of both plaintiffs and defendants require irrigation. (3) Waterfall Canon creek and Strong's Canon creek rise in the mountains east of the lands of plaintiffs, and flow across the lands of the plaintiffs, making a junction about the west line of plaintiffs' lands, and after the junction the stream is called and known as 'Canfield Creek,' and that this Canfield creek flows westerly in its natural channel across the lands of defendants. (4) That these streams are the only sources of water available for the irrigation of the lands of plaintiffs and defendants. (5) That the several defendants in this action, and their grantors and predecessors in interest, and while the several pieces and parcels of land described in the complaint as owned in severalty by the plaintiffs were unoccupied, unimproved, uncultivated, and unclaimed lands of the United States, to-wit, in the year 1848, by means of dams placed in and across the channel of Canfield creek below and west of the two streams and also in and across the channel of Strong's Canon creek, above and east of the junction of the aforesaid streams, and also by means of ditches and canals tapping the said Strong's Canon creek at various places, and leading therefrom, conveyed and appropriated to, in, and upon the several pieces of land so owned by the defendants, their grantors and predecessors in interest, for the irrigation of the said lands of the said defendants, and for domestic purpose, all of the waters of said Canfield creek, which creek was then, and ever since has been, and now is, composed of the waters of Waterfall Canon creek and Strong's Canon creek, which use aforesaid was a necessary and beneficial use thereof. (6) That use, diversion, and appropriation by the defendants and their grantors and predecessors in interest of all of the waters of said Canfield creek was so made fully and completely during each and every part of each and every year while the said pieces and parcels of land now owned by the several plaintiffs herein were unclaimed, unimproved, and unoccupied lands of the United States, and the several defendants, their grantors and predecessors in interest, did so use, during each and every part of each and every year, and until the interruption in said use hereinafter named, all of the waters of Canfield creek, and of the two said tributaries thereof, except," etc. "(10) The irrigating season is from the 1st of April until the 1st of November. (11) That between the 1st of November, 1882, and the 1st of April, 1883, the plaintiffs, by means of pipes laid for the purpose, diverted one-half of Strong's Canon creek, and all of the waters of Waterfall Canon creek, during the winter season, and up to the commencement of this suit, and have continued to so divert it, for the purpose of furnishing Ogden with water. (12) That the plaintiffs have ever since November, 1882, and up to the beginning of this suit, continued to divert one-half of Strong's Canon creek, and all of the waters of Canfield creek below the junction.

We think the findings of fact support that part of the decree complained of. It is not found that the defendants need on their lands water for irrigation during the winter season, but the finding is that the irrigating season is from April to November. Nor is it found that the defendants need during the winter season more water than one-half of the waters of Strong's Canon creek, and all of the waters of Canfield creek below the junction. On the contrary, they seem to have got along with that amount of water from 1882 until this suit was commenced. Therefore this decree ought to be affirmed, unless the other contention of the defendants is the law of this territory; that is, that the common-law doctrine of riparian rights is in force, and that when they, their grantors and predecessors in interest, purchased their land from the United States, the land above them was unoccupied, and the water unappropriated, and that they now are legally entitled to have the water flow as it was wont to flow when they, their grantors and predecessors in interest, purchased it, undiminished in quantity, and not deteriorated in quality.

Riparian rights have never been recognized in this territory, or in any state or territory where irrigation is necessary; for the appropriation of water for the purpose of irrigation is entirely and unavoidably in conflict with the common-law doctrine of riparian proprietorship. If that had been recognized and applied in this territory, it would still be a desert; for a man owning 10 acres of land on a stream of water capable of irrigating a thousand acres of land or more, near its mouth, could prevent the settlement of all the land above him. For at common law the riparian proprietor is entitled to have the water flow in quantity and quality past his land as it was wont to do when he acquired title thereto, and this right is utterly irreconcilable with the use of water for irrigation. The legislature of this territory has always ignored this claim of riparian proprietors, and the practice and usages of the inhabitants have never considered it applicable, and have never regarded it. So with Colorado, early in its history, by a decision of its highest court, it was set aside. Yunker v. Nichols, 1 Colo. 551. But defendants contended that their right to have water flow in Canfield creek, as it was wont to when their grantors and predecessors in interest acquired title to the land, is a vested right, and is not a rightful subject of legislation. In this arid country, that must remain a desert without the use of water for irrigation, if anything is a rightful subject of legislation it is the ownership of the water, and use and appropriation of the waters of the running streams for irrigation and domestic use. In support of their contention, the defendants cite Sturr v. Beck, 133 U.S. 541, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 350. That decision was made in an appeal from the supreme court of the territory of Dakota, where the statutes and climatic conditions are very different from those in this territory. The full force and pith of the opinion is founded in its concluding paragraph: "Thus under the laws of congress and the territory, and the applicable custom, priority of possession gives priority of right. The question is not as to the extent of Smith's interest in the homestead, as against the government, but whether, as against Sturr, his lawful occupancy, under the settlement and entry, was not a prior appropriation which Sturr could not displace. We have no doubt it was one of the statutes of Dakota upon which this decision is made, and it is as follows: 'Sec. 255, (Civil Code.) The owner of land owns water standing therein, and flowing over or under its surface, but not forming a definite stream. Water running in a definite stream, formed by nature, over or under the surface, may be used by him as long as it remains there; but he may not prevent the natural flow of the stream, or of the natural spring from which it commences its definite course, nor pursue nor pollute the same.'" How unlike this statute is to the whole course of legislation in this territory in reference to water-rights. Our views are supported by Pom. Rip. Rights, § 105. We think there is no error in this decree. Therefore the judgment is affirmed.

RIGHT OF WAY—PRESCRIPTION—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. 2 Comp. Laws Utah 1888, §§ 3183, 3183, 3187, require that a person defending an action against one holding adversely must have been in possession within seven years before commencement of the action, and provide that possession will be deemed adverse only where the land has been protected by a substantial inclosure, or where it has been cultivated, or the expense of irrigation paid, and that in all cases the taxes must have been paid by the adverse claimant. Held, that one who merely uses part of an adjoining lot as a means of exit to the street for the statutory period does not acquire a right of way by adverse possession.

2. Where a person opens a way for the use of his own premises, and another uses it without causing damage, the presumption is that his use was permissive, and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, he does not acquire a right of way by prescription.

Smith & Smith, for appellants. N. Tanner, Jr., for respondent.

ZANE, C. J. It appears from the evidence in this record that defendant owned a lot with improvements thereon in Ogden City; that the lot had a north frontage of 60 feet on Twenty-Fourth street, and that it extended south 100 feet, and was bounded on the west by Grant Avenue; that adjoining this lot on the east the plaintiffs own a lot, with improvements on it, and that they claim a right of way from their lot to Grant Avenue over the south 10 feet of defendant's lot. The defendant having erected a building on this 10 feet, the plaintiffs filed their complaint, asking the court to decree the removal of it, and that defendant might be enjoined from obstructing their right of way. Upon a hearing of the case the court found that the plaintiffs had no right of way over defendant's land, and so decreed. The plaintiffs have brought the case here by appeal from that decree.

While the public may acquire a right of way over private property in either of three ways, viz.: (1) By condemnation in pursuance of the law of eminent domain; (2) by dedication; (3) by such continued use as gives a prescriptive right,—a private way can only be obtained in one of the two modes last mentioned. The owner may expressly set his land apart to be used as a public road or a private way; and the public in the one case, or the private person in the other, may accept the offer, and complete the dedication. An intent to dedicate must be expressed or implied from language or conduct, and an intent to accept must be expressed or implied from language or conduct, to make the dedication. The right to a public road or private way by prescription arises from the uninterrupted adverse enjoyment of it under a claim of right known to the owner for the requisite length of time. Anciently the right to the easement arose by prescription from the use of the land for so long a time that there was no existing evidence as to when such use commenced. Its origin must have been at a time "whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary." Later the rule was changed by limiting the time of uninterrupted possession to 20 years. Washburne, in his work on Easements, says: "The fiction of presuming a grant from twenty years' possession or use was invented by the English courts in the eighteenth century, to avoid the absurdities of their rule of legal memory, and was derived by analogy from the limitation prescribed by the statute of 21 Jac. I. c. 21, for actions of ejectment, not upon a belief that a grant in any particular case has been made, but on general presumption. * * * This period, unless other provision was made in local statutes of the state in which the questions have arisen, has been assumed to be the term of twenty years. * * * The result has therefore been that the modern doctrine of prescription requires merely a use and enjoyment of at least twenty years, instead of the former requirement of immemorial enjoyment." Washb. Easem. (4th Ed.) 125, 126. The rule as to time of use or enjoyment necessary to create a presumptive grant has been further changed by analogy to the periods of limitation for quieting titles to land. "What shall be taken to be a sufficiently long period of use or enjoyment to create a prescription or presumptive grant in the modern use of the term is understood to correspond with the local period of limitation for quieting titles to land." Id. 148. While the right of the owner of one parcel of land, by reason of such ownership, to use the land of another as a private way, as claimed in this case, is not inconsistent with the general property being in the owner, yet that general property without the use is of but little value. The title to land is of no value with the right to the permanent use in another person or in the public. Therefore all the facts from which the statute of limitations in effect presumes the grant must exist before the right of prescription arises by analogy to such statute. The presumption is in effect the same whether the right is by prescription or by the statute. The provisions of the seven-years statute of limitations of this territory, upon which the plaintiffs rely, are as follows: "No cause of action or defense to an action founded upon the title to real property, or to rents or profits out of the same, shall be effectual unless it appears that the person prosecuting the action or making the defense, or under whose title the action is prosecuted or the defense is made, or the ancestor, predecessor, or grantor of such person was seised or possessed of the premises in question within seven years before the commencement of the act in respect to which such action is prosecuted or defense made." "In every action for the recovery of real property or the possession thereof the person establishing a legal title to the property shall be presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law, and the occupation of the property by any other person shall be deemed to have been under and in subordination to the legal title, unless it appear that the property has been held and possessed adversely to such legal title for seven years before the commencement of the action." "For the purpose of constituting an adverse possession by a person claiming title not founded upon a written instrument, judgment, or decree, land is deemed to have been possessed and occupied in the following cases only: (1) Where it has been protected by a substantial inclosure; (2) where it has been usually cultivated or improved; (3) where labor or money has been expended * * * for the purpose of irrigating said lands, amounting to the sum of five dollars per acre: provided, however, that in no case shall adverse possession be considered established under the provisions of any section or sections of this Code unless it shall be shown that the land has been occupied and claimed for the period of seven years continuously, and the party or persons, their predecessors and grantors, have paid all the taxes * * * which have been levied and assessed upon such land according to law." 2 Comp. Laws Utah 1888, §§ 3132, 3133, 3137. The statute does not, in effect, presume a grant and give the person relying upon it the title from seven years' possession alone. The presumption is made from the fact that the land was held adversely; and to make the holding adverse the land must have been protected by a substantial inclosure, or it must have been usually cultivated or improved, or labor or money must have been expended to irrigate it, amounting to the sum of five dollars per acre. And in either case the occupation and claim must have been continuous for the seven years, and during that time the claimant, his predecessors or grantors, must have paid all taxes levied and assessed upon the land according to law. This statute does not apply to rights of way or any other class of easement by prescription. It can only be applied by analogy. The plaintiffs' use and enjoyment of the land in dispute, or the facts attending the same, were not such as the statute above quoted required, or their equivalent; hence a prescriptive right cannot arise in favor of the plaintiffs therefrom by analogy thereto. It is conceded that the use and enjoyment, such as it was, was for less than 20 years, so that period of limitation cannot apply. The evidence in the record proves that defendant was using the strip of land in dispute as a way to the rear of his own building; that he had gates on it a part of the time; that he maintained a platform on the side next to his building a large portion of the time, which occupied three or four feet of the way; and that his tenant was accustomed to keep a team standing south of the platform, and at such times the entire way was occupied thereby; that defendant also had a privy on the ground a portion of the time. The evidence tends to establish that the plaintiffs' use was simply permissive, and that defendant was not aware that plaintiffs were using his land under a claim of right. Where a person opens a way for the use of his own premises, and another person uses it also without causing damage, the presumption is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the such use by the latter was permissive, and not under a claim of right. Washb. Easem. 151. The decree of the court below is affirmed.

LIMITATIONS OF ACTIONS — PLEADING STATUTE — WATER-RIGHTS — DEMURRER — WAIVER.

An answer, which merely alleges that an action for taking and diverting water was barred by the statute of limitations, is not a good plea of that statute, as it does not state the section of the Code relied on, as required by Comp. Laws Utah, § 3244, nor set out the facts constituting the defense.

2. Parties whose rights are subordinate to those of plaintiffs need not be joined, although they and plaintiffs are tenants in common of the water.

8. Where defendants, after answering, demurred to the complaint, and the demurrer was overruled, exception thereto was waived by going to trial on the answer, when it contained no objection to the complaint.

Appeal from district court, first district; J. W. BLACKBURN, Justice.

Comp. Laws Utah, § 3244, is as follows: "In pleading the statute of limitations it is not necessary to state the facts showing the defense, but it may be stated generally that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of section [giving the number of the section and subdivision thereof, if it is so divided, relied upon] of the Code of Civil Procedure; and if such allegation be controverted the party pleading must establish, on the trial, the facts showing that the cause of action is so barred."

Booth, Wilson & Wilson, for appellants.
W. H. King, A. Saxey, George Sutherland, and S. R. Thurman, for respondents.

MINER, J. This action was commenced by the plaintiffs against the defendants in the first district court at Provo, June 4, 1889, to prevent and restrain the defendants from taking, diverting, or obstructing any of the waters of the Spanish Fork river or its tributaries in Utah county; plaintiffs claiming to be joint owners by prior appropriation and use of the waters of said river for irrigation and domestic purposes. The several separate answers of the defendants were filed June 15, 1889, and a joint demurrer filed May 9, 1890, was overruled May 12, 1890, and the court proceeded to try the case without a jury, at the close of which trial a decree was entered for the plaintiffs. The defendants appeal. The defendants assign the following errors of law and fact: "First. The third finding is unsustainable, for the reason that no proof of transfer of water-right from prior appropriators to the plaintiffs was before the court. (1) The court erred in overruling the demurrer of defendants to the complaint herein. (2) The court erred in finding for the plaintiffs in this: that no special damages to the plaintiffs was alleged or proven. (3) The court erred in finding for the plaintiffs in this: that the decision is not the legal result of the evidence, and that it is against the law, for the reason that the defendants have held open, peaceable, uninterrupted, and continuous use of the waters in dispute for the period of 7 years. (4) The court erred in distributing by its decree water to a party not a party to the action, namely, the South-East Irrigation Company. (5) The court erred in making a decree where all the parties in interest were not before the court in this: that the Lake Shore Canal Company, and the East Bench Canal Company were not represented in the action. (6) The Lake Shore Canal Company and the East Bench Canal Company were not before the court.

We have not been favored with the defendants' brief, but from the record we conclude that as to the first assignment of error the evidence tends to show that the original appropriators of the water organized themselves into the various irrigation companies, who were plaintiffs in this case, and thereafter received their water through the companies. Soon after the irrigation companies were organized they took charge of the water, and distributed it upon the lands of their stockholders and others, who were the original appropriators. There was also proof that the transfer of the water-rights had been made by the appropriators to some of the irrigating companies. If the transfer of water-rights was not strictly formal it was not a matter which the defendants could take advantage of. The testimony tends to show that the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest had appropriated all the waters which were awarded to them prior to the date that any of the defendants made any appropriation, and, although there is a conflict in the proof bearing upon this question, the court below seems to have passed correctly on the matter presented.

1. The demurrer of the defendants to the complaint was filed several months after their answer, and was overruled by the court, and the defendants thereupon went to trial upon their answer. No objection to the complaint appears in the answer. They therefore waive their exception to the order of the court in overruling the demurrer.

2. The statute of limitations was not pleaded. The answer simply says that the action is barred by the statute of limitations. This is clearly an insufficient plea, and raises no issue in the case. The answer should have stated and pleaded the section of the Code of Civil Procedure relied upon, or should have stated the facts constituting the defense. 2 Comp. Laws Utah, p. 251, § 3244; Tunnel Co. v. Strunahan, 31 Cal. 387; Howell v. Rogers, 47 Cal. 291; Caulfield v. Sanders, 17 Cal. 569.

3. The South-East Irrigation Company is not mentioned in the decree, and the court did not attempt to distribute any water to them. Their case was in no way considered by the court in its final determination.

4. The Lake Shore and East Bench Companies were not joined as plaintiffs, nor were their rights considered in this case. It appeared incidentally in the testimony that whatever rights they had were subordinate to those of the plaintiffs. It was not necessary to join them in the suit, even though they were tenants in common with the plaintiffs. The rule is well settled that one tenant in common of water may sue alone to protect or recover it from a trespasser, or one using it without right. Water Co. v. Perdew, 65 Cal. 453, 4 Pac. Rep. 426; Carpentier v. Webster, 27 Cal. 524; Waring v. Crow, 11 Cal. 367. Upon the whole record we discover no error. The judgment and decree of the lower court is affirmed.

APPEAL—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS—DEFECTIVE RECORD.

Where an attachment sued out on the ground of defendant's non-residence is dissolved by the trial court, and the evidence on which its action is based is not all contained in the record on appeal, the supreme court will assume that the trial court acted on sufficient evidence.

Appeal from district court, third district; C. S. ZANE, Justice.

Bennett, Marshall & Bradley, for respondent.

ANDERSON, J. This is an appeal from an order of the third district court dissolving an attachment sued out in this action on the ground that the defendant was not residing within the territory. The defendant was residing in Salt Lake City from March, 1888, to August, 1889, with his wife and child. On the date last named his wife separated from him, and went to Denver, Colo., to live, and where she still resides. McCornick & Co. and Walter Pavey were summoned as garnishees, and answered that Pavey held certain moneys belonging to McCornick & Co. and the defendant, to which each were entitled to certain portions thereof. The affidavits further tended to show that the defendant was not assessed with any property in Salt Lake City for the year 1890, and that the defendant had left this territory with the expressed intention of going to Galveston to make investments. The defendant has filed an amended or additional abstract, from which it appears that the defendant resided in Salt Lake City from February 12, 1888, to April 3, 1890, when he left for Galveston, intending to proceed thence to Europe for his health; that he did not go to Galveston, but proceeded directly to Europe, and remained there until August, 1890; that while absent from Utah Territory, he had a room in Salt Lake City, in which he slept when there, and in which he stored his furniture, and left the same in the care of one McHugh; that while absent he continued to pay the rent of the room, and never thought of changing his residence; that his stay in Europe was prolonged because of ill health; that he left his business interests in Salt Lake City in charge of W. S. Pavey, giving a list of property left by him in the hands of Pavey, and that he had no business interests outside of Utah. Also the affidavit of Pavey was filed to the effect that the defendant had told him he was going to Galveston on a visit, and thence to Europe for his health, and would soon return to Utah; that his absence would be temporary only; that while absent he corresponded with affiant, and in his letters frequently expressed his intention of returning to Utah, and to there continue the conduct of his ordinary business. The court dissolved the attachment, and this appeal is from the order of dissolution made by the court.

The record shows that the motion to dissolve the attachment was heard and determined upon affidavits on behalf of the respective parties, and upon the oral testimony of O. W. Powers, whose testimony is not contained in the record. The court dissolved the attachment upon the ground that the defendant was not a non-resident of the territory. All the evidence before the court, and on which the court acted in dissolving the attachment, not being in the record, we must presume the order of the court dissolving the attachment was based on sufficient evidence. The order of the district court is therefore affirmed.

JOINT VENDREES—DEED TO ONE—ACCOUNTING.

Plaintiffs and defendants agreed to purchase land at a certain price, each to pay one-third of the purchase money. The first installment was paid, but defendants, in whose names the deed was taken, paid the balance without notice to plaintiffs, and sold the land at an increased price. Held, that plaintiffs were entitled to one-third of the sale price, less the balance due from them on the purchase price.

Appeal from district court, first district; H. P. HENDERSON, Justice.

BLACKBURN, J. In this cause both parties appeal. The plaintiffs appeal from the amount of recovery. It is to be decided only on the pleadings, findings of facts, conclusions of law, and judgment, as the evidence taken at the trial is not in the record. We do not think a lengthy opinion on the plaintiffs' appeal is necessary. It is sufficient to say that it is not well taken. One of the findings of fact is that Edwards, one of the plaintiffs, Cahoon and Robinson, two of the defendants, entered into an agreement to purchase certain lands of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, to share equally in the payment for the land, and to own equal interests when paid for, and the deed, when taken, was to be in the name of Edwards for the benefit of the three. The land was bought and paid for, and the deed taken in the name of Cahoon and Robinson. Also Edwards sold one-half of his interest to the other plaintiff, Knauss. The purchase price was over $1,000. Afterwards Cahoon and Robinson sold the land for $12,000. The court found as a matter of fact this enterprise was a partnership one, and the basis of recovery by the plaintiffs, if they were entitled to recover at all, was the price for which the land was sold. We think that decision was right, if the property was partnership; and we are bound by the findings of the court, the evidence not being in the record. The partners, in settling among themselves, each was entitled only to his share of the profits of the enterprise, calculated on the basis of what the property sold for, unless the partner making the sale fraudulently sold the property for less than it was worth; and the trial court did not so find. Therefore, in so far as the appeal of the plaintiffs is concerned, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed. The trial court found the facts substantially as follows: "The land in question was owned by the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and was for sale at a certain price, to be paid for in installments. Edwards, one of the plaintiffs, entered into an agreement with the defendants Cahoon and Robinson that they would buy the land, each paying one-third of the purchase money, and each own one-third of the land when paid for. Edwards sold one-half of his interest to the other plaintiff, Knauss. The first installment on the land of $240 was paid; the plaintiffs paying $80, and the defendants Cahoon and Robinson each paying $90. The intermediate installments were not paid, and the company, when the last installment fell due, notified Cahoon and Robinson that payment must be made, or the contract would be forfeited. This notice was concealed from the plaintiffs, and Cahoon and Robinson paid up for the land, and took the deed in their own names, and afterwards sold it for $12,000, a great advance on the price paid. When Knauss found out the facts he offered his share in the purchase money, and demanded a settlement of Cahoon and Robinson, and they refused to allow him or Edwards anything." The court on these facts decreed that, after deducting the excess of the purchase money they had paid, they should account to the plaintiffs for the sale price of the property, and gave the plaintiffs a judgment therefor. We think the judgment is right. How the court could have decreed otherwise, keeping in view the equities of the parties, is beyond our comprehension; and it makes no difference whether the venture was a partnership, or whether the parties took several interests in the land as tenants in common. We think the statute of frauds has no application to the case whatever. The principles of equity upon which this decision is made are familiar and rudimentary, and no authorities need be cited in their support. The decree of the lower court is affirmed.

INJURY TO RAILROAD EMPLOYE — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Defendant, a railroad company, maintained and operated its track about 12 to 18 inches from a line of telegraph poles. Deceased, an engineer, running one of defendant's locomotives, put his head and shoulders outside of the cab while in motion, and was looking backwards, when his head was crushed against one of the poles, and he was killed. Defendant had been running the engine about eight days before he was killed, and prior to his employment had gone over the line. Upon the day of the accident he was told to keep his head inside of the cab, or he would get hurt. Held, that the carelessness of deceased was the proximate cause of his death, and defendant was not liable therefor.

2. Where the verdict of the jury is manifestly against the evidence, and the trial judge refuses to set aside the verdict, it is the duty of the appellate court to reverse the case, and grant a new trial.

Smith & Smith, Kimball & Allison, Miller & Maginnis, and Bowman & Rogers, for appellants. O. W. Powers and W. H. Dickson, for appellee.

BLACKBURN, J. This suit is brought to recover damages for the death of O'Hare, claimed to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The deceased was in the employ of the defendant company as engineer managing the locomotives that moved its trains. The negligence claimed is the maintenance by the defendant company of its track too near a line of telegraph poles. It appears from the undisputed evidence that the deceased went the whole length of the track of the road before he was employed, and knew how close to the track the poles were; that he had been running the engine about eight days before he was killed; that the day he was killed he was told he had better keep his head inside the cab, or he would get hurt; that he put his head and shoulders outside the cab while the engine was in motion, and was looking back, and his head was crushed against one of the poles, and he was killed. It further appears that the defendant company maintained its track about 12 to 18 inches from the line of telegraph poles, and operated it in that condition. We think it was negligence in the company in maintaining and operating its road so near the line of telegraph poles; but this case turns upon the question as to whether the carelessness of the deceased caused his death. If he was negligent, and did not use due care, reasonable in the situation, and his want of such care contributed to his injury, the plaintiff cannot recover. This doctrine is so well known and understood that no authority need be cited in its support; but we cite Quibell v. Railway Co., 25 Pac. Rep. 734, (decided at this term of this court.) In this case the evidence without contradiction shows that the decedent at the time he was killed had his head and shoulders to half way between his shoulders and elbows outside of the cab window, and was looking back, and in this position his head crashed against one of the poles, and he was killed. His act not only seems careless, but more like the rash act of a man reckless of his life. We think the verdict of the jury is so manifestly against the undisputed evidence that the court below should have granted a new trial. The rule is that, where the verdict of the jury is manifestly against the evidence, and the trial judge refuses to set aside the verdict, it is the duty of the appellate court to reverse the case, and grant a new trial. Keaggy v. Hite, 12 Ill. 100; Hilliard, New Trials & App. 336, 339, and authorities therein cited. In this case the carelessness of the decedent clearly was the proximate cause of his death, and the jury ought to have found for the defendant. The case is reversed, and a venire de novo awarded.

REVIEW ON APPEAL—EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL.

The supreme court will not reverse an order setting aside a verdict for plaintiff, and granting a new trial, where the evidence is vague and uncertain, and does not so appear in the record that the court can reach a satisfactory conclusion as to its effect.

D. Evans and W. H. Dickson, for appellants. Thurman & King, Geo. Sutherland, J. G. Sutherland, and Arthur Brown, for respondents.

ZANE, C. J. The plaintiffs alleged in their complaint in this case that they were the owners of a certain bathing and pleasure resort on Utah lake; and that they were the owners of, and in the lawful possession of, bath-houses, a pavilion, dancing hall, refreshment room, and other buildings used by them in carrying on and conducting their business; and that defendants unlawfully, wantonly, and maliciously entered upon their premises, tore down and destroyed their buildings, and broke up and destroyed their business. For this alleged trespass the plaintiffs claimed damages in the sum of $2,500. The defendants filed an answer to the complaint, in which they denied the plaintiffs' ownership, and their right of possession of the ground from which plaintiffs' buildings were removed, and alleged that plaintiffs were wrongfully occupying with such buildings and business a public street of American Fork City, and that such buildings were removed by direction of such city; and that no unnecessary injury was done to them in such removal. Upon the issue so found, the case was twice tried in the district court, and both the verdicts were rendered against the defendants. The last verdict was for $900, and from the judgment of the court setting it aside, and granting a new trial, this appeal was taken. Several grounds for the new trial were insisted upon by the defendants, and the record does not show which of them the court regarded as sufficient. We assume, however, that the verdict was set aside upon the second ground; which is, in substance, that a clear preponderance of the evidence showed that the land upon which the buildings removed stood were within a public street of American Fork City, that this land had been dedicated to the uses of a public street opened by the city, and used as such by the public. The pleadings and the evidence and proceedings on the trial cover 280 printed pages. A diagram was used on the trial to which witnesses referred that is not found on the record, and without it much of the testimony cannot be fully understood; and much of the evidence is vague and uncertain. Owing to this, we are unable to reach a perfectly satisfactory conclusion as to the effect of the evidence. We presume that the judge of the trial court set aside the verdict, because he found that a clear preponderance of the evidence showed that the buildings removed were upon land that had been dedicated to the uses of a public street, and that, being in a street, it was the right and duty of the city to cause them to be removed, and that they were removed without unnecessary injury to them. In view of the evidence, we are unable to say that the court reached a wrong conclusion. This court will not reverse a judgment of the lower court, except for manifest error. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

ALLEN v. UNION PAC. RY. CO.

MASTER AND SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—NEGLIGENCE.

1. In an action against a railroad company for personal injuries to a freight brakeman caused by the giving way of a round of a car ladder by reason of the rottenness of the wood, plaintiff cannot be asked as an expert railroad man whether, in his opinion, the inspectors would have discovered the defect if the car had been examined.

2. Inspectors of railroad cars are not bound to apply physical force to the rounds of the ladder on a freight car, in order to test its condition, unless they see some indication of weakness.

3. A railroad company is not liable for injuries to its employees caused by defects in its cars, unless by the use of reasonable diligence the defect could have been discovered.

Appeal from district court, first district;

ZANE, C. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the district court held at Ogden. The plaintiff was employed by defendant as a brakeman on one of its freight trains, and while ascending a ladder on a car which it was hauling for another company a step gave way, and he fell to the ground, and the fingers of one of his hands were crushed under a wheel. The car was an old one; one witness stated that it was not an "exceedingly old car, and yet it was not a new one." It appears from the evidence that the wood around the screw that held one end of the round was rotten, and that the weight of the plaintiff pulled it out; that the round was fastened to the car in the ordinary way. The evidence fails to show that the defect could have been discovered by inspection without the application of manual or other physical force; and we do not think that the inspectors were required to apply such tests to the steps of the ladder, unless some indication of weakness or a defect was perceived upon a careful inspection in the ordinary way by the eye. Undoubtedly the company was required to make use of all reasonable means to discover defects that might endanger human life, not only in its own cars, but in such as it was hauling that belonged to other companies as well. The defect that caused the injury was not in the round or in the screws that held it; the wood of the car into which the screw reached had become unsound. On the trial of the case plaintiff's counsel asked him the following question: "State whether or not, in your opinion, as an expert railroad man, if the car from which you fell had been thoroughly examined at Omaha, Green River, or Evanston by the defendant through its proper employees, the defect of the round which gave way would have been discovered." The defendant interposed an objection to the question which the court overruled, and the witness answered: "Yes, sir." To this ruling of the court the defendant excepted, and now assigns it as error. The witness was not asked to express an opinion on conceded facts or upon facts proven or on facts enumerated in an hypothetical question. The rule as to expert testimony has been stated thus: "On questions of science, skill, or trade, or others of the like kind, persons of skill sometimes called 'experts,' may not only testify to facts, but are permitted to give their opinions in evidence. * * * And such opinions are admissible in evidence, though the witness founds them, not on his own personal observation, but on the case itself as proved by the witnesses on the trial. But, where scientific men are called as witnesses, they cannot give their own opinion as to the general weight of the case, but only their opinions upon the facts proved. And if the facts are doubtful, and remain to be found by the jury, it has been held improper to ask an expert, who has heard the evidence, what is his opinion upon the case on trial, though he may be asked his opinion upon a similar case hypothetically stated." 1 Greenl. Ev. (14th Ed.) § 440. Because the defect was not discovered, the inference is that the witness inferred that the car had not been thoroughly examined; or, in other words, he was of the opinion that the inspectors were negligent because they did not find the defect that caused the injury. The witness may have understood that a thorough examination included the application of force to each round to determine whether it could be easily pulled off of the car. When the facts from which an expert is to draw an inference, and express it as an opinion, are conceded or satisfactorily proven, the expert may enumerate them, or they may be enumerated for him, and he can draw his inference from them, and express it as his opinion. If the facts upon which the opinion of the expert is asked are doubtful, they must be embraced in an hypothetical question. In overruling the objection to the question above quoted, and in permitting the witness to answer it, we are of the opinion that the court erred.

The defendant excepted to the following portion of the charge of the court to the jury: "Now, as requested by plaintiff, I instruct you, subject to such modifications as I may make hereafter to these and the other instructions already given. I instruct you, first, that it was the duty of the defendant to furnish, provide, and maintain sufficient, safe, adequate, and suitable machinery and cars for the use of the plaintiff, and the failure to do so would be negligence on the part of the defendant." In this the court instructed the jury that the defendant was negligent if it did not furnish sufficient, safe, and adequate cars; that though the defect which caused the injury was hidden, and could not be discovered by a competent inspector in the use of all reasonable care and diligence, the defendant was still negligent. The company is not liable, because it does not discover all defects in such cars of other companies as come onto its road that may produce injury, but only such as should have been discovered by reasonable skill and diligence. The defendant also excepted to and assigus as error the giving by the court of the following portion of the charge: "It was the duty of the defendant to use due care, and provide a ladder by which the plaintiff was to perform the work for which he was employed safe for his use, and to keep the ladder in repair and good order, so as not to unnecessarily expose the plaintiff to danger; and when the defendant does this, as I have stated, the plaintiff then assumes the risks and dangers incident to the employment in which he is engaged. Now the question comes, could the defendant, by the use of ordinary care, have learned of the defective condition of the ladder in question a reasonable time before the injury? If the defendant could have learned these facts, then it is chargeable with notice of its defective condition at the time of the injury, which would amount to negligence; and if the plaintiff was injured as claimed, by reason of such defective ladder, while in the performance of his duty as an employe of the defendant, and without his fault or negligence, or without knowledge on his part of the defective condition of the ladder, then he is entitled to recover for the injury sued for in this case, and charged in his complaint. Or, under the same circumstances just stated, if the plaintiff did not know the car in question was a foreign car, (or knew it was a foreign car, but did not know of any rule of the defendant for dispensing with the inspection thereof by defendant's inspectors, or that there was a rule of such kind by the defendant company,) then he would have a right to expect the ladder to be in a reasonably safe condition at the time, and if injured by the defects complained of and without negligence on his part, then he would be entitled to recover as heretofore explained." The objection to this extract from the charge is that the jury might understand it to mean that the plaintiff should recover if he was injured in consequence of the defective ladder, without negligence on his part, without proof of negligence on the part of the defendant. The burden is upon the plaintiff of proving that the injury complained of was caused by the negligence of the defendant. We are of the opinion that the court erred in this portion of its charge. The judgment of the court below is reversed.

RAILROAD COMPANIES — KILLING STOCK — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. In an action against a railway company for killing a horse it appeared that the horse was about 100 feet from the track in an unfenced pasture; that on the approach of the train he ran obliquely about 100 yards towards the track, getting upon it a short distance ahead of the engine, and was killed, that no obstructions prevented the engineer from seeing him, and that the train was running a little down grade, but not fast.

Held, that a verdict for plaintiff will not be set aside.

2. Plaintiff was entitled to legal interest on the value of the horse from the time of instituting suit.

Appeal from district court, first district; JAMES A. MINER, Justice.

P. L. Williams and Waldemar Van Cott, for appellants. Evans & Rogers, for respondents.

ZANE, C. J. This action was instituted in the district court to recover damages for the killing of five horses of the plaintiffs in consequence, as alleged, of the negligence of the agents of the defendant in running its trains. In the complaint the killing of each horse is set out separately as a cause of action. In answer to the complaint the defendant denied both the killing and the negligence. A jury was sworn to try the issues, and, after hearing the evidence, and receiving the charge of the court, it retired, and returned a verdict against the defendant on all the counts; and on this verdict the court entered judgment, from which the defendant appealed to this court. The defendant insists that the judgment was erroneous, because the evidence did not prove that the horse mentioned in the fifth count of the complaint was killed in consequence of its negligence. It appears from the evidence that the defendant's road passed through plaintiffs' pasture, and that it was unfenced; that plaintiff's horse was grazing about 100 feet east of the track, and that some other horses were on the west side; that, as a freight train of the defendant approached, the horse ran in a southwesterly direction, and towards the horses on the west side; that, after running about 100 yards he got onto the track a short distance ahead of the engine, and was there overtaken and killed; that no obstructions prevented the engineer or other person on the engine from seeing the horse; that the train was running a little down grade, but not fast. In view of the evidence we do not find that the verdict of the jury was so palpably and clearly wrong as to require the court to set it aside. In its charge the court informed the jurors that if they found that the horses were killed in consequence of the negligence of the defendant they should find their value at the time they were killed, and that they might add to that sum 10 per cent. interest upon it from the time of instituting the suit. The charge as to interest the defendant alleges as error. When the property of one person is destroyed by the wrongful or negligent act of another person justice demands that the latter shall compensate the former for the loss. The latter is entitled to compensation at the time of the loss, and if the person doing the injury does not do so, and retains the compensation, he ought to pay the person whom he has wrongfully kept out of it a sum equal to the value of its use. The rate of interest should be fixed by analogy to the per cent. allowed by the law regulating interest. The authorities are not in harmony, but the weight of them is to the effect, as we think, that interest may be given as damages, where the plaintiff has been deprived of his property by the wrongful act or neglect of the defendant, and the latter delays payment. Some of the authorities hold that interest should be computed on the value of the property, and added from the time of its destruction; others, from the time of instituting the suit. *Railroad Co. v. HAMER v. BRAINARD et al.

FORGED DRAFTS—LIABILITY OF INDORSERS—DEMAND AND NOTICE.

The indorsee of a forged bill of exchange, on its dishonor, may maintain an action against his indorsers for a recovery of the consideration, which has failed, without proof of demand and notice.

Appeal from district court, first district; JAMES A. MINER, Justice.

Smith & Smith, for appellants. Evans & Rogers and Jacob S. Boreman, for respondent.

ZANE, C. J. It appears from the evidence in this record that Zion's Savings Bank & Trust Company, by its cashier, drew a bill of exchange for the sum of $6.50 on C. B. Richards & Co., of New York, payable to the order of one J. S. Field; that the latter indorsed it to Brainard & Robenson, and that they assigned it to the plaintiff for the consideration of $500 in cash and $100 due on a real-estate transaction. It also appears that the draft had been raised to $600 dollars before the assignment to the plaintiff. The plaintiff also assigned the bill; and when the forgery was discovered, and the maker refused to pay, the plaintiff refunded the $500 to his assignee, and brought this suit against the defendants to recover the amount so paid by him to the defendants. Upon the trial the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for that amount and interest, and, a motion for a new trial having been denied by the court, a judgment was by it entered upon the verdict. From this judgment the defendants have appealed, and insist that it was erroneous, because the evidence was insufficient to authorize the verdict, in the absence of proof of demand and notice.

This is not an action based upon the assignment. It is an action to recover the amount paid by the plaintiff to the defendants without any consideration and under a mistake. To permit them to retain such consideration would, in effect, give them so much of plaintiff's money, obtained under a mistake, and without any consideration to plaintiff, and without fault on his part. There is a conflict in the authorities as to the necessity of demand and notice when the indorser does not receive the consideration for the transfer of title, as when he is a mere accommodation indorser. The drawee of a bill is presumed to know the signature of the drawer, and he must determine as to its genuineness and refuse payment; if not, he pays at his peril. Not so, however, as to the other signatures on it, or the writing in the body of it. As to those and such writing he must use reasonable care to prevent being imposed upon; and so, as to the drawer, he is presumed to know his own signature, and to be able to determine whether the amount named in it has been raised, and the law requires him to give prompt notice to the drawee of such forgeries. Some cases hold that demand and notice should be averred and proven when the action is upon the assignment to recover back the consideration paid; but when the action is to recover on the ground of want of consideration and mistake they hold no such demand or notice necessary to be averred or proven. The law applicable to the facts of this case is stated, as we hold, in sections 689a and b, Daniels, Neg. Inst.: "The indorser engages (1) that the bill or note will be accepted or paid, as the case may be, according to its purport; but this engagement is conditional upon due presentment or demand and notice; he also engages (2) that it is in every respect genuine; (3) that it is the valid instrument it purports to be; (4) that the ostensible parties are competent; (5) and that he has lawful title to it and the right to indorse it. And if it turns out that any of these engagements but that first named are not fulfilled, the indorser may be sued for a recovery of the original consideration which has failed, or be held liable as a party without proof of demand and notice. The doctrine of the text that in such cases the indorser is bound without demand or notice undoubtedly applies when he indorses with knowledge of the infirmity that renders the instrument void; and such knowledge is necessary to make him so liable, according to some authorities. But the better opinion is, we think, that he is at least bound to refund the consideration paid him upon the transfer if the instrument is void, for it is not then the thing which it purported to be, and which he impliedly represented it to be. If he be a mere accommodation indorser, receiving no part of the consideration, it has been cogently argued and has been held that he is not responsible for any alteration which may have avoided the instrument, unless there were due demand and notice. But the consideration paid the party accommodated is in such case attributable to him, and he would seem to us to stand as a surety, bound to refund it; and the rule exacting notice to hold an indorser liable seems to us, to apply to cases in which he warrants payment at maturity and not to those cases in which he passes an instrument affected by some vice, which renders it in fact not the bill or note it purports to be." Under the facts of this case we hold that an offer to return the bill or a demand and notice was not necessary to be averred and proven. We find no error in the record. Judgment of the court below affirmed.

SAME v. LEGGITT.

VENDOR AND VENDEE — BONA FIDE PURCHASERS.

1. In ejectment it appeared that A. and B. made an oral partition of land. Respondent's husband bought and paid for B.'s parcel, and took possession, but took no deed, and subsequently, by a decree of divorce, the land was awarded to respondent, who occupied it up to the suit. Thereafter A. and B. conveyed the land to appellant, both grantors and grantees having knowledge of the sale to respondent's husband, and her acquisition and occupancy of the premises. Held, that respondent had an equitable title thereto, and appellants, having bought with knowledge of her rights independent of the record, took nothing by their deed.

2. The fact that respondent's husband was the administrator of the estate of B.'s ancestor at the time of his purchase does not affect the case, as B. was of full age, and received what he considered a fair price for the land.

Appeal from district court, third district; T. J. ANDERSON, Justice.

Le Grand Young and Zane & Putnam, for appellants. John A. Marshall and Waldemar Van Cott, for appellees.

BLACKBURN, J. This is a suit in ejectment, and on a cross-complaint by the defendant asking to have her title quieted. Decree for defendant quieting her title. The land in controversy was a part of the estate of Thomas Cope, deceased. There was an oral partition of the estate, and this land was set apart to Thomas H. Cope while he was a minor, and while he lived with his step-mother, Janet Cope. One Thomas Jack was appointed administrator of the estate of Thomas Cope, deceased, and rented the land, and paid the rent to Janet Cope and Thomas H. Cope until September 8, 1874, and after Thomas H. Cope came of full age. He then bought this land of Thomas H. Cope, and paid part of the purchase money, and went into possession as owner. He was, as part of the purchase money, to put up a house for Janet Cope on a lot in Salt Lake City, and pay the balance when it was demanded. The house was put up, and the purchase price fully paid. Jack continued in the possession of the land until, in a suit for divorce, between him and his wife, it was decreed to the defendant, Mary Ann Jack, and she has continued in its actual occupancy until this suit was brought, excepting a part which she sold to one Leggitt. When Leggitt bought he went into immediate possession, and built a house upon his part. Janet Cope knew of the sale to Jack, and said it was all right, and over $200 of the purchase money was spent in building a house upon her own lot. Thomas H. Cope did not make a deed to Jack for the land because, in 1882, the suit for divorce was pending, and he was warned by Jack not to do it. Plaintiffs claim through a deed made by Janet Cope and Thomas H. Cope and his wife, made April 29, 1889. Defendant claims through an equitable title acquired by paying for the land, and occupying the same under the purchase by her and her husband, through whom she claims, since 1874. We think the evidence fully sustains defendant's equitable title to the land, and her actual occupancy of the land at the time of plaintiff's purchase was notice to them of all her rights, both legal and equitable, wholly independent of what the record showed; and when they bought they were informed that they took all the chances of the purchase; and the evidence shows very clearly that they thought they had discovered a defect in defendant's title, and would buy Thomas H. Cope's and Janet Cope's interest at a low price, and make a speculation by their shrewdness in making the discovery. We think, therefore, that the defendant has an equitable title that ought to be protected and enforced, and that plaintiffs, having bought with knowledge of her rights, can take nothing by their deed. In support of these views we cite Pom. Eq. Jur. § 314, and citations. The case is not affected by the fact that Thomas Jack was the administrator of the estate of Thomas Cope, deceased, when he purchased, for Thomas H. Cope was of full age, and knew fully his rights, and got what was considered a fair price for the land at the time. Plaintiffs ought not to complain. They bought $12,000 worth of land, if the title had been good, for $2,500, supposing the parties in possession had a defective title, and it seems they overreached themselves and lost. They should pocket their loss without a murmur. The decree is affirmed.

This opinion disposes also of the case of the Same Parties Plaintiff vs. Leggitt; and in that case the decree is affirmed.

REVIEW ON APPEAL—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

A verdict will not be set aside merely because the evidence is conflicting, or because the court, looking at the testimony as written, would have come to a different conclusion than that reached by the jury, who had the witnesses before them.

Appeal from district court, third district; C. S. ZANE, Justice.

E. B. Critchlow and J. H. Moyle, for appellants. Stephens & Schrowder, for respondents.

ANDERSON, J. This is an action by plaintiffs to recover a commission of $200, alleged to be due them from the defendants for furnishing a purchaser for certain real estate owned by defendants, for the sale of which plaintiffs claimed to be the agents of the defendants, which agency was denied by the defendants, and this question of fact was the only question in the case in the court below. The action was begun in a commissioner's court, where plaintiffs recovered a judgment of $200 and costs of suit. The defendants appealed to the district court, where the cause was tried before the court and jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiffs for $200 and costs. The defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled by the court, and from the order overruling such motion and from its judgment the defendants bring this appeal. The defendants rely for reversal upon the fact that, as they claim, the preponderance of the testimony shows that the only contract of agency made with plaintiffs was by the defendant Selden Clawson, and that the contract was conditional upon obtaining the consent thereto of the defendant Walter Clawson, the real estate being owned by the defendants jointly, and that Walter Clawson never gave his consent to the contract of agency. We have examined the evidence as set out in the record, and while, from a reading of it, the preponderance in favor of plaintiffs is by no means clear, yet there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, and, the jury being the judge of the credibility of the witnesses, the weight of the evidence, and the facts of the case, and having found the facts in favor of the plaintiffs, we are not prepared to say that their verdict is so far unsupported by the evidence as to justify a reversal of the case: and besides this, the record does not purport to contain all the evidence, nor an abridgement or abstract thereof, and hence it would be impossible for this court to say the jury did not have sufficient evidence before them to justify their verdict. An appellate court will not disturb a verdict merely because the evidence is conflicting, or because the court, looking at the testimony as written, would have come to a different conclusion than that reached by the jury, who had the witnesses before them. Hayne, New Trials & App. § 298; Hill, New Trials, p. 50. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

HEMENWAY v. FRANCIS.

PLEADING—EJECTMENT—ANSWER—NEW TRIAL.

1. In an action of ejectment, if the defendant does not defend for the whole of the property, under section 819, Hill's Code, the answer must specify for what particular part he does defend. An answer which does not plead the ultimate fact upon which the defendant relies, but sets up the evidence of such fact, is defective; but if no objection be taken thereto, until after verdict and judgment, and then only on appeal to the supreme court, such answer will be held sufficient.

2. The sufficiency of an answer is not raised by a motion for a new trial, but may be by a motion for judgment, notwithstanding the verdict, if the objection has not been taken by demurrer.

3. In an action of ejectment a specification in defendant's answer of the part for which he defends, which describes it as "about 120 acres of said land,—the farming land on the north side of the county road, with the buildings thereon,"—is very indefinite, and would be held insufficient if properly objected to before trial, but after verdict and judgment, on objection in the supreme court for the first time, it must be intended that the proper evidence was introduced upon the trial to identify the land.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Lane county; M. L. PIPES, Judge.

This is an action to recover real property. The complaint describes a number of tracts and parcels, some by legal subdivisions and others by courses and distances, and it is alleged that the defendant is in possession and unlawfully holds all of the real property described in the complaint. The complaint contains the other necessary allegations under the statute. The answer admits the ownership of said property, but denies that the defendant wrongfully withholds the possession of said real property, or any part thereof, or that the plaintiff is thereby damaged $100 or any sum. For a further defense the answer alleges "that on the 4th day of August, 1890, said plaintiff leased to the defendant about 120 acres of said land,—the farming land on the north side of the county road, with the buildings thereon,—for the term of one year, with the privilege to keep on said premises one span of mares, three colts, one yearling, and two cows, and the further privilege to keep upon the said premises described in plaintiff's complaint ten head of cattle the coming winter for two or three months, if defendant so desired, and the use of the granary on the south side of said road." Other terms of the lease are also stated. The answer then alleges "that plaintiff was to continue in the use of said premises described in complaint, except the said farming land aforesaid, the description of which is not known to the defendant, and the plaintiff has had and now has and had, at the commencement of this action, all of said land described in the complaint in his possession, except the said 120 acres aforesaid; that the defendant is now in the lawful possession of the said 120 acres, and claims to hold the same by virtue of said lease, and has had no notice to quit." Defendant further alleges that he was a tenant of said plaintiff, and had said land rented at the time of said lease. The reply denied the new matter in the answer. The cause was tried before a jury, and the following verdict returned: "We, the jury, find the defendant entitled to the possession of the 122 acres of land described in his answer in the above-entitled cause, by virtue of the parol lease mentioned therein," upon which a judgment was duly entered for the defendant according to the verdict, from which this appeal is taken. A. C. Woodcock and L. Bilyeu, for appellant. Geo. B. Dorris, for respondent.

STRAHAN, C. J., (after stating the facts as above.) There is but a single question presented on this appeal, and that is the sufficiency of the defendant's answer. The special point of objection is that the defendant only defends as to part of the land described in the complaint, and as to that part it is not described with sufficient certainty. Section 319, Hill's Code, though relating to the answer in this class of actions, does not undertake to prescribe all that an answer shall contain. The defendant's answer must therefore be governed by the general rules of pleading prescribed by the Code, and in addition thereto must comply with section 319. That section requires that, if the defendant does not defend for the whole of the property, he shall specify for what particular part he does defend, and the question is whether or not the answer in this case contains such specification. The answer does not conform in any respect to the general rules of code pleading. It does not state the ultimate fact upon which the defendant relies. Instead of pleading that he was in possession under an unexpired lease from the plaintiff to defendant, giving the duration of the estate created by the lease, the defendant has undertaken to plead the evidence of such right, or the terms of the lease by which such right was created. If objected to at the proper time, no doubt the court would have caused the answer to be corrected, but no objection was made to the answer until after verdict, and then only by way of a motion to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial. A defect in the answer was no cause for granting a new trial. Hill's Code, § 235. But for a defect in the answer that the facts stated do not constitute a defense to the plaintiff's cause of action, and such objection has not been taken by demurrer, the plaintiff may have judgment notwithstanding the verdict, and the same rights are secured to the defendant in like case where the complaint is fatally defective. Id. § 266. But this motion was not made. The part of the premises described in the complaint for which respondent defends, as specified in the answer, is "about 120 acres of said land,—the farming land on the north side of the county road, with the buildings thereon." This is a very indefinite description, but the plaintiff omitted to object to it before trial, and after verdict and judgment, for the purpose of upholding the same, we must intend, on objection made in this court for the first time, that the proper evidence was introduced upon the trial to satisfy the jury of the location and identity of this piece of land. The fact of the leasing was passed upon by the jury, and when no error is shown to have intervened at the trial prejudicial to the rights of the appellant we do not think we are required to interfere. Counsel for appellant have cited Jackson v. Lodge, 36 Cal. 28, and Gale v. Water Co., 44 Cal. 43, but we have examined those cases, and they do not support, or tend to support, counsel's contention. It follows that there is no error in the judgment appealed from, and the same must be affirmed.

STATE v. JARVIS.

INCEST—EVIDENCE OF RAPE—INDICTMENT.

1. On the trial of a defendant charged with the crime of incest it is error to admit evidence tending to prove him guilty of rape.

2. Under section 1878, Hill's Code, the crime of rape by forcible ravishment and incest cannot be committed by the same act. Rape is accomplished by the impelling will of one person, and incest by the concurrent assent of two.

3. Where the evidence discloses that defendant committed the crime of rape, he cannot be convicted under an indictment charging the crime of incest.

4. An indictment under the statute of this state for the crime of incest should allege that the act charged was the joint act of both parties.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from circuit court, Multnomah county; L. B. STEARNS, Judge.

The defendant was indicted, tried, and convicted of the crime of incest, alleged to have been committed with his daughter, Josephine Ross, on the 15th day of April, 1889, in Multnomah county, Or.

E. Mendenhall and Sears & Beach, for appellant. T. A. Stephens, Dist. Atty., and W. T. Hume, for the State.

BEAN, J. In State v. Jarvis, 18 Or. 360, 23 Pac. Rep. 251, this defendant had been convicted of incest under an indictment charging him with both the crimes of rape and incest, but this court reversed the judgment, on the ground that the conviction was had on the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix, who was an accomplice in the commission of the crime. After the case was remanded to the court below it would seem another indictment was found against the defendant, charging him with the crime of incest alone, upon which he was tried and convicted, from which he appeals. The first assignment of error necessary to notice is in the admission of the testimony of Mrs. Dr. Murray. The testimony of this witness was to the effect that, three or four or five years before the trial in the court below, she was consulted professionally by the prosecutrix, whom, on an examination, she found suffering from some irritation of the vagina caused by some recent violence. This evidence was clearly irrelevant. It did not in any way tend to prove the guilt of this defendant. It is possible the evidence might have been competent had the charge against defendant been rape, and not incest. It could only be competent under the theory that the prosecutrix had been forcibly ravished; but when, as in this case, the crime charged is incest, it could in no way tend to prove that defendant was guilty as charged. Rape and incest are two distinct crimes, and what would be competent evidence in the one would not in the other. What has already been said requires the reversal of this case; but there was another question raised in the argument, which it is proper for us to consider, in view of the probability of another trial in the court below. In the case of State v. Jarvis, supra, in which this appellant was defendant, it was held that "in a trial for the crime of incest the party to the crime not on trial is an accomplice, and the other party cannot be convicted on her evidence, unless she be corroborated by such other evidence as tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime." It is admitted in the case at bar that the conviction was had upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix, but it is sought to avoid the rule announced in the case above cited, by claiming that she was compelled by force and threats to submit to the embraces of defendant, and was not therefore a willing participant in the commission of the crime, and not an accomplice. The prosecutrix testified that the incestuous intercourse commenced in 1884, when she was 16 years old, and continued as often as twice a week, and sometimes oftener, until April, 1889. That at no time did she willingly consent, but was compelled by force to submit. That at one time defendant presented a pistol at her, and said he would kill her if she refused; at another time he threatened her with an axe; and at another with a board. That she did not complain to any one, because defendant said he would shoot her if she told anybody about the matter. It was argued for the appellant that the crime of incest requires the concurring assent of both parties, and that, under the facts in this case, defendant was guilty of rape, if guilty of any crime, and could not be convicted of the crime of incest. The crime of incest was not indictable at common law, but is so only by statute. 4 Bl. Comm. 64; Bish. St. Crimes, § 723. To the statute alone, then, must we look for a definition of the crime, and for a solution of the question in this case. By section 1873, Hill's Code, it is provided: "If any persons, being within the degrees of consanguinity within which marriages are prohibited by law, shall intermarry with each other, or shall commit adultery or fornication with each other, such persons, or either of them, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished," etc. It will be noticed that the language of the statute is "with each other," which necessarily implies a concurrent act, and the consent of both parties. If one of the parties is compelled by force to submit to the act, there can be no consent of such party, and the act cannot be committed "with each other," as declared by the statute. Similar provisions in the statutes of sister states have been construed by the courts, and the overwhelming weight of authority is in favor of the construction above indicated. Thus, in People v. Jenness, 5 Mich. 321, it is said by CHRISTIANCY, J.: "This offense [incest] can only be committed by the concurrent act of two persons of opposite sexes; and the assent or concurrence of the one is as essential to the commission of the offense as that of the other; and, as a general rule, both must be guilty, or neither." In De lany v. People, 10 Mich. 241, the information was based on a statute, the language of which was as follows: "If any man and woman, not being married to each other, shall lewdly and lasciviously associate and cohabit together, every such person shall be punished," etc. Held, that the offense was joint, and both parties must be guilty, or neither. In De Groat v. People, 39 Mich. 124, under a statute, the language of which is the same as ours, it was held that conviction could not be had unless the act was by concurrent assent of both parties. COOLEY, J., speaking for the court, said: "Fornication, when the element of near relationship makes it incest, may be an offense equally detestable and heinous, but it still lacks the distinguishing characteristic of rape. The one is accomplished by the impelling will of one person, and the other by the concurrent assent of two." In Baumer v. State, 49 Ind. 544, the statute provided: "If any step-mother and her step-son shall have sexual intercourse to rether," etc., and it was held that the act must be joint, and one of the parties cannot be guilty unless the other is also, and the acquittal of one is a bar to the trial of the other. So, in State v. Thomas, 53 Iowa, 214, 4 N. W. Rep. 908, under a statute which provided that "if any persons within the prohibited degrees * * * carnally know each other, they shall be deemed guilty of incest," it was held that the crimes of rape and incest cannot be committed by the same act; the consent of both parties to the connection being necessary to constitute the crime of incest under the statute. In Yeoman v. State, 21 Neb. 171, 31 N. W. Rep. 669, the statute provided that "persons within certain degrees, who shall commit adultery or fornication with each other, shall be punished," etc. It was held that one of the parties might be indicted alone, but the court said: "It is true that both must be guilty; that the intermarriage, cohabitation, adultery, or fornication must be by a union of minds as well as of actions." In State v. Ellis, 74 Mo. 385, it was held that, where the evidence proves the crime of rape, the party cannot be convicted of the crime of incest. So in People v. Harriden, 1 Parker Crim. R. 344, it was held, under a statute similar to ours, that when the illicit connection is accomplished by force the defendant cannot be convicted of incest, but only of rape. In Noble v. State, 22 Ohio St. 545, by way of argument, it is said: "The crime of incest is committed by two willing parties." A doctrine contrary to that laid down in the authorities before referred to has been held in Mercer v. State, 17 Tex. App. 452, and People v. Barnes, (Idaho,) 9 Pac. Rep. 532. The Texas case is based upon former decisions of the same court and one Michigan niis prius case, which has been repudiated by the court of last resort of that state, as we have already seen. The Idaho case is not in point in the case before us. The statement of the law as given in 10 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 341, is not believed to be supported by the weight of authority. The only cases cited as authority for the statement are the Texas and Michigan niis prius cases above referred to, and Norton v. State, 106 Ind. 163, 6 N. E. Rep. 126, which was under a statute wholly different from ours, while none of the adjudged cases announcing a contrary doctrine are cited, except People v. Harriden, supra. We think the decided weight of authority is that, under a statute like ours, the crime of rape by forcible ravishment and incest cannot be committed by the same act, but that of incest requires the concurring assent of both parties. We do not desire to be understood as holding it necessary that both parties must be guilty of the crime of incest before the guilty one can be punished. That question is not before us, and it will be time enough to decide it when presented. Possibly, if the assent of one party was induced by fraud or deception, the party perpetrating the fraud might be guilty of incest, while the innocent party would not, or one party might be ignorant of the relationship, while the other had full knowledge of it, and so other circumstances might arise, under which one party would be guilty and the other innocent. In the case before us the defendant accomplished his purpose, either by the consent of the prosecutrix or by force. If by her assent, she was an accomplice, and a conviction could not be had on her uncorroborated testimony, (State v. Jarvis, supra;) and if by force, the crime was not incest, and the conviction cannot stand. Counsel for appellant contended on the hearing that the indictment is insufficient, in not alleging that the illicit intercourse was by the concurring assent of both parties. This question seems to have been raised in this court for the first time, and perhaps the indictment is sufficient after judgment, but the logical conclusion from the authorities heretofore cited with approval is that the indictment in cases of this kind should allege the act as joint, since it is only by the concurring assent of both parties that the crime can be committed. The judgment of the court below is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. RUSSELL.

JURISDICTION OF JUSTICE—ALIAS SUMMONS.

1. When a justice once obtains jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the action, his jurisdiction continues until the action is legally disposed of by such justice.

2. Where a complaint was filed against a defendant, and a void judgment rendered by the justice, such judgment does not terminate the action so as to prevent such justice from issuing an alias summons, and acquiring jurisdiction of the person of the defendant.

Appeal from circuit court, Marion county; R. P. BOISE, Judge.

E. H. Peery, for appellant. J. K. Weatherford, for respondent.

LORD, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the circuit court dismissing a writ of review issued out of said court to review and set aside a judgment rendered in a justice's court in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff in the writ, for the wrongful killing of a horse. In substance, the facts are these: That Russell, as plaintiff, commenced an action in a justice's court against the railroad company, as defendant, for the wrongful killing of a horse of the alleged value of $225, by filing his complaint, and that on the same day a summons was issued, directed, not to the defendant, but to one Johnson, agent of the defendant, etc.; that at the time specified for trial, no one appearing for the defendant, the court undertook to render judgment against the defendant company for the amount alleged; that subsequently the plaintiff, by his attorney, moved the justice's court to set aside the judgment rendered aforesaid, on the ground that the summons and service were insufficient to confer jurisdiction and authorize such pretended judgment, which being allowed, such pretended judgment was set aside, and a summons issued directed to the defendant company, and due service thereof obtained; that, after said pretended judgment had been set aside and summons issued, the defendant sued out the writ aforesaid to review and set aside such pretended judgment, but at the time specified in the summons appeared in the justice's court, and filed an answer in abatement, to which the defendant interposed a demurrer, and, the court sustaining it, the defendant refused to answer or further plead when judgment was rendered against it. It is conceded that the summons directed to one Johnson, and served upon him, was insufficient to obtain jurisdiction over the defendant, and to authorize the judgment rendered. In fact, no summons had been issued and served upon the defendant company, and, as a consequence, it was not possible for the justice's court to acquire jurisdiction to render any judgment against it. Being without the semblance of authority to act in the premises, its judgment was a nullity. The contention for the company is that, upon the rendition of the judgment, the power of the justice became functus officio, and that he could not afterwards vacate or annul such judgment, much less to cause to be issued an alias summons on the complaint filed therein. The Code provides that the complaint must be made and filed with the justice before the summons can issue, and such making and filing of the complaint is a commencement of the action, and that it continues pending until legally disposed of. So that, when a complaint was made and filed against the defendant, an action was commenced against the defendant, and pending until it was disposed of legally. It is true, as a matter of fact, there was a judgment rendered against the defendant, and entered by the justice upon his docket, but it was a void judgment, and incapable of enforcement. In legal contemplation the case stood as if no judgment had been rendered or entered upon the docket, with only a complaint filed against the defendant making the commencement of the action, and upon which a summons is authorized to be issued. The action of the justice in allowing the motion to vacate the judgment only sought to make the face of the docket conform in fact to the legal status of the case. Unless the presence of such void judgment had the effect to terminate the action, and exhaust the power of the justice to issue an alias summons, it is difficult to understand how its vacation or expunging it from the docket can make any difference. That the rendition of a void judgment does not terminate the action, so as to prevent such justice from issuing an alias summons, and acquiring jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, was expressly held in Knapp v. King, 6 Or. 246, BOISE, J., saying: "After jurisdiction is acquired by filing the complaint, the court has only power to review an amended complaint, or dismiss the case on motion of complainant, except to issue process to acquire jurisdiction of the defendant, or to issue mesne or auxiliary processes, such as attachments or the like. Until he acquires jurisdiction of the defendant, he can render no valid judgment against him. If he render judgment against the defendant without jurisdiction of his person, it is simply void, and no judgment, and can be disregarded in any collateral proceeding
